AN engineering work in Egypt is about to be commenced on ground which tradition associates with Joseph the son of Jacob. The New York Herald publishes a dispatch which states that Mr. Cope Whitehouse sails to-day for Europe on his way to Egypt to consult with other engineers on the practicability of constructing a reservoir in the Egyptian desert. The plans contemplate a reservoir covering 250 square miles, which would serve the double purpose of relieving the pressure on the levees in a time of flood and storing the water for a time of drought. Mr. Whitehouse said in reference to the work: "The great historical interest in this work arises from the fact that the Raiyan Canal, which is to be utilized, is named after the Pharaoh or Shepherd King, who reigned at the time the patriarch Joseph was Prime Minister of Egypt. The King's name was Raiyan. A large number of Arab traditions that have been collected attribute to Joseph the vast engineering works, which still are important factors in the cultivation of lower Egypt."

THE WANING SOCIAL SYSTEM.

THE prediction of a social upheaval is made by an English statesman whose acumen has never been doubted. Referring, in an interview, to the Emperor William's recently held International Conference on the labor question, he declared his belief that such a conference had produced no good results because "the characteristics and aptitudes of each people are so different, as well as the conditions under which they live, that any very deep-seated unanimity of opinion upon labor reform can hardly be looked for. Perhaps, however, one benefit might come in the decrease of the length of working hours. For example, Australia has demonstrated that shortening the hours of labor does not necessarily lessen the amount produced in any case, and whatever may be the final result of the congress, it will be but one step in the march toward the general socialistic upheaval which I regard as inevitable. In fifty or a hundred years our descendants will look upon the present organization of society very much as we look upon the feudal system of our ancestors. How these changes will come about no one can tell. There are too many unknown factors in the problem, but changes are about to come and are coming." (Heb. 8:13.)

PROTECTION FOR SLEEPERS.

A DECISION of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts entitles passengers in sleeping-cars in that State to recover damages from the companies if they are robbed in the cars. The Chief-Justice in giving the decision of the court said: "A sleeping-car company holds itself out to protect passengers during the night, when a passenger is powerless, from the nature of things, to protect his property. When property, such as a man may reasonably carry, is stolen, the company is liable for it. Such a rule is required by public policy and by the true interests of both the passenger and the company." This decision appears reasonable, and will probably result in the companies employing watchmen or taking some other precaution to prevent the passengers being robbed on their journey. The passengers will not now be kept awake by anxiety about the safety of their property. So many professing Christians are wrapped in spiritual slumber as they journey through life that it might be supposed that they imagined some similar law protected them; but it is not so. Constant watchfulness is required of all. (Rev. 3:11.)

THE DREADED CONFLICT.

THE tremendous preparations for war which Germany is making, are sketched in an article published by the Posen Courier. It says: "On the German side mobilization will be effected in a very short time. In less than seven days a little over 1,400,000 men will be concentrated on the frontier at points fixed by the general staff. The cars are ready, and the coal for the railroads was laid in long ago. Four or five days after the first advance, 800,000 men will form the second line. Finally there will be the landsturm, with about 1,100,000 on the first call. All these troops are thoroughly drilled, and armed with the repeating rifle. The artillery and cavalry have all that is necessary for undertaking a campaign. One can imagine, therefore, what the next war will be. It will be frightful and merciless. Certainly the Franco-German War of 1870 will look like child's play compared with the coming struggle which everybody is talking about, but which nobody but a madman would desire."

SCENES IN THE HOLY LAND.

OUR readers will be glad to have the pictures of scenes in the Holy Land, which appear this week on the first page. They are engraved from photographs which Dr. Talmage brought home when he returned from his tour in that hallowed country. A large collection of these photographs is now in the hands of our artist who is making groups of them, which will appear from time to time in these pages, as rapidly as is consistent with the principle of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to give first attention to current events of interest to the religious public.

Light on Bible Topics

will, we trust, be gained from these pictures and the articles accompanying them. Though the Holy Land no longer dazzles the visitor with the magnificence of the Temple; though the splendid ritual of the Levitical Code no longer keeps busy a corps of priests and singers; though no processions of pilgrims are now seen wending their way to Jerusalem to keep the solemn feasts, the land and the dress, manners and customs, of the people have changed so little from those of ancient times as to astonish a visitor from this land of perpetual change and progress. The people are quiet, unenterprising, uninventive, and perform their labor, agricultural, mechanical and domestic, in the most primitive manner. Even after the lapse of so many centuries as separate us from Bible times, the traveller in Palestine sees in the dress and habits and labors of the people, many things which recall the imagery of the Book as well as the rivers, the mountains, and the lakes mentioned by the sacred writers.

The Jaffa Gate

of Jerusalem, which is the subject of the picture in panel No. 1, of the illustration on the first page, is sometimes called the Bethlehem, or Hebron Gate, because, travellers to either of these two places pass out by that portal. It is the only western gate of the city, the other three being the Damascus gate on the north, St. Stephen's gate on the east and Zion gate on the south. There were several other gates in the ancient city, but they are now built up. One of these, called the Golden gate, has a vast slab of marble laid transversely over it, and the Mahomedans hold the belief that Mohammed will sit there at the last great day and judge the nations gathered before it in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The gates of the city are guarded in the day and closed at sunset, to protect the inhabitants from the Bedouin robbers who are the most dreaded enemy of civilized people in those parts, at this day.

The wall, in which the gates are placed, surrounds Jerusalem, and is nearly two and a half miles in length. It is a massive structure, varying in height from twenty-five to fifty feet. Though it would be easily battered down by artillery, it is sufficiently strong to keep out the robbers, above mentioned. It has been the subject of considerable debate, and the question of how far it runs on the line of the ancient wall is still unsettled. It is probable that it does not date farther back than the sixteenth century; but there are massive stones in it, beautifully grooved and bevelled, which evidently have much greater antiquity. The smaller stones, and the rough masonry surrounding them, indicate that the builders of the existing wall used materials from the ancient wall, and some of these old stones may date back as far as Nehemiah, if indeed they were not first prepared and placed in position by Solomon's builders.

The Jaffa gate presents the appearance of the gates in nearly all Oriental cities. It is a place of concourse and of business. As no vehicle is allowed to enter the city, and indeed could not pass over the uneven pavements of its steep streets, which in many places are cut in actual steps, the people are not disturbed as they gather in the street, just within the gate. Mention is made in various parts of the Bible of judges holding court at the gates of the city. (Deut. 16: 18, Joshua 20: 4, Ruth 4: 1, Lamentations 5: 14, Zech. 8: 16, etc.) The reason for this custom was doubtless that the gate was easy of access, and that prominent men and witnesses of the decisions were likely to be found there. At the present day in some Oriental countries, notably in Morocco, justice is still dispensed in the gate. There, too, the law was read, the prophets declared the word of the Lord, and were sure of an audience. It was also apparently a place for conversation, and gossip, as we may infer from David's complaint, "They that sit in the gate speak against me; and I was the song of the drunkards." (Psa. 69: 12.)

The Weeping-Place

depicted in the second panel in the illustration, is a pathetic evidence of the affliction of God's chosen people. In part of the western wall of the city are a large number of the ancient stones previously mentioned, and as it is near the site of the Temple—the holy and beautiful house of which, as Christ predicted, not one stone now remains upon another, it is believed that these stones once formed part of that magnificent structure. Thither the Jewish pilgrims, who go to Jerusalem from all parts of the world, congregate to bewail the desolation of their city. As early as A. D. 340, the privilege was accorded to them of going to this place once a year, on the anniversary of the capture of the city, and weeping there. Large numbers availed themselves of the privilege, and to this day, when they may visit it, at any time, they are to be found there, proving by their lamentations that they still take pleasure in its stones, and its very dust is dear to them.

Dr. Andrew Thompson paid a visit to the place a few years ago. He says: We were without a guide, but following in the steps of an aged Israelite, with a well-worn Hebrew Bible in his hand, we were not long in reaching the spot. Passing by a narrow path, through a dense thicket of prickly pears, we came to the ancient wall, with an open space before it, and with a few wild-flowers growing here and there, between the joints of its enormous stones, which the Jews believe to be taken from the old Temple wall. There they were, leaning against the wall, from eighty to a hundred of them of every age, from the white-bearded octogenarian to the boy of twelve. It was a touching sight. After the lapse of eighteen dreary centuries, Israel's representatives from almost every country in the world, were weeping over her ruined Temple, her ruined city, her people scattered and peeled. On that neighboring Olivet, long ago, One had wept and prophetically said, 'Behold, your house is left unto you desolate;' and the words had come ringing down as a funeral knell through all those intervening ages.

"Some of the number were reading aloud out of the Book of Deuteronomy, others in the Lamentations of Jeremiah. Often there were low murmurs and sobs; some would approach the wall with their lips as if to embrace it, and as some touching passage was read, the sorrow rose in a prolonged wail to the skies. Their sorrow was real, and their cries, at times, as one that mourneth for an only son." Would that they knew those words in which alone there is hope: "And they also, if they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again" (Rom. 11: 23).

The Water-Carrier

whose picture occupies panel No. 3, is a familiar figure in the cities of Palestine, especially in Jerusalem, where there are no wells and where the only means of supplementing the sparse supply which is caught from the roofs of the houses, is from reservoirs at a distance from the city. When there is a plentiful supply of water, the carrier fills his bottle with sherbet, which commands a ready sale. The bottle is the most interesting feature of the traffic. It is usually made of the skin of a goat. When the animal is killed, the head and feet are cut off, and the bones, flesh, and intestines are drawn through those apertures by the exercise of great skill and strength. They are then tied or sewn up, and the skin tanned with acacia bark to prevent its imparting an unpleasant flavor to the fluid it is intended to hold. In some cases, as for long journeys in the desert, the skin of an ox is used, and the bottles so made will hold about sixty gallons each. Reference to these skin-bottles is made by Joshua upon whom the Gibeonites imposed by appearing before him with wine bottles "old and new and bound up" (Joshua 9: 4, 13), which the said were new when they started, but had become old and worn out on their long journey. It is to bottles of this kind that our Lord referred when He said (Matt. 9: 17): "Men do not put new wine into old bottles; else the bottle break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottle perish."

The Tomb of Absalom

stands outside Jerusalem in the valley of Jehoshaphat. It is a square isolated block hewn out of the rocky ground near the Kedron with depression or niche around it. The body of the monument is twenty-four feet square, and is ornamented on each side with two pillars and two pilasters of the Ionic order. Its height is twenty feet. Upon this block rests a low dome terminating in a small spire about forty feet from the ground. The strongest evidence of its association with the rebellious son of David is the length of time that the tradition can be traced. The oldest narratives we have of travels in the Holy Land mention this tomb, and say that it was then popularly understood to be a memorial of Absalom. A singular custom, prevalent to this day, impresses the association on the visitor. The monument is surrounded with loose stones which have been cast at it as an expression of Jewish scorn and antipathy to the young man who dared to usurp the throne of his father. A hole was made centuries ago in the front of the monument, and so many of the stones hurled at it have gone through, that the interior chamber is partially filled up. The Jew still continues to expectorate when he passes the tomb and to throw one stone. The pillars and the carving of the tomb have suffered from this habit. It may be that this is the spot mentioned II Samuel 18: 18, and called there "Absalom's Place," where he raised a marble pillar or memorial to prevent his name being forgotten as he had no son to perpetuate it. Whether that is or is not "Absalom's Place," the name of the rebel prince is not forgotten, and its aspect tells with what sentiments it is remembered.

The Lady's Airing

which forms the subject of the picture in panel No. 5, is a common scene in Palestine, Egypt and other Oriental lands. The lady, mounted on the donkey—a much smaller, sleeker, better groomed animal than with us, is conducted by the servant appointed by her husband for the duty. She would not consider it decorous, no would others consider it right for her to appear on the streets unattended. Her costume, however, is the most striking feature of the picture. Muffled in a thick shawl, not ungracefully arranged to cover the head as well as the shoulder and body; and the lower part of the face concealed by her Tsayiph, or veil, which reaches from just below the eyes almost to the feet, she may go abroad without reproach. It is not however, in accordance with Oriental ideas of propriety for a man to appear to notice her as she passes him in the street; when he meets her he is expected to pass as if not conscious of her presence. To lift, or even to touch the veil, would be regarded as a gross and unpardonable outrage, and the complaint of the woman in Solomon's Song: (5: 7) that "the keepers of the walls took away my veil," implies to Oriental ears an insult profoundly painful and humiliating to her.

MR. STANLEY'S ARRIVAL IN ENGLAND.

(See Illustration on page 340.)

THE scene of Mr. Stanley's landing at Dover, England, on April 26, was a memorable one. The accompanying illustration is taken from a photograph of it, which an artist in the crowd succeeded in getting. It was a work of difficulty, for the throng of spectators was a very large and eager one. It was also a very various one, composed of representatives of all classes. Mr. Stanley has enthused all ranks, and the people who were anxious to see him were not only scholars and scientific gentlemen, but artisans, borers, and the usual loafers who manage to e every free show. It was curious to read how en of eminence and scientific reputation, many whom are personally known to Stanley, and shed to be among the first to greet him, were ceremoniously thrust into the background by rger and stronger men who were more ac- stomed to crowds.

Mr. Stanley was accompanied by Dr. Parke, e physician who saved his life in Africa, and Lieut. Stairs, his friend and comrade, and plain Nelson and Mr. Jephson. The steamer ich brought the party was specially hired for purpose by the King of the Belgians, and the in which carried the party from Dover to ndon was a special train provided by the di- ors of the London, Chatham and Dover Rail- id Company. The cheering that broke from crowd when Stanley set his foot on land was fening, and it needed all the efforts of the ge body of police on hand to enable the ex- rer to make his way to the train.

THE LATE MR. W. E. SHIPTON.

(See Portrait on Page 348.)

HE remarkable man who has just passed y in England deserves a more than local ute from the Christian church. He gave his re life to a labor which has placed the whole ld under obligation. Mr. Shipton took up work of the Young Men's Christian Associa- s, when that work was in its infancy, and did h to bring it to its present state of effi- cy. In his own land he nurtured it, and put and energy and systematic force into it, un- grew to its present prodigious influence. howed it to American visitors, explained its ods of work, described the experiments had been tried, and urged them to plant lar Associations in their own cities. He prompt in replying to their letters asking advice, and more than once visited the ed States and Canada to take part in the cils and give the benefit of his experience. an ever more completely found the niche as best adapted to fill. Kindly, genial, mag- , energetic, full of resource and with inex- tible invention of plans for getting hold of g men, interesting them, and leading them rist, Mr. Shipton was a model head of a g Men's Christian Association. He gave e work all his thoughts and energies for -six years, and lived to see it one of the useful of all religious agencies.

s a remarkable fact, and one that shows God uses, what the world calls misfor- , for His purposes, that Mr. Shipton's de- n to this cause originated in early hard- . He was left an orphan early in life, was ated at a public institution for orphans and, aving that place, commenced his worldly r amid London's temptations, with none to him of the evil or lead him to the good. ily he had already given his heart to God as kept from ruin. But he saw many of ung business associates going the down- road, and it was that sight, and his own tion of the dangers of city life for unbel- ed young men, that turned his thoughts direction of the Y. M. C. A.

A PROMISE KEPT.

y of the S. S. Golden Text for June 8. "Ask ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; k and it shall be opened unto you." Luke 11:9. ROUD and happy boy was Harry Trenton he attained the digniy of a bed-room of wn. A room all to himself, in which he keep the treasures dear to a boy's heart, ot have them contemptuously tossed away vants, who called them rubbish.

ter a while," said Mrs. Trenton, "I may picture to hang on your wall, if you want Larry."

ry had some pictures cut out of illustrated s, and sundry alleged pictures circulated ertisements of soap, and cocoa, and other s. These he pinned on his walls, but they became yellow and dirty. He did not ask other for the picture she had spoken of, ed to freshen up his own,

"Mamma, need I say my prayers to-night?" Harry asked, as he kissed his mother one night. "I am so tired, and I can scarcely keep my eyes open, I'm so sleepy."

That clearly was not the time for an explana- tion, or to teach the weary boy the value of prayer. Mrs. Trenton, earnest Christian and devoted mother as she was, had too much tact and sense to venture upon it then. She put down her work, and going up with her boy to his new room, helped him to undress, and sat beside him while he offered up the few simple petitions she had taught him as soon as he was able to remember them.

The next morning Harry's first invasion of his mother's sitting-room revealed a change in its arrangements. On an easel, near her work table, was a handsomely framed picture of a fair-haired boy of about his age, on his knees.

"Oh, mamma, how beautiful!" was the boy's exclamation. "Who is that?"

"Come here, my boy," said the mother. "Let me tell you all about the picture. It is for your bedroom. I promised you a picture some time ago, and I thought you would have asked me for it. You did not. I did not know but you might prefer your own."

Harry thought of the poor shabby little prints on his walls, and looked at this beautiful picture with its wide, gilt frame, and smiled. "I did not know it was like this," he said. "Is it really for me?"

"Certainly, and I want to tell you about it."

"You remember last night, Harry, that you asked me if you must say your prayers as you were so tired?"

"Yes, mamma, I was out skating until nearly bed-time, and I did not think it was so late until I heard the sunset gun, and then I ran all the way home. My feet and legs ached so when I came in I felt I should like to lie down and go to sleep right away. I thought it would not matter if I did not say my prayers just for once. But I did say them after all, you know, mamma."

"If my little Harry had wanted something very much that his mamma could give him, would he have said, 'Need I ask mamma for it?'"

"Oh, no, mamma, I should come to you right away and ask for it."

"Or if he had known how nice a picture mamma had for him, would he have kept from reminding her of her promise?"

"Oh, no!" said Harry, very sincerely.

"Well, my boy, your prayers are just that."

"But, mamma, I do not want the things I ask God for, and besides do you think He can hear me all the way up in heaven?"

"Yes, Harry, He does hear you and you do need the things you ask for. Suppose some morning you were told you must go away from home on a voyage to Europe, would you not say, I cannot go now, I shall need ever so many things for the voyage and while I am away. I wish I had known I was going, so that I might have been ready. And suppose you found that your papa had known all along about your going, and when you went to him you found that he had in his study every kind and description of article you would need, would not that be good? Well, prayer is something like that. You do not quite know what you will need when you grow up a big man like papa. You may have to do things you don't understand, and wicked men may try to persuade you to do things that if you did them you would be very miserable, but you cannot know that, and you do not know whether you should do them or not, and you wish you knew someone that could tell you. Now, God knows exactly how you will live and what you will need to make you happy and good and useful, and He can give you those things; and He has promised to give them to you—only he wishes you to ask for them. He says: 'Ask and it shall be given unto you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you.' So when you kneel down to pray, you ask Him to deliver you from evil and to bless you. So you see you do really need the things you ask for, though you do not know that you do."

"Yes, mamma, I understand now; but do you really think that when I say my prayers God hears me?"

"Yes, Harry, I am sure He does, and I will tell you something that will astonish you still more. He once spoke to a little boy like you. He wanted some one to take a message for Him to warn some people of a great trouble that was coming, and He chose a little boy to go for Him. The little boy was afraid at first, but afterward he listened and promised to do it. God often spoke to him afterward when he grew up and became a great judge and a very good man."

"Oh, do tell me all about it, mamma."

Then the mother took up her Bible, and read to him the story of Samuel, and before the picture of the little praying child was carried up to his bed-room, she knelt with her son and entreated God that He would so call him and consecrate him to His service.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Somnambulist Robbed Himself in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. A music teacher, who has recently begun business in State Street, on Thurs- day night awakened his brother, who shares his bed-room. He was moaning pitifully, and when his brother went to him he found him tied and gagged but still asleep. He was awakened with difficulty, but could give no account of his condition. It appeared, however, that he was a sleep-walker, and various indications about the knots which were made in his bonds showed that he must have tied them himself while in his sleep. When he proceeded to dress himself in the morning he found that his pockets had been rifled and every article of value which had been in them was missing. He and his brother made a careful search for them, and the missing articles were found skilfully concealed in the room. He had no recollection of taking them from his pockets and hiding them, but he had evidently done so while unconscious. He would not have been guilty of such folly in his waking moments, though there are other and more deplorable injuries that men inflict on them- selves when they are awake and know what they are doing. God says: "He that sinneth against me wrongeth his soul." (Prov. 8:37.)

A Distressing Death in a Quicksand Took place at Woodside, Long Island, on May 17th. An employee in the New York Post Office was having a house built there, and went down a well that was being dug, to repair the pipe. His son, a boy fourteen years old, was assisting him. The boy went into the house for some tools, and on taking them to the well, was terrified to see his father sinking in the sand at the bottom of the well. He called for help, and soon a number of men came to try to save the struggling man. The sand had by that time a firm grip upon him. He sank rapidly to his waist, and then to his arm-pits. A stout rope was tied around him and an effort made to draw him out; but the man begged them to desist. He said they would pull him in pieces. The rope was then made fast to prevent his sinking lower, and men set to work digging a new hole to undermine him, hoping to draw away the sand. They worked hard, but the man continued to sink, and it was necessary to loosen the rope that was holding him up, as the pain became intolerable. A rubber tube was procured and inserted in his mouth, so that if he sank below the surface before the men could dig down to him, he might obtain air. Gradually he sank out of sight, but still lived. Only the twitching of one of his hands which he had raised above his head showed that he was still alive five hours after the sand caught him. At last that ceased, and the anxious watchers knew that he was dead. The men who were dig- ging reached him about an hour afterward, and recovered his body. There are some men whom sin seems to hold with a similarly fatal grasp. Their habits and associations hold them so firmly in Satan's bonds that no human power can ex- tricate them. Even in that extremity if they can be induced to lay hold on Christ by faith, they may be saved. He is able to "bring them out of the horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set their feet upon a rock." (Psa. 40:2.)

THE PROPHETIC DATES.

By Professor Infree *

Common Prejudice Against the Study of the Dates—The Veiled Words of the Prophets—Daniel Probably Censured—His Effort to Understand the Number of the Years—A Blessing on the Study—A Momentous Calculation—A Focal Date—The Rosetta Stone of Prophecy—How it is Applied—Various Prophetic Epochs—The Millennium of Blessedness.

It is difficult to understand the prejudice felt by Christian people, and even by many students of prophecy, against the efforts made by certain well-meaning men to calculate the time of the end of this dispensation. Intelligent men believing in the personal coming and millennial reign of our Lord, frequently deprecate a statement that He may be expected at such and such a time. They say, His coming will be like a thief in the night, that it will take men by surprise, that it will be at a time when men look not for Him, when they are eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. All of this is true; they are Christ's own words; but it should be true only as far as the world is concerned. It should not apply to the Church, and especially not to those members of the church who are looking and waiting for their Lord's glorious appearing. That day should not take such men "unawares." True, numerous predictions in our own and former times, though based on prophecy, have failed of fulfilment. That was to be expected. The subject is necessarily an intricate one, because, if the exact date, were stated in the Bible, there would be an end of watchfulness and of the diligent study of the prophecies, which God clearly enjoins. The prophets and probably were not themselves aware of their meaning, even after "searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify." (I Peter 1: 11.) Mistakes, therefore, have been made, and they have discouraged some from searching, and many others from giving attention to the results of the studies of those who do search. This is to be deplored, because the prophets have given statements of dates and measures of time which they must have been led to give for some useful purpose. The Holy Spirit inspired their utterances with the definite purpose of putting men on their guard, and of encouraging a study of the clues given to the mystery. To all who believe in the inspiration of the Word of God the question of the times and dates ought to appeal with irresistible force, for in neglecting the study of any portion of the Word of God they are showing contempt for a message from God, and wilfully depriving themselves of the benefit it was intended to confer.

Speak in Veiled Words

It is no novel disposition—this of objecting to a definite calculation of the dates. In all ages of the Church, of which we have record, it has been manifested. It is not unlikely that in the time of Daniel himself, there may have been some of his fellow-exiles who disparaged his studies and thought that he might be better employed.

Daniel was President of that great realm of the Chaldeans (Daniel 6: 2) and his duties were probably no less engrossing than those of our Presidents. We know that his position was extremely difficult and delicate, as he was surrounded by prejudiced and jealous statesmen, who on one occasion would have caused his death if God had not interfered by miracle for his preservation. (Daniel 6: 5-23.) He must have had the most exhausting and perplexing kind of duties. Yet he says: "I, Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet." (Daniel 9: 2.) It would be quite consistent with Jewish character if his fellow-exiles expostulated with him, and urged him to let those dates and calculations alone, and devote his attentions to the advancement of his people's interests, as his exalted position gave him opportunity. Such expostulations

* From advance sheets of his new work on prophecy which we hope to notice more fully on its publication.

would be dictated by common sense. They are like those we hear now when any man announces that he "understands by books the number of the years." Yet how did God regard this effort to understand? He sent an angel who touched the student, and told him that from the first day that he set his heart to understand, his words were heard (Daniel 10: 12,) and he also said, "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. I am come to show thee, for thou art greatly beloved." (Daniel 9: 22, 23.) Surely they who, like Daniel, give their mind to this study, will enjoy the favor of God, and their words are entitled to the respectful attention of God's people. And for the encouragement of both, the direct promise is given, "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy." (Rev. 1: 3.)

A Momentous Result

is that which has come from this study. It may not be accurate in all its details, but it deserves attention and there are many extraneous facts which combine to make it a probable solution of the problem. How nearly it concerns every one now living is evident from the fact that, in the opinion of the most learned and careful students of prophecy, the "time of the end" is not many years away; and a variety of calculations focalize in the first years of the next century as the probable date. As we have now entered the last decade of this century, the possibility is one of immediate concern.

The simplicity of the method by which this conclusion is reached renders it comprehensible to the most unlearned reader. It is easily stated in outline, and there are many treatises published which fill in the details. The first question to be settled is obviously the measuring line—the prophetic standard of time. In all the periods mentioned in prophecy the day is the unit. Evidently that word, day, as in the Mosaic record of creation, does not mean a day of twenty-four hours, in the sense in which we use the word. What then is the length of the prophetic day? When we find that out, the periods, the times of the Jews, the times of the Gentiles, the times of the desolation, the seventy weeks, etc., may be reckoned. This key-measure is given to us. It is like the Rosetta stone which contained an inscription in three languages, one of which philologists had long ineffectually tried to learn. As they already understood the other two, this Rosetta stone gave them the key which, when they applied it to the hieroglyphs, that had puzzled them so long, made the meaning plain. As it made sense of them they had no doubt as to its accuracy. It is so with

The Rosetta Stone of Prophecy.

This standard is found in Daniel 9: 25, 26. The angel told Daniel that from the date of the going forth of the command to rebuild Jerusalem several prophetic periods would take their starting point. One of these would be the period to elapse before the cutting-off of Messiah the prince; and to identify Him still more clearly, and with a prophetic view of the evangelical doctrine so precious to us in these days, but then indistinctly perceived, the angel said, the cutting-off was "not for Himself." This period was to be seven weeks, and sixty, and two weeks,—sixty-nine weeks in all. There is the key! Does it fit? Sixty nine weeks are 483 days. According to the calculations of the best historical students, the crucifixion took place in the year 38 or 39 of our era. The going forth of the command to rebuild Jerusalem was, as we know, in the year 445 before the commencement of our era. Add those two dates together, and you have the number 483—the very number we were in search of. The angel said 483 days would be the length of that period, and we find that its length was exactly 483 years. Therefore the prophetic day is a year long. That is evidently the key to the measurement of all the other prophetic periods.

Now the study becomes more simple. From the same starting point is the period of twenty-three hundred days (Daniel 8: 13) which were to elapse before the sanctuary ceased to be trodden under foot. Applying our measuring standard, we find that the period would be about the year 1856. That year saw the close of the Crimean war when the Sultan of Turkey was forced to relax his grip upon the Holy Land and to emancipate the Jews from the restrictions which prevented their access to their holy places. Another period is the twelve hundred and ninety days (or years) mentioned in Daniel 12: 1. As the end of that period was to be marked by the same event as that which terminated the former period of twenty three hundred days, we must conclude that the twelve hundred and ninety days (or years) commenced in about the year 566 of our era. Thus we obtain a new date which furnishes a clue to the beginning and end of other periods. Into these we have no space to enter here, but enough has been said to show the system on which these calculations are made.

One point, however deserves special notice. It refers to the period, mentioned above, of twelve hundred and ninety days. To this period the angel, speaking to Daniel, adds forty-five prophetic days (or years) which he said would end in the period of blessedness. "Blessed are they that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." (Daniel 12: 12.) That time of Blessedness—evident in the Millennium—thus commences forty-five years after the termination of the former period of twelve hundred and ninety days, which, if the calculation previously described is correct, was in 1856; the forty-five years thus brings us to the next century. Blessed indeed will they who see it; come when it may!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Napoleon's Wronged Wife.*

As for Josephine, she was always and everywhere the same: affable, gracious, obliging, always seeking peace, sharing none of the severities, the anger, or the petulance of her husband, dissuading him from thoughts of vengeance, anxious to see him kind, generous and inclined to pity. The charm which she exercised on contemporaries has survived, and even when one thinks, whether rightly or wrongly, that she has discovered flaws in her private life, one feels an attraction toward her. Whether alive or dead, good women deserve our love. That great quality, a woman's real ornament, kindness, would make us pardon many faults. Josephine wished to call forth no tears but those of joy and gratitude.

Josephine's Court.

Josephine was never more at her ease than in the society of friends of the royalist regime for with them she felt a harmony of ideas and hopes. She liked their manners, their language and even their prejudices. She was flattered by their respect and devotion, and felt herself habilitated in the eyes of good society by her sympathy with the adherents of the white flag. Thiers has said that she ought rather to have crushed them beneath the weight of her pride, but how could she have done that, when she shared their feelings, their grief, their sufferings, and but for the 9th Thermidor would have died on the guillotine?

By her childish and youthful memories Josephine was a royalist. In her mind all authority other than that of a king was, if not precisely usurpation, at any rate a perilous thing. Gen. Monk seemed to her greater than a Cromwell or even than a Cæsar. A stool would have pleased her better than a throne, because she thought a stool firm and a throne frail. The royalists knew Josephine's character, and they appealed in turn to her vanity, her feelings, her interest, and her imagination. They told her that by persuading her husband to restore the throne she would do a great deed, that she would be the protectress, the guardian angel, the heir of St. Louis; that the throne and the altar would owe her everything, that she would place on her head an undying aureole, a at Bonaparte would be the greatest of men. Bonaparte lent a ready ear to these persons, but Bonaparte laughed in his sleeve at the simple things who fancied that a man of his character could be contented with the second place.

* From The Wife of the First Consul. By Imbert de Saint-Amand. Translated from the French, by Thomas Sergeant Perry. The book is a sympathetic and discriminating biography of Josephine, the beloved, but deeply wronged wife of the Emperor Napoleon. Pp. 357. Price, $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

Her Memorial.

In the modest church of Rueil, on each side the altar, there stand, face to face, two funeral monuments which call forth a host of memories. The one to the right represents a man kneeling, in full dress, but with no royal insignia, and the simple inscription runs thus: "Josephine, Eugene and Hortense, 1825." The statue which is of Carrara marble, is the work of the sculptor Cartellier. In the foundation of the pedestal rests the body of the woman who was Empress of the French and Queen of Italy. Opposite, a group in white marble, work of the sculptor Barre, represents a man and an angel. The woman is kneeling, wears a regal diadem, and she is wrapped in the folds of a long veil. Her attitude is that of prayer, with her hands lowered towards the earth, and her eyes raised towards heaven. On the pedestal is cut this inscription: "To Queen Hortense, her son Napoleon III."

TEACHING TO PRAY.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

I. Lesson for June 8; Luke 11: 1-13; Golden Text Luke 11: 9.

Request of the Disciples—Welcome to the Lord—The Model Prayer—Unselfish—The Dearest Name—God First—The Daily Life Subject—We Will Completely Yielded—Mistaken Ideas of the Will of God—His Will in Children's Undulgence—The Day's Supply to be Asked For—The Childlike Confidence—A Prayer Often Ignored—Its Terrible Import to an Unforgiving Man—Power Under Temptation—The Overcoming Strength—Importunity Not Needed with a Father.

THE Gospel of St. Luke, written by a physician (Lk. 4: 14), who was probably well acquainted with natural law, is that which gives the most precious and detailed accounts of the Lord's work of healing, and also that which tells us of about the prayers of our Lord. The evangelist had been, by the redeeming blood of Christ, and by the Spirit of God, brought out of material and visible world, and "into the kingdom of the Son of His love" (Col. 1: 13, R. V.), to witness the power of God and the reality of prayer, and to testify that prayer is infinitely greater than all the powers of this world.

The disciples came to Jesus after one of His lessons of prayer with the request, "Lord, teach us to pray." It was a welcome request. "He said unto them, when ye pray, say,

Our Father."

There can be no real prayer until we know the Lord, and we stand on with God. Redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, He gives us the position of sons. A father's interests are bound up with those of his child; we belong to our Father, a heavenly Father, who has not only all His resources, but all heaven's at His command, and who knows what we have need of before we ask Him," and who, if we mistake in our petitions, and ask that which, in His love, He must refuse us, is just as ready to hear the request we make.

Our Father—not my Father. Selfish prayers are like rusty hinges, which creak, and cry, and are difficult to move. The more really we know God as a Father, and are drawn near to Him as children, the dearer all our brethren in Christ become to us, and it becomes a luxury to pray for them, and all the more for Christians who do not understand us, because they are children of our Father.

Hallowed be thy name. As long as we are selfish about our own name, easily pained at what anybody may say of us, hurt when we think we are not appreciated, on the lookout for what they may think to be neglect, eager to hear any word of praise from man—it is clear what name is the dearest to us—we are living still for our own name. Oh, how many lessons has God to teach us before, at last, we become ashamed of ourselves, and the praise becomes insupportable to us, which once we so looked for. It is when through outward sin we have brought shame on our own name, or when, through the teaching of the Holy Ghost, we have learned to know the plague of our own hearts, and we seek refuge in the blood of Christ, and a hiding-place from ourselves in Him, that our Father's name becomes so inexpressibly precious to us. The outcast has a home, the disgraced one a name, the broken-hearted one a shelter in that name of "Father." Let us hallow it, let us adore that He owns us as His children. But we cannot put on the name of our Father only when we pray; let it be hallowed all the day long, that, whatsoever we do in word, or deed, we may do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, through whom alone we can call God Father.

It is a wonderful check to our impulsive selfish life, that we are taught to pray first for that which concerns God, His name, His kingdom.

God First.

If our own requests pass through this sieve, they leave behind the sediment of the world, the flesh, and the devil, which might cling to them. Thy kingdom come. In measure as we come to know God, the desire becomes intensified in our hearts that His reign may increase in the world, souls be saved, and become subject to Him; that His rule of holiness and love shall gain the upper hand, that, in any business in which we are engaged, He shall rule, that in our family life He shall be the One considered above all. But in order that this may be so, there is an imperative need that all in our own hearts and lives should be completely subject to Him.

Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Many there are who look on God's will as something necessarily unpleasant, hard, and difficult; they speak of the will of God when death or sickness comes, when they meet with poverty or losses, etc., just as though God were always on the watch to make His children suffer. Oh, how little do we know of the real will of God! His will is "good, and acceptable, and perfect." (Rom. 12: 2.) Why should we be afraid of the will of Him who is love itself? We cannot desire for ourselves deeper spiritual blessings than it is God's will to give us, and if we will trust His will, instead of seeking our own, He will bless us in His own perfect way. If, in His service, we will trust His will, although everything may seem dark, and all may appear to be against us and to hinder the work, yet, He who loved immortal souls so much as to give His own Son to die for them, cannot love them less than we do, and what He permits in His work is always in the deepest love.

And give us this day our daily bread. The day's supply of all which it becomes a child to ask of a father, and a father to give a child; and this for spirit, soul, and body. We cannot live to-day on the provisions of yesterday. God wills to give us each day what we need for the day. As we advance, we become little children (Matt. 18: 3), and more dependent every moment, but more confiding every moment, too. He cannot fail to send the supply of strength, or money, or wisdom, for work which He has prepared that we should walk in. We may be sure if the supply ceases, God has something to say to us. We are not dependent, as the world is, on circumstances, on things, or people, we are redeemed from our vain conversation received by tradition from our fathers, by nothing less than the precious blood of Christ (1 Pet. 1: 18); let us maintain our liberty by the faith of the Son of God, and trust calmly for every need.

"And forgive us our sins, for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us." This is a prayer which many honest unconverted people dare not, and do not, pray, but which many dishonest converted people pray, without apprehending its tremendous significance. "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." (Matt. 7: 2.) If we forgive, and yet intend to treat one whom we forgive with reserve, we are entreating God to deal with us likewise; if we forgive, and intend, when we have the opportunity, to tell others of our brother's fault against us which we have forgiven, we are praying God not to forget, but to mention against us the sins He has forgiven us. Let us take heed how we pray. The unforgiving spirit of the unmerciful servant brought back on him all the debt which his Lord had forgiven him. (Matt. 18: 23-25.) Oh, how often has backsliding arisen from this cause! It is only as we see what we have been forgiven by the precious blood of Christ, that we can learn to forgive from the heart even those who least deserve it, even as we ourselves have been forgiven. "There is forgiveness with Thee,

That Thou Mayst Be Feared."

(Ps. 130: 4.) One of two things follows forgiveness, either a lightness of heart, glad to be rid of the burden, a selfish joy in being free, or, on the other hand, a deep consciousness of shame, of having wronged God, and of danger for the future, if not kept by Him. The former only leads to renewed misery, from the very fact that pardon came so easily; and the self life being uppermost, it rejoiced in its own deliverance for its own sake. The latter accepts forgiveness with a broken heart, and a deep sense of indebtedness to the precious Redeemer, and makes the occasion of falling and being forgiven an opportunity for laying the whole heart open to God's searching, that He may come in, and by His presence fortify the heart against the possibility of the recurrence of the same sin. In the former case, the forgiveness does not end in a cure; in the latter case, where self seeks nothing, and where the soul loves the holiness of God, He purifies as well as pardons. In Matt. 6: 12, it reads "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." How far have we unpaid debts against us in God's holy account? How much gratitude, how much love, how much service have we owed Him which is left forever unpaid as far as we are concerned? If we, on our part, find others failing in what we believe due to us; if they are ungrateful, if they return our love with coldness, if they betray our trust,—do we wish God's account with us to stand on exactly the same footing as our hearts' account with them? Let us be careful how we pray, or careful how we forgive.

"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," or, "the evil one." Whence is temptation to sin? "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man; but every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed" (Jas. 1: 13, 14.) There is also temptation, or, proving, which is a trial of our faith. "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience." (Jas. 1: 2, 3.) In both kinds of temptation, the evil one is at hand; in both we need deliverance from his power. Temptation to sin can only enter our hearts through our self-life, and it is only as our self-life is conquered by the cross of Jesus, where we see ourselves crucified with Him, brought to naught, and counted out, that we can be delivered.

For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. This is added in St. Matthew. We begin to pray for His name and His kingdom, we end in strengthening our hearts in faith, by recognizing in Him the king, in Him the power, and in Him the glory. As though yet more fully to set forth is our God, Jesus spoke a parable. A man goes to a friend at midnight to beg for provisions to help an unexpected visitor. His friend answers, "Trouble me not; the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee." And yet, at last, he is persuaded by continued importunity. But not so is our God. "I say unto you, ask and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." You will never hear from your Father the words, "Trouble me not; the door is now shut." He is a Father, and will not give a stone for bread. "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit (or, good things, Matt. 7: 11) to them that ask Him?"

How True a Father

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

IS RELIGION WEARING OUT?

WHAT a beautiful thing the religion of Jesus Christ is. Although so long ago it started out on the world, it seems as new to us as though last night it were born in the manger, Religion, instead of wearing out is wearing in, and the world which once rejected it now begins to receive it, and all around the earth is heard the song of hosanna and congratulation. Look at the old Bible, composed under divine inspiration so long ago by the prophet, and the evangelist, and the apostle. If any other book in all the world had been half as much read as that book, it would have become a worn-out story, and been cast from the regard of men. No other book that the world has ever seen could endure so much reading and study without becoming stale and insipid, and positively disgusting. Yet after the studying of this book by the learned men of all ages, and after you have read it in the morning hour and in the evening hour, for years and scores of years, and heard its truths preached Sabbath after Sabbath, and its passages quoted day after day, not only in religious books but in secular literature, it is as fresh and fair and beautiful as though this morning Ezekiel wrote his prophecies; and Luke inscribed the Acts of the Apostles, and Paul penned his Epistle to Timothy. The promises new. The miracles new. The parables new. The historical portions of the Bible new. Nothing that came last week from any of our great publishing houses so full of vivacity and freshness as this same old book. Never were there so many people studying it as there are studying it to-day. Never did it pour so much comfort and light and hope and peace upon the nations as it is pouring to-day. A lantern for every dark path. A lighthouse for every dangerous port. A soft pillow for every dying head. Then look at the mercy seat. Abraham knelt there. Noah knelt there. Daniel knelt there. Isaiah knelt there. John knelt there. Peter knelt there. Paul knelt there. All the redeemed of earth have knelt there. And yet we come now and find it an attractive place. While the angels of God have looked down from age to age upon it, and there has been no cessation to the supplication that has been going up from dungeons, from ship decks, from Christian homes, from all lands, and from all ages, still it is a fresh and fair and attractive and beautiful mercy seat. So it is with the Lord Jesus Christ. He is an aged Christ. The Bible represents Him as such when it says "His hair is white like snow." And yet how attractive He is to our souls. We greet Him in our homes. We hail Him into our religious assemblages. Honored on earth and praised in heaven. Light for all darkness. Bread for all hunger. Harbor for all storm. Life for all death. Then the whole subject of heaven is old. You have been singing about it all your days, and talking about it, and praying about it, and hearing the subject discussed; and yet, that theme has as much rapture for your soul as when, at your mother's knee, you first heard there was any such place as heaven. Though "a great multitude that no man can number" have been standing around about the throne of God, and hallelujahs have been going up through all the ages, you are yourself anticipating with great rapture of soul, entrance upon that blessed rest; and the story, instead of becoming a worn-out and insipid story, becomes more and more thrilling by so much as you have trials and hardships and persecutions and temptations and sins. You sometimes say, "Oh, that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away and be at rest." Oh, land of light, land of love, land of joy, land of reunion—who can describe it? Fountains that never fail. Trees of life that never wither. Sabbaths that never end. We congratulate you that you have such a fresh religion, and while you possess it yourselves, commend it to all the people. There are those who have not tasted one of its joys, nor wept one of its sorrows, nor felt the inspiration of one of its promises. Let us pray God that the religion of Jesus Christ may be made so glowingly attractive to all the world, that men will step immediately into the kingdom of God, grounding the hostilities of their soul, and receiving Christ as their pardon and peace and life and joy and rapture and heaven.

THE BLESSING TO COME.

WHAT reader of this paper does not know that in all the prayer-meetings throughout this land, in all the churches, the cry has gone up, "Oh, Lord revive Thy work!" It was so in 1837, in 1847, in 1849, in 1850, and in 1855—the Christian Church implored the throne of mercy, and sceptics scoffed and said, "Aha! aha! where is your God now? He never answers prayer." But a great cloud came on the sky and there was a Pentecostal refreshment reaching all over this land in 1857. "But," you say, "even in 1857, in this land, and in 1875, in Great Britain, all the prayers are not answered." Not half of them were answered, not a fourth of them were answered. If they had been, instead of thousands and tens of thousands being brought into the kingdom of Christ there would be millions, and all the people of this land, and of Christendom, and of the whole earth, would march in solid column into the kingdom of Christ. So it seems in this great sunburst of divine blessing, God does not fully answer the prayers of His people. We go farther on and say that there will be a great garner day. Nations will be born into the kingdom of God within twenty-four hours. The submarine telegraph will flash the tidings under the ocean: "China born unto God, India save Greenland redeemed. The whole earth baptized by God's gracious spirit." And God in that will look over the whole catalogue of prayer. He will call up and count every supplication that has been made on earth since the Garden of Eden was spread out, fair and beautiful. I will look at all the petitions, all the sighs of repentance, all the implorations for mercy, all the cries for the redemption of the kingdoms, and looking over them, He will answer every one of them. We were riding along the road, and saw what they call the sun drawing water—a fair light against the sky, and the farmers all said, "We shall have falling weather." The next day the rain came in torrents. We only anticipated it by the light on the sky. And so it seems to us as if we saw a light on the sky now, a light promising a glorious shower, yea, a deluge of mercy. That is what we want. The world has had one deluge; but that was for its destruction. Now we want another deluge—a deluge of salvation.

CHIROGRAPHY.

THE attempt has been made to reduce handwriting to a science. Many persons have been busy in gathering the signatures of celebrated men and women. A Scotchman, by the name of Watson, paid seventy-five thousand dollars for rare autographs. After we read an interesting book we want to see the author's face at his autograph. But there is almost always a surprise or a disappointment felt, when for the first time we come upon the hand-writing of persons of whom we have heard or read much. We often find that the bold, dashing nature sometimes wields a trembling pen, and that some man, eminent for weakness, has a defiant penmanship that looks as if he wrote with a splitter of thunderbolt. We admit that there are instances in which the character of the man decides the style of his penmanship. Lord Byron's autograph, was as reckless as its author. George Washington's signature was a reflection of his dignity. The hand-writing of Samuel Rogers was as smooth as his own nature. Robespierre's fierce looking autograph seemed to have been written with the dagger of the French Revolution. On the contrary, one hand-writing is often the antipodes of his character. An unreasonable school-master, has often, by false instruction, cramped or ruined the pupil's chirography forever. If people only knew how a brutal pedagogue in the Somerville Academy used to pull the ears of the author of this article, while learning to write, we should not be so often censured for our own miserable scribble. We defy any boy to learn successfully to make "hooks and trammels" in his copy book, or ever after learn to trace a graceful calligraphy if he had "old Taylor" bawling over him. As the memory of that instructor comes over us, our pen shudders along the line, till it will take the best printer in the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to decipher the hieroglyphics. We hope never to meet that man this side of heaven, lest our memory of the long-ago past be too much for our sense of ministerial propriety. There are great varieties of circumstances that influence and decide the autograph. We have no faith in the science of chirography. We could, from a pack of letters in one pigeon-hole, put to route the whole theory.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Prospect of Serious International Complications is opened by the instructions given last week to the commander of the vessel charged with the duty of protecting the seal fisheries in the Bering Sea. He is directed, not only to seize ships found fishing in violation of the claims of the United States, but to dismantle them and confiscate their cargoes. Now, the Canadian fishing fleet has gone to Behring Sea under the impression that the United States have no jurisdiction over the sea, outside of the usual three-mile limit from the shores. Mr. Blaine has practically admitted this fact, and it was understood the negotiations with the English Government were proceeding upon that basis. These objections to the captain of the cruiser are before somewhat of a surprise, and as the Canadian fleet does not know of them, there may be serious resistance and serious complications.

Decision Momentous to Mormonism Was rendered on May 19th by the Supreme Court of the United States. It involves the sum of $750,000 now held by the Mormon Church, but which forfeited to the United States under the antitrust law. When the law was passed dissolving the corporation of "the Church of Latter-day Saints," annulling its charter, and escheating the property in excess of $50,000 which would for purposes other than worship or religion, the Mormons brought a suit to test the constitutionality of the law. In the Supreme Court of Utah the decision was against them, but now the highest tribunal in the land confirms the decision. The main plea of the church was that the Church existed by virtue of a compact which constituted a contract between the Church and the Legislative Assembly of Utah, and such an enactment could not be repealed by Congress. The Court holds that Congress has the right to repeal any Territorial enactment, and that, as in this case the enactment had established a religion, it was a fit one to be repealed. Moreover, that, as the funds devoted to escheated were being used to propagate Mormonism in defiance of law, Congress had the right to seize them. Chief Justice Fuller and Justices Field and Lamar dissented but they were a minority of the Court.

Serious Difficulty has Developed on the Argument of the Prohibition trouble on the "final package" question. By the recent decision of the Supreme Court no State has the right to prevent intoxicating liquor being sent into its borders, and sold in the original package in defiance of the Prohibition law. A bill has been introduced into the United States giving such power to the States. Now, it is claimed that Congress has no constitutional authority to delegate that power to the States. It was proposed last week to solve the problem by repealing intoxicating liquor from the operation of the Interstate Commerce Act which has caused all the trouble. That proposition was, however, negatived as being unstatesmanlike and illogical. Mr. Edmunds remarked upon it as a very curious and interesting circumstance that the condition of things had been reached, according to the debate and according to the judgment of the Supreme Court, the States had no power to deal with the subject and Congress had no power to deal with it, and that the States could not stop it unless Congress gave that power. It was only necessary to state that proposition to show that some where, there was a fault in the logic of some body. The present situation is so ridiculous and absurd that it must be amended in some way. Perhaps the Senators might get some advice from the Supreme Court.

Value of the Work Being Done in the Education of the neglected races at Hampton Institute, Va., was again demonstrated last week on the twenty-second anniversary of that institution. A class of forty-four was graduated, of whom seventeen were girls and two were Indians. A Sioux young man from Dakota, and an African girl from Nebraska. Both had something to say on the stage, and appeared to be excellent specimens of the good, live Indian.

An interesting feature of the exercises was the appearance of representatives of eight races now among the students. These were the Afro-American, Indian-American, Afro-Cuban, native African, Armenian, Chinese, Japanese and Hawaiian. A student of each race, attired in appropriate costume, recited a few words in his native tongue and the translation in English. The valedictorian earnestly urged the colored race to stay in a land of civilization and education as the best solution of the race problem. The exhibits included industrial work done in the fifteen different workshops and on the farm, and proved that both Indians and negroes can work well at all the mechanical trades and in agriculture.

The English Conservative Government is charged with Socialistic tendencies. The charge, too, is brought by a Conservative peer, who must be supposed to know whereof he speaks. Yet the blending of conservatism and socialism is like the mixing of fire and water. This is the charge as it was stated in the House of Lords on May 20th by the Earl of March. He said that the government was given to meddling with affairs that ought to be left to private initiative, like workmen's houses, the payment of wages, and the feeding and education of the poor. It was especially inclined to predatory objects, and fostered projects to abolish leaseholds and deprive landlords of their ground rents. They even proposed to take by compulsion, without compensation, property belonging to city guilds, in order to apply it to what they called industrial schemes. Serious legislative bodies ought to look where Socialism was leading. It was not land alone, but every kind of property that was threatened. Freedom of contract and freedom of private enterprise were assailed. The Earl of March is partly right. That is the present tendency, and it has become necessary in the interest of justice. Men are demanding that property unfairly and unjustly acquired shall be surrendered, and the government is disposed to enforce the demand.

Serious Resentment and Much Irritation has been produced in Russia by the speech which the Emperor of Germany made recently at Königsberg. The Emperor said: "I shall not allow my provinces here in the East to be touched. Those attacking them will find that my strength is as that of a rock." As Russia is the only possible frontier assailant of East Prussia, his words are interpreted in St. Petersburg, as aimed against Russia. The Russian newspapers speak of them as an open and unprovoked threat; and protest against the Emperor being treated as a friend of Russia on his approaching visit. In Berlin, some newspapers deplore, in guarded words, the Emperor's utterances, and Prince Bismarck is reported as saying: "The Emperor is like a young hound that barks at everybody, that smells everything, that touches everything, and that ends by causing complete disorder in the room in which he is, no matter how large it may be." This is scarcely respectful language for the ex-chancellor to use about his sovereign, but Bismarck is noted for plain speaking.

The Old Dispute Between France and England on the financial questions of Egypt has at last been arranged. The French Government has given its approval to the proposed scheme of consolidating the various loans which the present and former Khedive negotiated for public improvements, and, incidentally, for the erection of magnificent palaces. These loans will now become the Egyptian public debt, and the bonds on which high interest has been so long paid will be liquidated, either in money obtained by new bonds, or by shares in the public debt. It is difficult to understand why France has so long resisted a project so clearly beneficial to Egypt. The effect of her resistance was so fully realized in Egypt that the merchants and public men referred to the interest on the loans as "the French tax" and the popularity of France in Egypt suffered in consequence. There is still considerable jealousy on the part of the French against the English occupation of the country, but as France would not interfere herself when Egypt was suffering under the mal-administration of Arabi Pasha, and would take no part in the English campaign, her present attitude seems unreasonable.

The Project of Federating the British Empire has gained an illustrious supporter, and an influential one, in the Earl of Rosebery. In a speech delivered on May 22d he referred to the Bering Sea troubles, and the encroachments of the French in Newfoundland, as giving prominence to the question of the relation of the different parts of the empire to the foreign policy of the government. Many in Canada and Newfoundland, he said, must feel aggrieved that matters of importance are being treated without special representation of the localities most deeply interested. Under a good scheme of imperial federation that anomaly would be remedied. He wanted to base the empire on the co-operative principle. Each day saw the approach of better, more regular, and permanent relations between the parts of the empire, tending to an ultimate realization of the national unity.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Southern Presbyterian General Assembly, in session at Asheville, N. C., has elected as moderator the Rev. James Park, D. D., of Knoxville, Tenn.

Rev. Egerton R. Young, the famous Canadian Missionary, returns to his labors in the North-west, early next month, after a year spent in enlisting English sympathy and aid in his great work.

The number of ministers trained in Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Pastor's College, and sent out to labor in the ministry, has now reached 828. Of these 673 are still living and preaching in various parts of the world.

A new International Sunday-school Lesson Committee is to be elected by the International Convention which meets at Pittsburg, Pa., June 24-27. Plans will also be discussed for more complete co-operation in Sunday-school work throughout the world.

The United Societies of Christian Endeavor, of Brooklyn, held their first annual convention in the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, on May 15. Mr. G. C. Stebbins had charge of the musical exercises, and Margaret E. Sangster led in the devotional part.

Dr. W. S. Rainsford, the earnest and zealous rector of St. George's Church, New York, is laid aside by sickness. His physicians have insisted on his taking an extended period of rest. During his absence, his assistant pastor, Dr. Henry Wilson, will have charge of the church services.

Dr. George F. Pentecost arrived in New York on Thursday, last, from England, to prepare for his campaign in India, on which he enters in the Fall. His services in England and Scotland have been wonderfully blessed, and the Christian public there are not likely soon to forget them.

Dr. L. W. Munhall commenced work at Joliet, Ill., on May 15. The News of that town says that he "had a royal reception on his first appearance. The Central Presbyterian Church was filled from doors to pulpit, and the audience listened with rapt attention to one of the most eloquent addresses ever delivered in the city."

The meetings held by Rev. B. Fay Mills, at Newark, N. J., have led to a general revival of religion in that city. The number of cards sent to the pastors by persons declaring their resolve, in Christ's strength, to lead Christian lives in future, is over three thousand. All the churches in the city have received large accession to their membership.

The American Home Missionary Society holds its sixty-fourth annual meeting on Tuesday, next, at Saratoga, N. Y. Among the clergymen who have promised to attend and take part in the proceedings, are: Revs. S. H. Virgin, D. D., of New York; Rev. Charles H. Richards, D. D., of Philadelphia; and John K. McLean, D. D., of Oakland, Cal.

A girl named Helen Keller, who is blind, deaf, and dumb, was placed in the South Boston Blind Asylum, about two years ago. She showed great intelligence, and made remarkable progress. Six weeks ago she was placed under the charge of Miss Fuller, of the Horace Mann School, and she is now able to speak intelligibly, and uses a vocabulary of three thousand words.

A great revival is going on at the Seventeenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, between First and Second Avenues, New York. It is conducted by Rev. H. R. Keates and Mr. James H. Cannon. The altar is thronged nightly, and sinners are converted and believers sanctified at every meeting. The attendance is constantly on the increase, and although the revival is now in its fifth week, there are no signs of waning interest. Next Sunday the revivalists now in charge will be reinforced by Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Telford, who are coming on from Mr. Moody's Tabernacle in Chicago, for the purpose of aiding in this grand work.

THE ASCENSION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them." Psa. 68: 18.

The Previous Dark Descent—The Homeward Journey—Commenced at the Sepulchre—Continued from Olivet—I. His Triumph Manifested—His Work Finished—His Ascension Representative—His People to be Caught Up—II. His People's Foes Defeated—Themselves Delivered—Their Bonds Broken—III. His Ascension Celebrated by Gifts—The Holy Spirit the Chief—Embodied in Men—For Men—IV. Special Gifts for a Special Class—The Rebellious to Receive—V. The Consummation of the Whole Work.

THE hill of Zion had been taken out of the hand of the Jebusites. They had held it long after the rest of the country had been subdued; but David at last had taken it from them. This was the mountain ordained of Jehovah of old to be the place of the Temple. David, therefore, with songs and shouts of rejoicing, brought up the ark from the abode of Obededom to the place where it should remain. That is the literal fact upon which the figure of the text is based. We are at no loss for the spiritual interpretation, for we turn to Eph. 4: 8, where, quoting rather the sense of the passage than the exact words, Paul says, "When He ascended up on high, He led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men."

The Dark Descent.

Our Saviour descended, when He came to the manger of Bethlehem, a babe; and further descended, when He became "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He descended lower still, when He was "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross;" and further yet, when His dead body was laid in the grave. Well saith our apostle, "Now that He ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?" Long and dark was the descent; there were no depths of humiliation, temptation, and affliction, which He did not fathom. Seeing He stood in their place and stead, He went as low as justice required that sinners should go who had dared to violate the law of God. The utmost abyss of desertion heard Him cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Low in the grave He lay; but He had His face upward, for He could not see corruption.

On the third day He quitted the couch of the dead, and rose to the light of the living. He had commenced His glorious ascent. To prove how real was His resurrection, He stayed on earth some forty days, and showed Himself to many witnesses. Magdalene and James saw Him alone; the eleven beheld Him in their midst; the two on the road conversed with Him; five hundred brethren at once beheld Him. He gave infallible proofs that He was really risen from the dead, and these remain with us unto this day as historic facts. This being settled beyond question, the time came for our Lord to continue His homeward, upward journey, and return unto the glory from which He had come down. From "the mount called Olivet," while His disciples surrounded Him, "He was taken up; and a cloud received Him out of their sight." The rest of His upward progress we cannot describe. Imagination and faith step in, and conceive of Him as rising beyond all regions known to us, far above all imaginable height.

How high He ascended after He passed the pearly portal, Paul cannot tell us, save that he says, "He ascended up far above all heavens," and describes Him as "set at God's right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion;" and as "dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto." The man Christ Jesus has gone back to the place from whence His Godhead came. Thou art the King of glory, O Christ! Thou art the eternal Son of the Father! Thou sittest ever in the highest heaven, enthroned with all glory, clothed with all power, King of kings and Lord of lords. Unto thy name we humbly present our hallelujahs, both now and for ever,

I. Now, concerning the text itself, which speaks of the ascent of our ever blessed Lord, we shall first speak of

Our Lord's Triumph.

He came here to fight the foes of God and man. It was a tremendous battle, not against flesh and blood, but against spiritual wickednesses and evil powers. Our Lord fought against sin, and death, and hell, and hate of God, and love of falsehood. He came to earth to be our champion. For you and for me, beloved, He entered the lists, and wrestled till He sweat great drops of blood; yea, "He poured out His soul unto death." When He had ended the struggle, He declared His victory by ascending to the Father's throne.

Now, our Lord's work was done. We are sure that the purpose of His love is secure, or He would not have returned to His rest. I do not believe in an atonement which is admirably wide but fatally ineffectual. I rejoice to hear my Lord say, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." "It is finished" is a description of every item of the divine labor; and, therefore, has He ascended on high. There are no dropped stitches in the robe of Christ. The love that brought our Lord here would have kept Him here, if He had not been absolutely sure that all His work and warfare for our salvation had been accomplished to the full.

Further, as we see here the ending of our Lord's descent and the accomplishment of His work, remember, that His ascent to the Father is representative. Every believer rose with Him, and grasped the inheritance. When He uprose, ascending high, He taught our feet the way. At the last together with the Lord in the air, and so shall they be for ever with the Lord." He has made a stairway for His saints to climb to their felicity, and He has trodden it Himself to assure us that the new and living way is available for us. In His ascension He bore all His people with him. Though you have no other means of getting to glory but faith in Jesus, that way will bring you there without fail. Not only will He not be in glory and leave us behind, but He cannot be so, since we are one with Him; and where He is His people must be.

"His People Shall be Caught Up"

Let us rejoice in the ascent of Christ as being the ensign of His victory, and the symbol thereof. He has accomplished His work. If thou hadst not led captivity captive, O Christ, thou hadst never ascended on high; and if thou hadst not won gifts of salvation for the sins of men, thou hadst been here still suffering! Thou wouldst never have relinquished thy chosen task if thou hadst not perfected it. Thou art so set on the salvation of men, that for the joy that was set before thee, thou didst endure the cross, despising the shame; and we know that all must have been achieved, or thou wouldst still be working out thy gracious enterprise. The voice of the ascension is—Consummatum est: "It is finished."

II. Having led your thoughts that way, I would, secondly, remind you that the Lord's triumphal ascent demonstrated

The Defeat of All Our Foes.

"Thou hadst led captivity captive" is as certain as "Thou hast ascended on high." Brethren, we were captives once—captives to tyrants, who wrought us woe, and would soon have wrought us death. We were captives to sin, captives to Satan, and therefore captives under spiritual death. We were captives under divers lusts and imaginations of our own hearts; captives to error, captives to deceit. But the Lord Jesus Christ has led captivity captive. There is our comfort. Yet, forget not that we were hopeless captives to all these: they were too strong for us, and we could not escape from their cruel bondage.

The Lord Jesus, by His glorious victory here below, has subdued all our adversaries, and in His going up on high He has triumphed over them all, exhibiting them as trophies. The imagery may be illustrated by the triumph of Roman conquerors. They were wont to pass along the Via Sacra, and climb up to the Capitol, dragging at their chariot-wheels the vanquished princes with their hands bound behind their backs. All those powers which held you tight have been vanquished by Christ. We ever form your spiritual slavery took, you clean delivered from it; for the Lord Christ has made captives those whose captives were. "Sin shall not have dominion over you."

Death also is overcome, and his sting is taken away. Death is no more the king of darkness. Whatever there was or is, which can oppress our soul, and hold it in bondage, the Lord Jesus has subdued and made it captive to Himself.

Remember, again, that the victory of our Lord Christ is the victory of all who are in Him. Looking at the great battle now raging in the world, I gaze with joyful confidence. We are fighting now with Popery, with Mahomedanism, with idolatry in the foulest forms; but the battle is in effect won. We are struggling with the terrible infidelity which has fixed itself a cancer upon the Church of God, and our souls sink as we survey the horrors of this almost continuous war. How often we groan because the battle does not go as we would desire it! Yet there is no reason for dismay. God is in no hurry as we are. He dwells in the leisure of eternity, and is not the prey of fear, as we are, brethren, by those bleeding hands and feet which have secured the struggle. By that side opening down to His heart, we feel that His heart is fighting in our cause. Specially, by His resurrection, and by His climbing to the throne of God, He has made the victory of His truth, the victory of His church, the victory of Himself most certain and certain.

III. Let us notice, thirdly, that our Lord's triumphant ascension was Celebrated by Gifts.

The custom of bestowing gifts after victory was practised among the Easterns, according to the song of Deborah. Those to whom a triumph was decreed in old Rome, scattered money among the populace. Sometimes it seemed as if every man in the city was made rich by share of the spoils of vanquished princes. Thus our Lord, when He ascended on high, received gifts for men, and scattered largess all around.

What are these great ascension gifts? The answer, that the sum of them is the Holy Spirit. This is the great largess of Christ's ascension, which He bestowed on His church at Pentecost. Beloved, the gifts here spoken of are those brought by the Holy Spirit. "The water that shall give him," said Christ, "shall be in him well of water springing up into everlasting life." He said again, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." We read that He "spoke of the Spirit, which they that believed on Him should receive." "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" To conquer the world for Christ we need nothing but the Holy Spirit, and in the hour of His personal victory He secured us this boon. If the Holy Spirit be but given, we have in Him all the weapons of our holy war.

But observe, according to Paul, these gifts which our Lord gave are embodied in men; the Holy Spirit comes upon men whom He has chosen, and works through them according to His good pleasure. Hence, He gave some apostles, some, evangelists, and some, pastors and teachers. No one may be judged to be given of God to the Church in any of the offices unless as the Spirit dwells upon him. All are given of God upon whom the Holy Spirit rests, whatever their office may be. It is ours to accept with great joy the men who are chosen and anointed to speak in the name of the Lord; be they what they may.

These gifts, given in the form of men, are given for men. Churches do not exist for preachers; but preachers for churches. We have, sometimes, feared that certain brethren thought that the assemblies of believers were formed to provide situations for clerical persons; but, indeed, it is not so. My brethren church, we who are your pastors, are your nts for Christ's sake. Our rule is not that dship, but of love. Every God-sent min-if he discharges his duty aright, waits

the bride of Christ with loving diligence, elights greatly to hear the Bridegroom's

I wish that you who talk of my Lord's nts as if they were rival performers would thus to profane the gifts of the ascended

The very abilities of those by whom the builds up His Church are all arranged by e wisdom, and it should be ours to make ost we can of them. Comparing and con-ing the Lord's gifts is unprofitable work.
all God's servants as you are able to profit em. Hear them prayerfully, not for the gence of your curiosity, nor for the pleasure of your ear with rhetoric, but that you, gh the Word of God, may feel His Spirit
ing in our hearts the purpose of His will.

I want the attention of all who are uncon-d, for I have glorious tidings for them. To I speak under my fourth head: our Lord's ph has a very special bearing. "Thou received

Gifts for Men,"

or angels, not for devils, but for men—fallen men. I read not that it is said, "for ps or ministers," but "for men;" and yet, is a special character mentioned. Does xt particularly mention "saints," or those ave not defiled their garments? No, I do ad of them here. "Yea, for the rebellious

I must pause to brush my tears away.
e are you, ye rebels? Where are those who lived in rebellion against God all their

Alas! you have been in open revolt st Him; you have raged against Him in earts, and spoken against Him with your
es. Some have sinned as drunkards, s have broken the laws of purity, truth,
ty. Many rebel against the light, violate ience, and disobey the Word—these also mong the rebellious. So are the proud, the ful, the slothful, the profane, the unbelieve unjust. Hear, all of you, these words, arry them home; and if they do not break earts with tender gratitude, you are hard
l. "Yea, for the rebellious also."

a description includes those who have re-against God, though once they professed to e loyal subjects. Perhaps I am addressing who have so far backslidden that they hrown up all religion and have gone back e world and its sins; these are apostates the profession which once they made. To
I would give

A Word of Encouragement,

I will turn to the Lord. Once upon a time, Bunyan was under great temptation from evil. This trial he records in his Grace ding. He thought that God had given p, and that he was cast away for ever; and found hope in this text. I have copied little bit which refers to it: "I feared also his was the mark that the Lord did set on even continual fear and trembling under avy load of guilt that He had charged upon or the blood of his brother Abel. Then wind and twine and shrink under the n that was upon me, which burden did o oppress me that I could neither stand, o, nor lie, either at rest or quiet. Yet that would sometimes come into my mind, ath received gifts for the rebellious. Reus," thought I, why surely they are such as were under subjection to their Prince, even who, after they have sworn subjection to overnment, have taken up arms against and this, thought I, is my very condition.
I loved Him, feared Him; served Him; but am a rebel and I have sold Him. I said, let go if He will, but yet He has gifts for s; and then why not for me?"

that I could cause every despairing to reason in this way! Oh, that the Holy would put this argument into every trou-mind at this moment: "And then why not ef." Come home, dear brother, come home, ere are gifts for the rebellious; and why not for you? Would God that all my brothers and sisters would be cheered by this dear word, and take it home to themselves with a believing repentance and a holy hatred of sin! I would print the words in stars across the brow of night. "Yea, for the rebellious also."

V. I have done when I have handled the fifth point, which is this: Our Lord's triumphant ascension secures

The Consummation of His Whole Work.

What doth it say? "That the Lord God might dwell among them." When our Lord Christ came here at the first he was willing enough to "dwell" among us; but it could not be. "The word was made flesh and tabernacled among us," like a Bedouin in his tent, but not as a dweller at home. He could not "dwell" here on that occasion. He was but a visitor, and badly treated at that. "There was no room for Him in the inn," where everybody else was freely welcome. "He came unto his own"—surely they will lodge Him, "but His own received Him not."
There was no room for Him in the temple—
there He had to use the scourge. There was no room for him in the open streets, for they took up stones to stone Him. Out of the synagogue they hurried Him, to cast Him down headlong from the brow of the hill. "Away with Him!
Away with Him!" was the cry of the ribald crowd. This dear visitor, who came here all unarmed, without sword or bow, they treated as though He had been a spy or an assassin, who had stolen among them to do them ill. And so they ran upon Him with a spear, and He, quitting these inhospitable realms which knew Him not, took home with him the marks of man's discourtesy. Oh, earth, earth, how couldst thou drive away the dearest friend, and compel Him to be a wayfaring man, that tarrieth but for a night! nay, worse, as a man astonished, who meets with wounding in the house of his friends?

A Dwelling for God.

After He had risen again, He went home that from this throne He might direct a work by which earth should become a place where God could abide. Again is the temple of God to be with men and he shall dwell among them. This promise is partly fulfilled before your own eyes
this day; for the Holy Spirit came at Pentecost, and He has never returned. Jesus said, "He shall abide with you for ever." The Holy Dove has often been greatly grieved, but He has never spread His wings to depart. This is still the dispensation of the Spirit. You hardly need to pray to have the Spirit poured out, for that has been done. Ever since the ascension, the Holy Ghost has remained among men, though
He has not been, at all seasons, equally active.
All through the night of Romanism, and the Schoolmen, he still tarried; there were humble hearts which rejoiced to be His temples even in those doleful days. To-day He is still with His regenerated ones. In spite of impudent strivings against the divine inspiration of His Holy Scripture, and, notwithstanding the follies of ecclesiastical amusements, He is with his chosen.

But there cometh a day when this shall be carried out to the letter. Methinks I hear the angels say, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." Now, "in like manner" must mean in person. In person our Lord was taken up,

In Person He Will Come Again;

and when He cometh, the Lord God will, indeed, dwell among us. Oh, that the day would come!
We wait and watch for His glorious appearing;
for then will He dwell among men in a perfect fashion. What happy days shall we have when Jesus is here! What a millennium His presence will bring; there can be no such auspicious era without it, any more than there can be summer without the sun. He must come first, and then will the golden age begin. The central glory of that period shall be that the Lord is here.
"The Lord God shall dwell among them."

Even now his angels come and go in heavenly traffic. Soon the little boat of this globe shall be drawn nearer to the great ship, and earth shall lie alongside heaven. Then shall men praise God day and night in his temple. Heaven shall find her choristers among the ransomed from among men. The whole world shall be as a censer filled with incense for the Lord of Hosts. All this will be because of those gifts received and bestowed by our Lord Jesus in the day when He returned to His glory, leading captivity captive. O Lord, hasten thy coming!

We are sure that thine abiding presence and glorious reign will come in due season. Thy coming down secured thy going up: thy going up secures thy coming down again. Wherefore, we bless and magnify thee, O ascended Lord,
with all our hearts, and rise after thee as thou dost draw us upward from grovelling things.
So be it! Amen.

A SEAMAN'S SIGHT RESTORED.

ONE of the most remarkable cases of Divine Healing on record is described by Mrs. M. Baxter, in her magazine, Thy Healer. It is confirmed by men who have seen the man and heard his story. His name is W. H. Wyatt, and he is mate of the schooner Advance. He was formerly a very dissipated man. People living in the ports between which his schooner traded have frequently seen him reeling about the streets in a state of intoxication. One day he was induced to visit a sailors' mission, where he was converted. His understanding, his disposition, and his faith, were most childlike in character. He was troubled by no doubts, but accepted literally the promises of the Word. Shortly after his conversion he suffered from an affection of the eyes. He had consulted two physicians and one surgeon and they prescribed for him, but after a time admitted that they could do no more for him, and gave him no hope of ever seeing again with one eye. He was then led to think how Jesus healed the blind man, making clay and anointing his eyes; and that Jesus was the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and could do the same for him. He says: "On Sunday I was in great agony and sent a man down to the dock for some clay. When he brought it, I spread it on the cabin table, then knelt down and asked God to send His blessing upon it. I then applied the clay; I felt relieved at once, and the improvement continued, until the next Sunday I could see with it to pick up a pin, and it is still going on better and better every day. Jesus said, Have faith in God."

A MISSIONARY'S COSTUME.

At a recent meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society in London, one of the speakers announced in the programme was the Rev. J. T.
Turner, the famous Missionary in China, who has returned to his own country for a brief period of rest. As Mr. Turner is well known to the Christian public there, a large number of persons were attracted to the meeting by the promise of his presence. They were disappointed however on their arrival at not recognizing him among him among the speakers, on the platform. All the other speakers on the programme were present, and with them a Chinese gentleman; but Mr. Turner could not be seen. When however, the chairman had introduced several speakers who addressed the meeting, he called on Mr. Turner. Then the Chinese gentleman stepped forward, and there was a roar of applause from the persons nearest the platform, who recognized in the queer habiliments and shaven head, with pending queue the eminent missionary. He said:

"It is in no spirit of mere idle buffoonery that I venture to appear before you in Chinese costume, but because I thought that you would like to have before your minds a vivid picture of how the men appear for whom you are asked to pray. We wear this dress; but why do we wear it? It is not because it is more comfortable or less expensive, or more handsome than the English dress, but because we find it a help in our work. We should find in many places that it would be simply impossible to stand up and preach the Gospel quietly in the crowded market-places and the busy streets, if we appeared before the people in English dress. We want to take the Gospel to all classes, and if we went to a Chinese gentleman's house in English costume, very likely we should not be allowed in at all. The doorkeeper would see us coming with a great crowd of ragged boys and curious people behind us. Before we were able to get inside the doors, he would tell his master that we were coming, and the order would be given to shut the doors and we should be shut out. But when we want to go and see a Chinese gentleman, I send my servant with my card case—the speaker here exhibited, amid much laughter, a portfolio about twelve inches square—and I present my card—exhibiting, amidst much laughter, a strip of pink paper apparently about nine inches wide—the master will say, 'Well, what is he like?' 'Oh, he is quite proper—just the same as us.' 'Well, let him in.' And after the usual shaking of hands and salutations and a cup of tea I can sit down and tell the man for the first time in his life about the Saviour, who loved him and died for his sins. Dear friends, I would wear any dress that would help me to win souls for Jesus Christ."

The Statue of Gen. Robert E. Lee.

The Statue and Pedestal.

MR. STANLEY'S FUTURE BRIDE.

(See Portrait.)

THE announcement is made in a cable dispatch that Mr. H. M. Stanley, who was supposed to be an inveterate bachelor, is shortly to be married. The lady to whom he is engaged is Miss Dorothy Tennant, a niece of Sir Charles Tennant, of England. She is a well-known artist, and is about thirty years of age. There has been no difficulty in obtaining her portrait, as the most distinguished artists of the day, Millais and Watts, have made pictures of her which have been hung in the Royal Academy exhibitions. Her own pictures have also appeared there, the most recent being a painting of a group of street Arabs which was highly praised by the critics. It is stated that the originals of the picture are London outcasts whom Miss Tennant has not only painted but befriended, having them to her mother's house and teaching them every day for some time past. An artist, now residing in Detroit, Mich., was a classmate of Miss Tennant's in England and knew her well. He describes her as a most charming girl, tall and stately, with beautiful, large eyes. Her determination in overcoming the difficulties of her work was remarkable, contrasting forcibly with the light, frivolous manner, in which the other girls in the studio pursued their studies.

The Late Mr. W. E. Shipton. (See page 341.)

One journal which professes to have authoritative information says, that Mr. Stanley made his proposal before setting out on his recent expedition, but the answer he received was not altogether favorable. On his return, however, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who is one of Miss Tennant's respected friends, met the explorer and carried him off to her house. On the way she intimated to him that if he renewed his offer he might be more successful. Stanley found Miss Tennant at the house of the baroness and this time succeeded in gaining the beauty's consent. Other versions of the story are given by other journals, but there appears to be no doubt that whatever the preliminaries may have been, Mr. Stanley and Miss Tennant are now engaged.

THE GEN. LEE STATUE.

(See Illustrations.)

AN interesting scene was witnessed at Richmond, Va., on May 7, when the equestrian statue of Gen. Robert E. Lee arrived at the depot. The various parts of the statue, which were put together this week were then in boxes, but the people knew what those boxes contained and were all alive with enthusiasm. The boxes were loaded on wagon-trucks and covered with bunting and flowers. Long ropes were attached to the trucks, and the old soldiers of the beloved general dragged them from the train to the site on which the statue now stands. One truck was claimed by the widows and daughters of dead soldiers, and they drew it through the streets amid tremendous cheering. Even the orphan children of Gen. Lee's soldiers insisted in taking part, and the boys helped the men and the girls the women, with the load.

The statue, which is to be unveiled to-morrow with appropriate ceremonies, is forty feet high, and weighs eight tons. It is an excellent like-

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Future Bride.

Dr. W. E. Moore, Moderator of the General Assembly.

ness of the famous warrior. It represents him as mounted on his favorite charger, Traveler, which he rode at Gettysburg. The statue stands on a pedestal twenty-one feet high, which has six spurs, on each of which it is proposed to place the statue of some famous Confederate general. Three of them have been already selected. They are "Stonewall" Jackson, J. E. Stuart and A. P. Hill. When the six are completed and placed in position, the group will be one of the most beautiful memorials in the United States.

REV. WILLIAM E. MOORE, D. D.

MODERATOR OF THE PRESBYTERIAN ASSEMBLY.

THE election, on May 15, of Dr. Moore, of Columbus, O., to the highest office in the gift of his ministerial brethren, was somewhat of a surprise. Though his talents and technical knowledge of denominational business, abundantly fitted him for the discharge of the duties of the office, it was expected that some one whose attitude on the question of revision of the creed was more in harmony with that of the majority would have been chosen. Dr. Herrick Johnson, of Chicago, who is an advocate of Revision, nominated Dr. Moore, and Dr. Agnew of Philadelphia, who is opposed to revision, seconded it. This support from both sides of the house disarmed all opposition, if there were any, and when Dr. Howard Crosby, of New York, moved that Dr. Moore be elected by acclamation it was done without a dissentient voice.

Dr. William E. Moore, has been, since 1884, the clerk of the assembly and has filled that difficult position with great satisfaction to the church. The last two digests of Assemblies which he prepared, were masterpieces. He is sixty-seven years of age, having been born at Strasburg, Pa., in 1823. He graduated from Yale College, in 1847, and in 1850, became pastor of a church at West Chester, remained there until 1872, when he was called to accept the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Columbus, O. It is generally known that Dr. Moore, besides his laurels in the ministry, has an honorable record. He served during the Gettysburg campaign as a lieutenant of infantry in a cavalry regiment, and was also, throughout, an active member of the Christian Union. He still maintains his military position by holding the office of Chaplain of the 4th Regiment, Ohio National Guard.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Arrival in England.

WILL IT LIFT.

THE STORY OF A FOG.

by the Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

(Continued from page 334.)

With that dark archway Jared Higginbotham watched and waited. His suspense was increasing. What could the police captain be doing? He must be waiting for him to return. He could see himself in imagination with the captain, driving with the captain in a cab through the London streets; seated in a rail-car beside the Captain, and—worse than all—going through Hilldrop village where everyone knew him, and stood and stared at him, and pointed significantly at the handcuffs. All this flashed through his mind, as he waited and wondered what the captain was doing. Perhaps he was changing his room. Perhaps he had abandoned the gold. He did not care if he hated the sight of it. He wished he had possession of it. It was a burden. It was killing him. It was making him mad. It was killing him. A bright thought struck him, a thought whose very inception induced a long sigh. Why should he not take the thing in and put it where he found it? Where Mr. Allanson's trunk was there yet? He did not know, and whether he could get the trunk he could not tell; but at any rate, he would put it in the corner, and keep a secret, unobserved watch over it until it got into the owner's hands again. Oh, if he could only he could do this; and the man felt as though he could sink upon his knees, there and then, and ask a merciful God to give him such a chance. These thoughts were passing through his mind, when he saw Captain Legard and the landlord of the inn talking earnestly together at the door. The dreaded chief-constable was smoking a cigar, and by-and-by Radamanthus laughed evidently at some joke the landlord had uttered. Of course, it was a Rhadamanthean laugh, and was not to be confounded with the cachinnations of irresponsibility. "Well, good-night, old fellow, he heard the officer say "I'm glad I've seen you," "Good-night, my boy, give us a call when you come to town again," was the landlord's cheery reply. Then they shook hands, and Captain Legard, turning in the direction of Oxford Street, was soon out of sight.

And so, after two mortal hours of indescribable mental torture, Jared found that he had been brewing hell-broth for his own drinking, and that Captain Legard's errand to the "Wellington," did not concern him. "Oh, Jared Higginbotham! What a double-dyed fool you are. Aye, and a doubled-dyed villain into the bargain." So said the self-convicted sinner to himself. He bit his lip with self-contempt. Truly, "The wicked fleeeth when no man pursueth."

All that evening Jared Higginbotham had the coffee-room of the "Wellington" all to himself, and it may well be understood that he never spent an evening in more wretched company during the whole term of his mortal life. As he sat thinking, thinking, thinking, the whole course of his years unrolled itself before him, and more and more he saw himself in the colors painted by a convicted conscience, and a mind and heart permitted for once to have full swing, and to say to their owner the honest truth which he had never fairly faced before. "Verily, I have sinned, and done evil in Thy sight."

That was the verdict he was continually passing himself; and the indictments were so many, and the sentence recurred so often, that he grew despondent, desperate, despairing, and seriously thought of suicide; not so much as a means of ending his mental tortures, as of ridding the world of a baleful thing not fit to live.

The one thing that withheld his hand, and threw something of the light of hope into the dark profound into which he was plunged, was the thought that had come to him under the archway of the stables. He would undo, so far as he could, the wrong he had committed.

Rapidly and quietly he would make his way to Hilldrop, and all unobserved, would put back the ill-gotten gold in the place, or near the place he took it from, when the yellow-visaged devil flung his horrible enchantment over him and made him once again a thief.

Having made up his mind to this course of action, he repaired to his chamber in the vain hope that his utter misery might be dulled a little by the intervention of kindly sleep.

But evil deeds are not so soon or so easily undone; moral blunders of that kind are very, very difficult to repair. There is an awful tangle of thorn and briar, a haunt of noxious things, both stings and fangs, for Jared Higginbotham to struggle through before he is out of the wood, the dark wood of horrible enchantments, into which he plunged with reckless rush—if, indeed, he ever gets out, and is not remorselessly buried in that deep "Serbonian bog, where armies whole have sunk."

For a long time sleep was an utter impossibility. One of those equinoctial storms, which, at that season of the year, often launch themselves suddenly and savagely over those latitudes, burst upon London, and the night was full of gruesome sounds and doleful noises. The storm-giant shook the door and windows, howled down the chimney shrieked through key-hole and cranny; and at last, when Jared sank into troubled sleep, he was startled out of it by horrid dreams, begotten of his distracted mind, and of the strife of wind and storm. Then fear took hold upon him and his chamber and the passages without were peopled with voices, trappings, sighings, groans, all of which, in his dazed and desperate state of mind, had to do with him, and were sent to him, as the whip of angry fate, in punishment for his evil deeds.

Jared, both by nature, early training, and a life-long residence in a rural district, was eminently superstitious, and no words of mine can express the fears and terrors that haunted him through those direful hours. In the dead of night he felt himself compelled to rise from the bed in which he had tossed to and fro, till he was physically exhausted, lighted the candle, and partially dressing himself, sat beside his bed, and taking a Bible from the table sought to distract his thoughts by turning over its pages, and reading here and there such passages as caught his eye.

Small advantage did the Book bring him. This is what he read: "Thou hast set at naught all them that err from Thy statutes. My flesh trembleth for fear of Thee; and I am afraid of Thy judgments. Woe unto the wicked, for it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him. There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is death. I will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh."

Such were the dread messages which seemed to be addressed to him. As he read the last passage, it seemed as though the weird sounds he heard were the laughings and mockings of Heaven against his useless plaints. He could read no more. He undressed again and went back to bed. He must have fallen asleep, but was all the time half conscious of his surroundings. The room grew awfully hot and close, he thought. He felt as if he were stifling. His dreams seemed to be realities. It seemed to him that unable to bear the imprisonment of the haunted chamber, and with a sort of feeling that to open his door would be less oppressive, he unlocked it and walked out upon the dark and silent landing towards the window on the stairs, which let in a dim dull gleam from the outer night. There and then he saw a sight which sent him staggering back a pace or two, froze his blood, and all but stopped the beating of his heart. On the lower landing of the broad semi-spiral staircase, over which he had often looked when awake, Jared Higginbotham dreamed that he saw the ghost of Richard Allanson, the man from whose trunk in the guest-chamber of "Hilldrop Inn" he had stolen the box of gold.

There was no mistaking the apparition which the conscience-stricken Jared Higginbotham saw in his dream. Every lineament was clearly revealed, and in every respect was a faithful and lifelike reproduction of the face of the man whom he had so deeply wronged, and for the possession of whose money he had sold himself to a devil whose recompensing tortures were too heavy to bear. The figure was attired in a long white garment which seemed to reach almost to his ankles, but these Jared could not see. On his head was something not much unlike a white turban of ample dimensions. But the most impressive sight that met Jared Higginbotham's widely opened eyes, was a broad red gash across the throat, and the cadaverous pallor which sat upon his face.

As soon as the ghostly eyes were fixed upon Jared, the spectre frowned, lifted one hand to the dreadful wound in his throat, and raised the other towards heaven as if to call down vengeance, or to call heaven to witness how that dreadful gash was given. The night was very dark, but the figure seemed to have on it a sort of phosphoric gleam. The light of a lamp outside cast a flickering ray through the window full on its face. There came a gust of wind which made the window shake and rattle; a wild scream was heard, the dim light that showed the ghost died out; the word "go!" seemed to come from those spectral lips; and, with a groan of terror, Jared started up wide-awake and covered with cold perspiration. He trembled so that the bed shook under him. Whether he had been asleep and dreaming, or whether, indeed, an apparition had visited him, he could not tell. He was afraid to move, but at last he turned around and buried his face in the pillow as if to shut out all possibility of looking again upon that "sight abhorred."

Now, just at this time, when Jared's conscience was wideawake, and Jared's mind was sensitive to all impressions, he was quick to interpret the meaning of the dream, if it was a dream; and it is not surprising that the interpretation troubled him even more than the gruesome sight itself. Of course, he knew that bad as he was, and abominable as his conduct had been, he was not actually guilty of murdering the man whose gold he had stolen. But that red gash had to be accounted for somehow. Conscience-stricken Jared was equal to the occasion, and this was the way he read the message brought to him by the horrible figure.

"Richard Allanson," quoth he, "was not so rich as I had supposed. No doubt the loss of so much money as I stole from him brought him to great poverty. Suddenly within sight of positive want, or unable to face creditors who demanded their due, he was smitten with despondency. This deepened into despair, and he committed suicide. When the ghost lifted one hand to the fatal wound, the other to heaven, and fixed his reproachful eyes on me, it was to call heaven to witness that I was the cause of his untimely death. And so I am, both a thief and a murderer, and oh, just heaven, that I might die!"

So the miserable man argued to himself as he lay with his head buried in his pillow, and an untold horror in his soul. This is where the tempter has led him! "The way of transgressors is hard." This is the horrible issue of his wicked love for gold. Look upon him, ye who are enamored of the sheen and the chink of minted gold, and learn that in hell there is no more malignant fiend than Mammon, on earth there are no more perilous traps and snares than he of the glittering visage, and the sonorous voice doth set for men who make gold their idol and money their delight.

After a time he ventured to raise his head from the pillow, and sat up, looking ghostly, ghastly, despairing; a pitiful sight, indeed. He has come at last to be fairly face to face with himself—with neither glass nor veil. He sees himself through the merciless crystal of a convicted conscience; sees himself as God sees him; not simply a fool, a wrong-doer, but a sinner, a sinner doubly vile! Since he had read those awful messages from the Book last night; since he had seen the midnight vision in his sleep, he seemed to be almost bereft of reason. I think he would very likely have taken his own life, but for one thing—the desperate hope that he might get the accursed box replaced in corner of the room at "Hilldrop Inn." But how?—when?—he seemed bereft of all strength. If he sought to walk he staggered like a drunken man. The paralysis of perfect condemnation had come upon him, his memory recalled that dreadful figure with the gash in the throat, and in the phosphorescent light which was emitted from it he could see his own hand not only stained with yellow gold, but blood!

There was no more sleep for Jared that night. Toward morning he mustered enough courage to get up and light the gas. Then he went back to bed and tossed about restlessly till daybreak. He rose early, dressed and went out. The room was hateful to him. He must see human faces, hear human voices or he would go crazy. All day long he wandered from place to place, trying to forget his vision. For the great part he did so silently. Once or twice he got into conversation with people he met, but he was so depressed and distraught that they looked at him suspiciously, and turned away from him as if there was something uncanny about him. Jared was hurt by this kind of avoidance, and he fancied he saw it at last in the faces of people he met, but did not speak to. Why, his very face must be betraying him! It would be better to be alone than this. So he went back to the Wellington.

Night found the miserable man again in his room, more miserable than ever, and with new cause for thought. What is it that is agitating him now? Poor Jared! What is he thinking of, as he sits there, in the shadows of the night, just as the two young men are sitting in an equal shadow in the room below? He has had another staggering revelation. Richard Allanson is not dead! or, if he was, he had come to life again. He had seen a large portmanteau in the hall, and on it, "Mr. Richard Allanson." He had ventured a timid question to the porter on the subject. "Yes," was the answer, "Mr. Allanson had come in that day." He saw the visitors' book on the table, and turned to its latest page. Yes, Mr. Gilbert Craske, jun., a familiar name, and Mr. Richard Allanson, boldly written. Can there be two? He can soon settle that. He stopped the chambermaid on her way to his own room. "That Mr. Richard Allanson," said he, "has he been here before, may I ask?"

"Oh yes, sir," said the maid, having in her mind the gentleman first brought there by Jarvie on that foggy November night, "he always stops at the 'Wellington' when he comes to town."

"Then it's he!" said Jared, as he entered his room, and as if to make assurance doubly sure, he heard his voice, bluff and clear, from down below, making some inquiries of the landlord. He heard the very name, followed by the closing of a door. Now Gil Craske was built in all things after the model of his worthy father, and it was

Gil's voice that Jared's conscience had taken for his sire's.

There sits Jared Higginbotham, a poor miserable sinner—a penitent sinner, a sinner with a conscience that is at last sensitive, clear-voiced, a master voice that will be heard. There he sits. There are tears on his cheek, as he whispers "Thank God! thank God!" and then drops his chin on his breast for daring to mention the Divine name. What is he thanking God for? That Mr. Allanson is not dead, and that the apparition had played him false? Now, then, what is to be done? The man he has foully robbed is, he thinks, at that moment downstairs. He has seen his bag; he has read his name; he has heard his voice. What shall he do?

O, Jared Higginbotham! Now comes the crisis; the final chance for you, body and soul. The gloom gathers; the night deepens. Behold, he prays! He opens his portmanteau—the portmanteau that brought the accursed box from Hilldrop. There it lies with all its wealth of gold untouched. The inn-keeper lifts it from its place, holds it at arm's length in his hand, as though he would thank any one—angel, man, or devil—to rid him of it, passes quickly from his room; descends the stairs with swift determined step.

He has not noticed until now that a fog, thick and heavy, has settled down. He welcomes it as a good, kind friend come down to screen his unhappy face from the scorching blaze of a good man's eye.

"Which is Mr. Allanson's room?" he asks of the porter in the hall. "Number 7," replies that worthy, pointing at the same time to the door. There is one brief pause, a poise as it were, in which Jared Higginbotham's soul is on the balance. "Yes," he whispers, "I'll be rid of it, come what will. God help me!" He knocks at the door, does not, perhaps dares not pause for permission, but opens it and enters! The Rubicon is crossed, thank God!

(To be Continued.)

ON a clear night, count every star in the heavens. Do this for 76 clear nights and you have counted the number of ESTEY ORGANS
that have been sold.

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

on your Boots and Shoes.

Sold by all Dealers.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP
for children teething" softens the gums, reduces inflammation, allays pain, cures wind colic. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

Peculiar

To itself in many important particulars. Sarsaparilla is different from and superior to other medicine.

Peculiar in combination, proportion of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the full curative value of the best remedies of the vegetable kingdom.

Peculiar in its medicinal merit, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown.

Peculiar in strength and economy—Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which be said, "100 doses one dollar." Medicine and smaller bottles require larger doses and produce no good results as Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Peculiar in its "good name at home"—more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell than of all other blood purifiers.

Peculiar in its phenomenal record abroad, no other preparation has ever such popularity in so short a time. Do not be induced to take any other preparation. Be sure.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

For Internal and External Use. Stops Pain, Cramps, Inflammation in bowels, like magic. Cures Croup, Asthma, Colds, Catarrhs, Diarrhea, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Stiff Joints and Strains. Full particulars on back, 25 cents post-paid. L. S. JOHNSON & CO., Boston.

I took Cold,
I took Sick,
I TOOK

SCOTT'S EMULSION

RESULT:

I take My Meals,
I take My Rest

AND I AM VIGOROUS ENOUGH TO DO ANYTHING I CAN LAY MY HANDS ON. I am getting fat too, FOR I take Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil and Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda. NOT ONLY CURED MY Indigestion Consumption BUT I AM UP, AND IS NOW PUTTING

FLESH ON MY BONES

AT THE RATE OF A POUND A WEEK. TAKE IT JUST AS EASILY AS I DO. SUCH TESTIMONY IS NOTHING BUT SCOTT'S EMULSION IS DOING WONDERFULLY. TAKE NO OTHER.

CARMEL SOAP is made only from pure Olive Oil by a Mission Society in Palestine. It is utterly pure and possessing the emollient properties of Olive Oil. It is unsurpassed for the Toilet and superior to all other soaps for the face, hands, and invalids. If your druggist or grocer does not have it, send 10 cents for sample cake to the nearest A. KLIPSTEIN, 52 Cedar St., New York.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ANALYZING SHADER. Beware of Imitations. NOTICE. AUTOGRAF OF THE GENUINE. Stewart Hartshorn THE GENUINE. HARTSHORN'S

SHORTHAND Writing taught by mail. Situations procured all pupils who complete end for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, New York.

SPELL ON A SORCERER.

long since a man named Liu joined a church in China, whose business had it of making fire-crackers for use in worship. The Rev. J. J. Coulson, one of the China inland missionaries, the following account of him: he first went home he met with opposition and persecution. At e he was threatened with legal pro- if he persisted in opposing the re- his forefathers; he went away to a place a few li from home, and earnestly and wept. Almost imme- his prayer was answered, for his accuser was in turn sued by an- an for a sum of money. No less ee of his relations died in turn, ing faithfully warned by him; but e, alas! untouched by the Spirit's and died as they had lived. Upon all opposition ceased. Now the his family, including elder broth- onverted. He did not like to leave ear ago, as they were not strong in, but now they are able to stand in strength, he has left them. At one whole village brought a sorcerer ch him, or to drive out the devil as supposed to possess him. He ing at the time they arrived, and d New Testaments and Commen- whole theological library—were ut before him on the table. When red the room, Mr. Liu went to the and laying his hand upon his, said, ame of Jesus of Nazareth, I com- to leave!" Immediately the sor- rendered speechless and powerless, spirit within being quite subdued. d urged on the sorcerer, beseech- o exorcise Mr. Liu, who then said : ame of the Father, Son, and Holy command you to leave," whereupon fied, as if for life, shouting out, o powerful for me, he is too great. d wanted him to come back, but he ot take me to him, his Saviour is g for me; his prayer is too power- ficacious," so Mr. Liu got the repu- being more powerful than the r the gods."

OF ACOUSTIC CAPACITY.

MACON COCHRAN, a somewhat ec- indefatigable and zealous mis- with the Hudson Bay Company, preparing to build a new church one that had become too small ngregation. In this good work ith determined opposition from s M'Leod. He was a man noted opensity for liquor and his pro- Angus publicly and privately de- t the new church would be too could see no sense or reason in it. ulated with the Archdeacon, and hat he could never make himself t. At the opening service, when g was crowded to the very doors, deacon called out, "is Angus ere?" "Here, your reverence." Angus, stand over there in that orner, to the right of the door. us M'Leod," he continued in sten- es, "if you don't stop your drink- our swearing you'll go to hell. Do that, Angus M'Leod?" When mitted that he could hear, the n sent him to the opposite cor- e he repeated his admonition, and ted beyond doubt that the church means so large that the preacher be heard in it.

A RUINED LAWYER.

lent illustrating the insidious power ve of strong drink gains, is told amilton, the well-known temper- cer. He says: "I knew a lawyer, pected and admired both for his of heart and his intellectual abili- married a lady in every way his d for a time nothing could equal piness. But a shadow fell upon hold. Both husband and wife loved r a time they took it moderately, med to increase their happiness; he servant became master and the slave. Business was neglected, us squandered, and home was al- go to ruin, and soon they were in its. The two held a council as to how they could raise some money, and it was decided that the wife should go to some of her husband's old business friends, and, pretending he was dead, ask for money to bury him. She went, and at the first call, when the partners of the firm heard that poor K— was dead, they gave a hundred dollars towards the expenses of the funeral. Encouraged by this success, the same trick was practiced again and again with success, until it was detected. Ultimately all sense of decency was gone, and these once brilliant people sunk to the level of the gutter. No one had brighter prospects than that man had, no one had less idea of becoming a drunkard than he had, yet he became one, and every one who trifles with strong drink is running the same risk."

HELP IN A CRISIS.

A STORY of answered prayer is related by Mr. Newberry, who is laboring as a Protestant missionary in Italy. He says, "Some years ago one of our helpers out in a country district was in need of money. He had none for a week, and had often been that way before. So his wife came to me and said, 'We must have money. Why don't God provide for us now in our need?' I said, 'Have you not got Jesus Christ? and with Him you have all things.' She said there were not even any vegetables in the garden, and it looked as if they must starve. I said we should get down on our knees and pray. We had prayer, and while we were on our knees the postman's knock came to the door. Finding no one to take the letter from him, he came up to my room and knocked at the door. He handed me a registered letter, which he could only deliver to myself and receive my signature that I had received it. It contained a remittance from a friend in America who had been blessed at some of our meetings two years ago. So God answered our prayers. If we didn't grumble so much, but praised the Lord for His blessings, He would answer our prayers at the time, and bless us more abundantly than He does."

Physicians Acknowledge there is less Deafness.

Physicians have watched with a jealous eye the increasing popularity of the sound discs invented by A. H. Wales, of Bridgeport, Conn., as patients who have been under their care for years, have in a week's time had their hearing restored by its use, and they acknowledge that there may be a decrease in the percentage of deaf people in the Census of 1890.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS. I

Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & CO., New York.

20 YEARS OF SUCCESS.

Without loss to investors a good reason for buying the Debiture Bonds and Mortgage Loans of the AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO. Assets, $2,000,000. Highest rate of interest consistent with the choicest security. Pamphlets free, address, E. S. ORMSBY, A. L. ORMSBY, } Vice-President, H. E. SIMMONS, } President. 150 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. CITY.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts. If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SHORTHAND Private instruction by practical verbatim reporter. 20 years' experience. No failures. Situations guaranteed. Book and Circulars Free. FRANK HARRISON, Stenographer, 239 Broadway, N. Y., or 721 Broad St., Newark, N. J.

ECONOMY OF FOOTWEAR.

An Illustrative treatise interesting to all. Sent FREE on receipt of name and address on postal. BOX 551, Brocton, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "THE CHRISTIAN'S LEGACY." 102 sold in in one church, 72 in one place of 739 people. W. J. HOLLAND, 107 Duane St., New York.

WEBSTER

ANCIENT AND MODERN.

DON'T BE DUPED.

A so-called "Webster's Unabridged Dictionary" is being offered to the public at a very low price. The body of the book, from A to Z, is a cheap reprint, page for page, of the edition of 1847, which was in its day a valuable book, but, in the progress of language for over forty years, has been completely superseded. It is now reproduced, broken type, errors and all, by a photographic process, is printed on cheap paper and flimsily bound. It is advertised to be the substantial equivalent of "an eight to twelve dollar book," while in fact it is a literal copy of a book which in its day was retailed for about $5.00, and that book was much superior in paper, print and binding to this imitation, and was then the best Dictionary of the time instead of an antiquated one. A brief comparison, page by page, between the reprint and the latest and enlarged edition will show the great superiority of the latter. No honorable dealer will allow the buyer of such to suppose that he is getting the Webster which to-day is accepted as the Standard and The Best.

There are several of these reprints, differing in minor particulars, but don't be duped. The body of each is a literal copy of the 1847 edition.

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY.

The New York Times says:

"Only those who are ignorant of the great advances that have been made in dictionaries are likely to buy this reprint at any price."

The American Bookseller, of N. Y., says:

"The etymologies are utterly misleading, and naturally so; for when the Webster of 1847 was issued, Comparative Philology was in its cradle. The definitions are imperfect, requiring condensation, re-arrangement and additions. The vocabulary is defective, some of the commonest words of to-day, especially scientific terms, for which a dictionary is most often consulted, being entirely absent. In not one of these three prime requisites of a dictionary is the Webster reprint a trustworthy guide, or, rather, it is a misleading one. * * * This 'reprint' is not intended for intelligent men. It is made expressly to be foisted by all the arts of the book canvasser on those who have been precluded from a knowledge of what developments lexicography has undergone during the last forty-two years. This is the cruellest feature of this money-making enterprise."

The Buffalo Christian Advocate says:

"DON'T BE DUPED. Thousands are, or are likely to be, by the flashy fraudulent advertisements of 'The Original Webster's Unabridged Dictionary,' which is offered for three or four dollars. * * * If any of our readers wish to invest in a purchase which they will be likely afterwards to regret, they will do so after being duly notified."

The Journal of Education, Boston, says:

"Teachers cannot be too careful not to be imposed upon, since the very things which make a dictionary valuable in school are wanting in this old-time reprint. Any high-school dictionary which can be purchased for a dollar and fifty cents is worth more for school use than this."

Many other prominent journals speak in similar terms, and legitimate publishers write us in strong condemnation of this attempt to foist an obsolete book on the public.

The latest and the best, which bears our imprint on the title page, has over 2000 pages with illustrations on almost every page.

G. & C. MERRIAM & CO.,

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

RIDLEY'S

Grand St., N. Y.

TRIMMED AND UNTRIMMED
HATS and BONNETS.

Largest Assortment in the City to Select from.

Millinery Novelties, Silks, Satins, Velvets, Ribbons, Laces, Trimmings, Hosiery, Men's Furnishing Goods, Ladies' and Misses' Suits, Wraps, Dress Goods, Lace Mitts, Lisle and Silk Gloves, Housefurnishing Goods, Carpets, Furniture, etc.

SILK DRESS FRONTS.

200 SILK NETTED FRONTS AT 89c. EACH; WORTH $2.50.
75 FINE SILK FRONTS AT $1.50 EACH; WORTH $3.50.
100 HEAVY SILK FRONTS AT $2.50 EACH; WORTH $6.00.
50 RICH SILK FRONTS AT $2.50 EACH; WORTH $8.00.
125 EXTRA QUALITY SILK FRONTS, $4.00 EACH; WORTH $10.00.

Beaded Capes and Wraps.

2,500 SILK AND BEADED WRAPS, ALL THE NEWEST SHAPES, FROM THE LOWEST PRICES UP.
200 FINE BEADED WRAPS AT $2.25 EACH; WORTH $5.00.
100 RICH BEADED, FRINGED WRAPS, $3.50 EACH; WORTH $8.00.
175 ELEGANT BEADED, FRINGED WRAPS AT $4.00 EACH; WORTH $10.00.
BLACK SILK CORDED CAPES ALL PRICES.

FLOUNCINGS.

SWISS 22-INCH FLOUNCINGS, 25c., 30c., 35c., 45c., 50c. to $1.50 YARD.
SWISS 45-INCH SKIRTINGS, 40c., 45c., 50c., 55c., 59c., 75c. to $2.50 YARD.
HEMSTITCHED 22-INCH SWISS FLOUNCINGS, 30c., 35c., 40c., 50c., 59c., 75c. to $1.50 YARD.
SKIRTINGS, 35c., 50c., 59c., 65c., 75c., $1.00 to $2.00 YARD.
VANDYKE NAINSOOK 22-INCH FLOUNCINGS, 65c., 75c., 90c., $1.00 YARD. EDGINGS TO MATCH.
SWISS AND HAMBURG ALL-OVER EMBROIDERIES, FOR YOKES, SLEEVES AND CAPES, 25c., 30c., 35c., 50c., 75c. YARD.

Spring and Summer Magazine.

15c. Sample Copy; 50c. per year.

EDWARD RIDLEY & SONS,

309 to 321 Grand Street.

56 to 68 ALLEN, 50 to 65 ORCHARD ST., N. Y.

WEARY, YET WAITING.

ROM. VIII: 19, 23, 25.

I am weary, yet I would not Flee away and be at rest,
Jesus loves me, and He could not Fail to give me what is best.

I am weary night and morning
Of the world's incessant strife,
But I know the day is dawning
Of a bright immortal life.

I can wait a little longer,
For His will is very dear;
And in waiting I grow stronger,
For I feel the day is near.

Not a moment will He keep me
When the harvest-time is come,
Angel messengers will reap me,
And shall take the harvest home.

Where He is—so hath He taught me—
I shall be when I can bear
All the weight of glory brought me,
By His intercession there.

Welcome then be every dealing,
That is helping to the end;
Though the discipline I'm feeling,
I can hail it as a friend.

—Selected.

J. E. Jewett, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Boils, pimples, hives, tetter, ringworm, and other similar affections caused by impure blood, are entirely cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which purifies, vitalizes, and enriches the blood.

Perfect Days in June

Need perfect Lays for June—and here they are!

IN SHEET MUSIC FORM.

ELAINE. A Love Song.	Van de Water.	50c
MIZPAH. Song.	Adam Geibel.	35c
SIGNAL BELLS AT SEA. Song. W. S. Hays.		40c
OLD HOME DOWN ON THE FARM. Dubois.		40c
VISIONS OF REST WALTZES. F. T. Baker.		60c
DANSE ECOSSE.	F. T. Baker.	60c
EDELWEISS. Glide Waltz. T. E. Vanderbeck.		60c
BATTLE WON. Triumphal March. E. Holst.		50c

IN BOOK FORM.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. Very beautiful music. More than 40 sacred airs. Arranged by Leon Keach.

OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Arr. for Piano.

YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces.

CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION. 19 Piano Duets. Highly praised by good players.

PIANO CLASSICS. Volume 2. Marvellously good pieces, as are those of vol. 1.

SONG CLASSICS. Volume 2. Grand Music.

Any book or piece mailed for retail price, which, for any one of the superior books above mentioned is but $1.00.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.

C. H. Ditson & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

For Sunday Schools, Classes, etc., in every variety of design, material and workmanship.

Send 10 cents in stamps for new illustrated "Banner" catalogue.

J. & R. LAMB,
59 Carmine Street, New York.

"ORIGINAL PACKAGES." The full text States Supreme Court Decision in the Iowa Imported Liquor Case, with the Dissenting Opinions of three Justices, has just been issued, and is one of the most important documents ever published. Every lover of his country should have a copy. 12mo, 72 pages. Price only 10 cents. Send to J. N. STEARNS, 58 READE STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

IF YOU HAVE A BOY OR A Girl, it will pay you to send for one of our pamphlets on Education and Choice of Occupation, FREE, with catalogue of our publications. Address, stating age,
FOWLER & WELLS, 777 Broadway, N. Y.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ailments. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

WINNOWNED SONGS—
BY IRA D. SANKEY. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

This New Book of 224 pages has been prepared especially for Sunday Schools. It contains 257 Hymns. Every piece a Gem. It is equal in size and number of hymns to books of its class sold at 60 cents, and in many essentials is very much superior. Already adapted for use at the Chautauqua Assembly, and the New York State Sunday School Association. Any number of Books sent by Express at 35 cents per copy, Charges Not Prepaid. If by mail, add 5 cents a copy for postage. Sample Copies for Examination sent, postage paid, on receipt of 35c. Specimen pages free. May be ordered through any Bookseller or Music Dealer.

BICLOW & MAIN,
76 East Ninth Street, New York.
81 Randolph St., Chicago.

THE JOHN CHURCH CO.
74 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati.
19 East 16th Street, New York.

IN all conditions of WEAKNESS, in acute or chronic DYSPEPSIA, in TYPHOID FEVER, DIPHTHERIA and SCARLET FEVER, the use of BOVININE increases the chances of recovery by the perfect nutrition it affords. The administration of BOVININE shortens convalescence and causes a rapid gain in flesh, strength and color. BOVININE has been used for twelve years by physicians with ever-increasing satisfaction and confidence.

INFLUENZA
OR
'LA GRIPPE.

As this complaint is raging again in several large cities in Europe, and will no doubt prevail here again, all persons suffering with coughs or any lung complaints should not fail to use

WILBOR'S
COD LIVER OIL
AND PHOSPHATES.

It gives immediate relief, and a permanent cure in a short time. It will prevent this fell disease from having a fatal termination. Be sure, as you value your health, and get the genuine, manufactured only by A. B. WILBOR, Chemist, Boston, Mass. Sold by all Druggists.

VanHouten's Cocoa
"BEST & GOES FARTHEST."
The purest, most soluble—the original cocoa. Invented, patented and made in Holland. Delicate, stimulating, nutritious, much better for the nerves than tea and coffee. Ask for VAN HOUTEN'S, take no other. [6]

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
CHANCE FOR ALL
To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea, A TRIAL ORDER of 3 1/2 pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289. 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

MEN WANTED.

Great inducements. Outfit free. Address, J. AUSTIN SHAW, Nurseryman, Brooklyn, New York.

AGENTS WANTED by an old reliable firm; large profits, quick sales. SAMPLE FREE. A rare opportunity. Geo. A. Scott, 842 Broadway, N. Y.

PIANOS $150 to $1500 UNIVERSITY ESTAB. 1859. INCOR. 1877

PRICE $180 They Lead the World!

Sent for trial in your own home.

ABSOLUTELY PERFECT Guaranteed Six Years.

DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!

Cat. Free.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO. 235 E. 21st St., N.Y. ORGANS $35 to $500

THE STANLEY BOOK.
JUST ISSUED,
Stanley; and His Relief of Emin Pasha,
By E. P. SCOTT, Author of "Lectures on Africa," Etc.
250 Pages, with Maps and 20 Full-Page Illustrations. Paper, 25 cents; Half Russia, Marbled Edges, $1.00.
All classes of people are interested in the wonderful history and travels of this most wonderful man, and this book will have an immense sale. It will be mailed to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price. Agents wanted, to whom 50 per cent. commission will be paid. Send 25 cents for Prospectus Book, and go to work selling it. Address, J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, P. O. Box 2767. 97 Rose Street, New York.

HIRES' ROOT BEER!
25c HIRES' IMPROVED 25c
ROOT BEER!
IN LIQUID. NO BOILING OR STRAINING. EASILY MADE. THIS PACKAGE MAKES FIVE GALLONS.

THE most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world. Delicious and Sparkling. TRY IT.

Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.

C. E. HIRES. PHILADELPHIA.

BABY WARDROBE.
PATTERNS. Complete outfit of 25 new and improved patterns for infants' clothes. Also 25 patterns of short clothes, Either set of patterns, together with full directions for making, amount and kind of material required, by mail, 50c.; both sets, $1.00. Such reliable patterns including every necessary article are needed by every mother.
Mrs. J. BRIDE, P. O. Box 2088, New York.

RIDGE'S FOOD
The Most Reliable Food For Infants & Invalids. Not a medicine, but a specially prepared Food, adapted to the weakest stomach. 4 sizes in pamphlet free. Write to Ridge & Co (on every label), Palmer, Mass.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co.
827 and 829 Broadway, New York

Note our Trade Mark Closely!

BEWARE OF IMITATION

We ask attention to our Complete Assortment

SUMMER
UNDERWEAR

And Especially to our exquisite

All-Wool GAUZE

Underwear for the hot, summer season

Send for explanatory, descriptive and full Catalogue and price-list, free by mail.

Garments made to order, a Speciality. Mail orders promptly attended to.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co.

827 and 829 Broadway, New York

BRANCH HOUSES:

119 NASSAU ST., Temple Court Bldg.
504 FULTON ST., next to Y.M.C.A. Bldg., Brooklyn

100,000 DRESSMAKERS
DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting

No one using a Chart or complete with The McDowell Dressing Machine in Cutting, Gracing and Perfect-Fitting. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Form, Follows every Fashion as Useful as the machine.

Free 30 days to test at your home. Send for Illustrated Catalogue. THE McDOWELL CO., 6 West 14th Street, New York.

We know the advertiser to be thoroughly reliable, and machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

THE NEW MODEL,
OUR LATEST and BEST MOWER.

UNION INVESTMENT COMPANY

Capital, $1,000,000

KANSAS CITY, MO.

7 per cent. investment interest semi-annually

The direct obligation of the Company by business property and recommended by prominent business men and bankers of Kansas. Send for circulars with full particulars.

W. P. RICE, Pres.
O. F. PAGE, Treas. Union Investment Co.

25c PRINTING OUTFIT.

A WHOLE PRINTING OUTFIT, COMPLETE AND READY TO USE. 3 Alphabets of fine type. Bottle of Linotype. Two sets of galleys with catalogue and directions. 1000 PRINTING. Set up any name, printed cards, paper, cards, lines. Worth 50c. The best gift for young people. Postpaid only 25c. 5 for $1.25 wanted. Ingersoll & Bro., 65 Cortlandt St., New York.

SALESMEN WANTED

Wholesale and retail trade. We are the largest manufacturers of... Liberal salary paid. Permanent position. Money made... wages, advertising, etc. For terms add. Centennial Hall, N. Y.

A LADY WANTED in every

Home. Circ'rs Free. E. B. TREAT, Publisher

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

XIII., No. 23. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE EMEROR OF GERMANY
 OPENING THE REICHSTAG.
 SWORD: ITS MISSION AND ITS DOOM.
 Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday.
 BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Murder-Extraordinary Confession, Etc.
 NIGHT COMETH. By Mr. W. E. Blackstone.

PORTRAIT OF DR. TUCKER, the Successor of Bishop Hannington.
 PICTURE OF THE NEW MONUMENT TO PRES-IDENT GARFIELD, Dedicated May 30.
 Gems from New Books: Blood-bought Ivory—Starvation Camp—Stanley's Donkey Eaten, Etc.
 THE RICH FOOL. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
 A SUMMARY OF THE EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE FACE ILLUMINED. A New Sermon by Rev.
 C. H. Spurgeon.
 PORTRAIT OF EVANGELIST KEATES.
 PICTURE OF ARABS AT PRAYER.
 WILL IT LIFT? By Rev. J. Jackson Wray. (Cont.)
 A Chinaman's Soul-craving—A Sceptic's Trials—Piety and Poverty in an Attic—A Prisoner's Regret —An Old Miser's Death, Etc.

The Emperor of Germany Opening the Reichstag with a Speech from the Throne.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

THE SWORD: ITS MISSION AND ITS DOOM.

"My sword shall be bathed in heaven." Isa. 34:5.

Different Kinds of Swords—The Divine Mission of the Sword—On the Battle-Field of Marathon—The Momentous Issue of Chalons—The Blessed Work of Washington's Sword—The Sheathed Sword—Necessary to Maintain Order—Its Use in the Draft Riots—Its Power in 1849—The Militia Necessary After War Ceases—The Qualities the Sword Develops—The Doom of the Sword—Its Youthful Victims—Its Remorseless Cruelties—To Become the Plowshare—The Two Roses.

THREE hundred and fifty-one times does the Bible speak of that sharp, keen, curved, inexorable weapon, which flashes upon us from the text—the sword. Sometimes the mention is applaudatory and sometimes damnatory, sometimes as drawn, sometimes as sheathed. In the Bible, and in much secular literature, the sword represents all javelins, all muskets, all carbines, all guns, all police clubs, all battle-axes, all weaponry for physical defence or attack. It would be an interesting thing to give the history of the Plough, and follow its furrow all down through the ages, from the first crop in Chaldea to the last crop in Minnesota. It would be interesting to follow the Pen as it has tracked its way on down through the literature of nations, from its first word in the first book to the last word which some author last night wrote as he closed his manuscript. It would be an interesting thing to count the echoes of the Hammer from the first nail driven, down through all the mechanism of centuries to the last stroke in the carpenter's shop yesterday. But in this, my annual sermon as chaplain of the Thirteenth Regiment, I propose taking up a weapon that has done a work that neither Plow nor Pen nor Hammer ever accomplished. My theme is the Sword—its mission and its doom.

A Difference in Swords.

The sword of the text was bathed in heaven; that is, it was a sword of righteousness, as another sword may be bathed in hell, and the sword of cruelty and wrong. There is a great difference between the sword of Winklereid and the sword of Cataline, between the sword of Leonidas and the sword of Benedict Arnold. In our effort to hasten the end of war, we have hung the sword with abuses and execrations, when it has had a divine mission, and when in many crises of the world's history it has swung for liberty and justice, civilization and righteousness and God. At the very opening of the Bible and on the East side of the Garden of Eden, God placed a flaming sword to defend the tree of life. Of the officer of the law, St. Paul declares: "He beareth not the sword in vain." Through Moses God commanded: "Put every man his sword by his side." David in his prayer, says: "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty." One of the old battle shouts of the Old Testament was, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Christ, in a great exigency said, that such a weapon was more important than a coat, for He declared: "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." Again He declared: "I come not to send peace but a sword." Of Christ's second coming it is said: "Out of His mouth went a sharp, two-edged sword." Thus, sometimes figuratively, but oftener literally, the divine mission of the sword is announced.

The Beneficent Sword.

What more consecrated thing in the world than Joshua's sword, or Caleb's sword, or Gideon's sword, or David's sword, or Washington's sword, or Marion's sword, or Lafayette's sword, or Wellington's sword, or Kosciusko's sword, or Garibaldi's sword, or hundreds of thousands of American swords that have again and again been bathed in heaven. Swords of that kind have been the best friends of the human race. They have slain tyrannies, pried open dungeons, and cleared the way for nations in their march upward. It was better for them to take the sword and be free, than lie under the oppressor's heel and suffer. There is something worse than death, and that is life if it must cringe and crouch before the wrong. Turn over the leaves of the world's history, and find that there has never been a tyranny stopped or a nation liberated except by the sword. I am not talking to you about the way things ought to be, but about the way they have been. What force drove back the Saracens at Tours, and kept Europe from being overwhelmed by Mohammedanism, and, subsequently, all America given over to Mohammedanism? The sword of Charles Martel and his men. Who can deal enough in infinities to tell what was accomplished for the world's good by the sword of Joan of Arc? In December last, I looked off and saw in the distance the battlefield of Marathon, and I asked myself what was it that, on that most stopped the Persian hosts, representing not only Persia, but Egypt, and Tripoli, and Afghanistan, and Beloochistan, and Armenia; a host that had Asia under foot and proposed to put Europe under foot, and, if successful in that battle, would have submerged by Asiatic barbarism, European civilization, and, as a consequence in after time, American civilization? The swords of Miltiades, and Themistocles, and Aristides. At the waving of these swords, the eleven thousand lancers of Athens on the run, dashed against the one hundred thousand insolent Persians, and trampled them down or pushed them back into the sea. The sword of that day saved the best part of the hemispheres, a trinity of keen steel flashing in the two lights—the light of the setting sun of barbarism, the light of the rising sun of civilization. Hail to these three great swords bathed in heaven!

Tremendous Day in History,

What put an end to infamous Louis XVI.'s plan of universal conquest by which England would have been made to kneel on the steps of the Tuileries and the Anglo-Saxon race would have been halted and all Europe paralyzed? The sword of Marlborough, at Blenheim. Time came when the Roman war eagles, whose beaks had been punched into the heart of nations must be brought down from their eyries. All other attempts had disgracefully failed, but the Germans, the mightiest nation for brawn and brain, undertook the work, and, under God, succeeded. What drove back the Roman cavalry till the horses, wounded, flung their riders and the last rider perished, and the Hercynian forest became

The Scene of Rome's Humiliation?

The brave sword, the triumphant sword of Arminius. While passing through France last January my nerves tingled with excitement and I rose in the car, the better to see the battlefield of Chalons, the mounds and breastworks still visible, though nearly five hundred years ago they were shovelled up. Here, Attila, the heathen monster, called by himself the "Scourge of God, for the punishment of Christians," his life a massacre of nations, came to ignominious defeat, and he put into one great pile the wooden saddles of his cavalry, and the spoils of the cities and kingdoms he had sacked, and placed on top of this holocaust the women who had accompanied him in his devastating march, ordering that the torch be put to the pile. What power broke that sword, and stayed that red scourge of cruelty that was rolling over Europe? The sword of Theodoric and Actius.

To come down to later ages, all intelligent Englishmen unite with all intelligent Americans in saying that it was the best thing that the American colonies swung off from the government of Great Britain. It would have been the worst absurdity of four thousand years if this continent should have continued in loyalty to a throne on the other side of the sea. No one would propose a Governor-General for the United States as there is a Governor-General for Canada. We have had splendid queens in our American Capitol, but we could hardly be brought to support a queen on the other side of the Atlantic, lovely and good as Victoria is. The only use we have for earls and lords and dukes in this country is, to treat them well when they pass through to their hunting grounds in the Far West, or when their fortunes have failed, reinforce them by wealthy matrimonial alliance. Imagine this nation yet a part of English possessions! The trouble that mother-country has to-day with Ireland would be a paradisaic condition compared with the trouble she would have with us. England and the United States make excellent neighbors, but the two families are too large to live in the same house. What a god-send that we should have parted, and parted long ago! But I can think of no other way in which we could have possibly achieved American independence. George the Third, the half-crazy king, would not have let us go. Lord North, his prime minister, would not have let us go. General Lord Cornwallis would not have let us go, although after Yorktown he was glad enough to have us let him go. Lexington, and Bunker Hill, and Monmouth and Trenton, and Valley Forge, were proofs positive that they were not willing to let us go. A committee of Americans going across the ocean to see what could have been done would have found no better accommodations than London Tower. The only way it could have been done by the sword, your great-grandfather's sword. Jefferson's pen could write the Declaration of Independence, but only Washington's sword could have achieved it, and the other sword bathed in heaven.

The Sheathed Sword.

So now the sword has its uses, although it is sheathed sword. There is not an armory in Brooklyn, or New York, or Philadelphia, or Chicago, or Charleston, or New Orleans, or any American city, that could be spared. We have all our American cities a ruffian population which, though they are small in number, compared with the good population, would again and again make rough and stormy times if, back of our mayors and common councils, and police, there were not in the armories and arsenals some keen sword which, if brought into play, would make quick work with mobocracy. There are in every great community unprincipled men who like to row on a large scale, and they heat themselves with sour mash and old rye and other decoctions enriched with blue vitriol, potash, turpentine, sugar of lead, sulphuric acid, logwood, strychnine, night-shade, and other precious ingredients, and take down a whole glass with a sounding "Ah!" of satisfaction. When they get that stuff in them, and the blue vitriol collides with the potash, and the turpentine with the sulphuric acid, the victims are ready for anything but order and decency and good government. Again and again, in our American cities, has the necessity of home guards been demonstrated.

You remember, how, when the soldiers were all away to the war in 1863-64, what confusions were kindled in the streets of New York, and what negroes were hung. Some of you remember the great riots in Philadelphia at first sometimes kindled just for the opportunity of uproar and despoliation. In 1849 a hiss at the theatre would have resulted in New York City demolished had it not been for

The Citizen soldiery.

Because of an insult which the famous American actor Edwin Forrest had received in England from the friends of Mr. Macready, the English actor, when the latter appeared in New York, in Macbeth, the distinguished Englishman was hissed and mobbed, the walls of the city having been placarded with the announcement: "Shall Americans or English live in this city?" Streets were filled with a crowd, insane with passion. The riot act was read, but it only evoked louder yells and heavier volleys of stones, and the whole city was threatened with violence and assassination. But the Seventh Regiment, under General Duryea, marched through Broadway, preceded by mounted troops, and at the command: "Fire! Guard! Fire!" the mob scattered, and New York was saved. What would have become of Chicago, two or three years ago, when the police lay down in the streets, had not the sharp commands of military officers been given. Do not charge such scenes upon American institutions. They are as old as the Ephesian mob that howled for two hours in Paul's time about the theatre, and the ruins of which I stood last January. Try re witnessed in 1675 in London, when the ivers paraded the streets and entered builds to destroy the machinery of those who, bese of their new inventions, could undersell rest. They were witnessed in 1781 at the l of Lord George Gordon, when there was a gious riot. Again, in 1719, when the rabble

d, "Down with the Presbyterians! Down the meeting-houses!" There always have n, and always will be, in great communities, ass of people that cannot govern themselves which ordinary means cannot govern, and e are exigencies which nothing but the rd can meet. Aye, the militia are the very regiments that it will be safe to disband.

The Sword in Civil Life.

rbitrament will take the place of war ben nation and nation, and national armies disband as a consequence, and the time will e—God hasten it!—when there will be no l of an American army or navy, or a Russian y or navy. But some time after that, cities have to keep their armories, and arsenals, well-drilled militia, because until the millenday there will be populations with whom trament will be as impossible as treaty with vern of hyenas or a jungle of snakes. These who rob stores and give garroter's hug, and l about the wharves at midnight, and rattle dice in gambling-hells, and go armed with l or dirk, will refrain from disturbance of public peace just in proportion as they ret that the militia of a city, instead of being skward squad, and in danger of shooting other by mistake, or losing their own life ooking down into the gun-barrel to see s loaded, or getting the ramrod fast in their leg, are prompt as the sunrise, keen as the wind, potent as a thunderbolt, and ace, and regular, and disciplined, in their ements as the planetary system. Well done, I say to legislatures, and governors, and rs, and all officials who decide upon larger ries and better places for drill and more ore equipment for the militia. The sooner word can safely go back to the scabbard to here, the better; but until the hilt clangs at the case in that final lodgment, let the l be kept free from rust; sharp all along dge, and its point like a needle, and the le polished, not only by the chamois of the mental servant, but by the hand of brave and otic officers, always ready to do their full

Such swords are not bathed in impetuous-r bathed in cruelty, or bathed in oppresor bathed in outrage, but bathed in heaven.

The Qualities it Develops.

ore I speak of the doom of the sword, let so say that it has developed the grandest es that the world ever saw. It has develcourage—that sublime energy of the soul i defies the universe when it feels itself to the right. It has developed a self-sacrihich repudiates the idea that our life is more than anything else, when for a prinit throws that life away, as much as to say, not necessary that I live, but it is necessary ighteousness triumph. There are tens of ands among the Northern and Southern ns of our civil war, who are ninety-five ent larger and mightier in soul, than they l have been, had they not, during the four of national agony, turned their back on and fortune, and at the front sacrificed r a principle. It was the sword which on orthern side developed a Grant, a McClellan, oker, a Hancock, a Sherman, a Sheridan, dmirals Farragut and Porter and on the ern side a Lee, a Jackson, a Hill, a Gordon
e Johnstons, Albert Sydney and Joseph E., dmiral Semmes, and many Federals and derates whose graves in national cemeare marked "Unknown," yet who were self-sacrificing and brave as any of their generals, and whose resting places all up own the banks of the Androscoggin, the on, the Potomac, the Mississippi and the ma, have recently been snowed under with flowers typical of resurrection, and strewn ed flowers commemorative of the carnage through which they passed, and the blue flowers illustrative of the skies through which they ascended.

Its Doom.

But the sword is doomed. There is one word that needs to be written in every throne-room, in every war-office, in every navy-yard, in every national council. That word is Disarmament.
But no government can afford to throw its sword away until all the great governments have agreed to do the same. Through the influence of the recent convention of North and South American governments at Washington, and through the Peace Convention to be held next July in London, and other movements in which prime ministers, and kings, and queens, and sultans, and czars shall take part, all civilized nations will come to disarmament and if a few barbarian races decline to quit war, then all the decent nations will send out a force of Continental police to wipe out from the face of the earth the miscreants. But until disarmament and consequent arbitration shall be agreed to by all the great governments, any single government that dismantles its fortresses, and spikes its guns, and breaks its sword, would simply invite its own destruction. Suppose, before such general agreement, England should throw away her sword; think you France has forgotten Waterloo? Suppose before such general agreement Germany should throw away her sword;
how long would Alsace and Lorraine stay as they are? Suppose the czar of Russia before any such general agreement should throw away his sword; all the eagles and vultures and lions of European power would gather for a piece of the Russian bear. Suppose the United States without any such general agreement of disarmament should throw away her sword; it would not be long before the Narrows of our harbor would be ablaze with the bunting of foreign navies coming here to show the folly of the "Monroe Doctrine."

Its Burden.

Side by side the two movements must go.
Complete armament until all agree to disarmament. At the same command of "Halt!" all nations halting. At the same command of "Ground arms!" all muskets thumping. At the same command of "Break ranks!" all armies disbanding. That may be nearer than you think. The standing army is the nightmare of nations. England wants to get rid of it, Germany is being eaten up by it, Russia is almost taxed to death with it. Suppose that the millions of men belonging to the standing armies of the world and in absolute idleness, for the most part of their lives, should become producers, instead of consumers.
Would not the world's prosperities improve,
and the world's morals be better? Or have you the heathenish idea that war is necessary to kill off the surplus populations of the earth, and that without it, the world would be so crowded there would soon be no reserved seats and even the standing-room would be exhausted? Ah! I think we can trust to the pneumonias, and the consumption, and the levers, and the Russian gripes to kill the people fast enough. Beside that, when the world gets too full God will blow up the whole concern and start another world and a better one. Beside that, war kills the people who can least be spared. It Takes the Pick of the Nations.

Those whom we could easily spare are in the penitentiary, and their duties detain them in that limited sphere. No; it is the public-spirited and the valorous who go out to die. Mostly are they young men. If they were aged, and had only five or ten years at the most to live, the sacrifice would not be so great. But it is those who have forty or fifty years to live who step into the jaws of battle. In our war Colonel Ellsworth, fell while yet a mere lad. Renowned Mc Pherson was only thirty five. Magnificent Reynolds was only forty-three. Hundreds of thousands fell between twenty and thirty years of age. I looked into the faces of the French, and German troops as they went out to fight at Sedan, and they were for the most part armies of splendid boys. So in all ages war has preferred to sacrifice the young. Alexander the Great died at thirty-two. When war slays the young it not only takes down that which they are, but that which they might have been.

So we are glad at the Isaiahic prophecy, that the time is coming when nation shall not lift up sword against nation. Indeed, both swords shall go back into the scabbard—the sword bathed in heaven and the sword bathed in hell.
In a war in Spain a soldier went on a skirmishing expedition and, secluded in a bush, he had the opportunity of shooting a soldier of the other army, who had strolled away from his tent. He took aim and dropped him. Running up to the fallen-man he took his knapsack for spoil, and a letter dropped out of it, and it turned out to be a letter signed by his own father; in other words, he had shot his brother. If the brotherhood of man be a true doctrine, then he who shoots another man always shoots his own brother. What a horror is war and

Its Cruelties.

was well illustrated when the Tartars after sweeping through Russia and Poland, displayed with pride nine great sacks filled with the right ears of the fallen, and when a correspondent of the London Times, writing of the wounded after the battle of Sedan, said: "Every moan that the human voice can utter rose from that heap of agony, and the cries of 'water! For the love of God, water! A doctor! A doctor!' never ceased."
After war has wrought such cruelties, how glad we will be to have the Old Monster himself die.
Let his dying couch be spread in some dismantled fortress, through which the stormy winds howl. Give him for a pillow a battered shield, and let his bed be hard with the rusted bayonets of the slain. Cover him with the coarsest blanket that picket ever wore, and let his only cup be the bleached bone of one of his war-chargers, and the last taper by his bedside expire as the midnight blast sighs into his ear: "The candle of the wicked shall be put out." To-night against the sky of the glorious future

I See a Great Blaze.

It is a foundry in blast. The workmen have stirred the fires until the furnaces are seven times heated. The last wagon-load of the world's swords has been hauled into the foundry, and they are tumbled into the furnace, and they begin to glow and redden and melt, and in hissing and sparkling liquid they roll on down through the crevice of rock until they fall into a mold shaped like the iron foot of a plough. Then the liquid cools off into a hard metal, and, brought out on an anvil, it is beaten and pounded and fashioned, stroke after stroke, until that which was a weapon to reap harvests of men, becomes an implement turning the soil for harvests of corn, the Sword having Become the Plowshare.

Officers and comrades of the Thirteenth Regiment of State militia: After another year of pleasant acquaintance I hail you with a salutation all made up of good wishes and prayers.
Honored with residence in the best city of the best land under the sun, let us dedicate ourselves anew to God and country and home! In the English conflict, called "the War of the Roses," a white rose was the badge of the House of York, and the red rose the badge of the House of Lancaster, and with these two colors they opposed each other in battle. To enlist you in the Holy War for all that is good against all that is wrong, I pin over your heart two badges, the one suggestive of the blood shed for our redemption and the other symbolic of a soul made white and clean, the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley. Be these henceforth our regimental symbols—Rose and Lily, Lily and Rose!

"The Christian Herald" Binder. — Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely.
A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

THE OPENING OF THE REICHSTAG.

(See illustration on first page.)

THE attention of thinking men, the world over, is, in these days, attracted to Germany. The condition of affairs there is being watched with intense interest. The changes which have taken place as the result of Bismarck's fall, the expectation that the balance of political power will be changed now, that the weight of the personality of the chancellor has been taken out of the scale, the strange spectacle of a young Kaiser combining extreme views of the divine right with the doctrines heretofore associated with Socialism—all these unite to make the political and social situation in Germany a study of absorbing interest. We therefore present on the first page a picture of the ceremony of the opening of the new Reichstag by the Emperor—and with it such a sketch of the situation as may help our readers to understand the news they may get in their daily papers from Germany during the next few weeks.

The German Congress

is what the Reichstag practically is, though it differs from our Congress in many important details. The German Empire is a Union of twenty-one monarchical States and three independent republican municipalities. The President of this Union is the King of Prussia, who as such has the title of German Emperor, and is represented in the national legislature, the Reichstag, by the Chancellor of the Empire, who also presides over the deliberations of the Bundesrath, a body composed of special envoys—resident of the several States. From this body emanate the bills which the government introduces in the Reichstag, and the leading spirit in the Bundesrath is the Chancellor, who thus has great opportunities of becoming an autocrat, such as Bismarck was. He knew perfectly well what he wanted, and having carried the Bundesrath with him he proceeded to carry the Reichstag, too. This he sometimes did by an adroit combination of parties, sometimes by a skilful separation of his opponents, sometimes by other secret means; and if all these failed, the Reichstag was dissolved. By no means could it stand against the Chancellor. If it would not yield it must go.

A New Era

is now proclaimed. The young Kaiser announces that he has resolved to end the days of official dictation. He has instructed his new Chancellor, General Caprivi, to state publicly that in future the wishes of the several political parties and their propositions were to be duly considered. Should Emperor William adhere to this programme, Germany will for the first time have a constitutional government, in fact, as well as in name. If this is to be carried out, the Reichstag will essentially differ from its former standing, when, as a matter of fact, it was little more than a debating society whose decisions had no practical power over State policy.

The Reichstag

is composed of 397 members. These serve without salary, and although life in Berlin is expensive, they are strictly forbidden to receive any pecuniary help from the political parties, who would, in many cases, gladly pay for the privilege of being represented by men too poor to pay their own charges in the capital. Some members have been prosecuted by the Government for receiving money from the political clubs. The member of the Reichstag has a free pass on the railroad from his home to Berlin and back, for every session of the Reichstag and no more; that he gets from the Government. Formerly he was elected for three years, with this Reichstag the term is made five years. The elections are by manhood suffrage, and the machinery for casting and counting the votes is equal to our own.

A remarkable feature of the political situation in Germany, is the large number of parties into which the Reichstag and the community that elects it are divided. It is easy to see how this weakens its power and influence. If it were divided, as with us, and in England, two parties, compact and united, its power would soon be felt; but there are about eighteen parties, each of which has some one or two votes solidly upon that, but breaks up and scatters on other questions. One party group wants Denmark rehabilitated; another wants France to get back her conquered provinces; the Hanoverians wish to secede from under Prussian domination; a turbulent Polish contingent prays for Kosciusko and—the coming of the Messiah; the Roman Catholic party promises to make trouble until the Emperor invites the Pope to share his throne; and the Socialists want a general rearrangement of social conditions. Bismarck could always rely on the support of the Imperial Conservatives and the National Liberals, and it was his custom to purchase, with some concessions, the support of a sufficient number of other groups to give him a working majority. In the Reichstag of 1887, he combined three quasi-conservative groups, which were called the Cartel, or coalition party, which became a mere government machine, and earned general unpopularity in the country.

An Influential Party,

not in numbers, but in weight of ability and in the growing confidence of the thinking men of the country, is the Freisinnige, or Constitutional party. These are moderate men, set for the strict interpretation of the Constitution, and opposed to bureaucratic government on the one hand and Socialism on the other. This party was Bismarck's abomination, because it exposed the inconsistency of his projects with merciless logic, and showed the motives which prompted them, pointing out which represented the Chancellor's real principles, and which were practically bribes to keep his cartel together. This party was always on the watch for any blunder of the Chancellor's, and exulted in any check that he received at home or abroad. In many of its principles—notably the opposition to protection as a fiscal principle—it resembles the Democratic party with us, but necessarily differs from it in many other of its principles. It numbers only sixty-three in the present Reichstag. Its chief leader is Eugene Richter, but his want of tact and his dictatorial manner have alienated some members of the party. These are disposed to follow Dr. Theo. Barth, editor of the Berlin Nation, another prominent member of the party.

The Socialists, who polled 1,427,323 votes at the last Reichstag elections—a gain of 664,195 since the elections of 1887—hold thirty-five seats. Prominent among the Socialist Deputies are Paul Singer, a cloak manufacturer, and Ignaz Auer, of Munich, a harness-maker by trade, and a man of nerve and great oratorical power. There are three anti-Semites in the Reichstag. Court-Chaplain Adolph Stoecker is the leader of these, a man whose method for improving the condition of the country is to root out every creed but his own; Max Hugo Libermann, formerly an officer and now doing literary work, and Otto Boeckel, a printer in Marburg, and publisher of the Reichs-Herald, the organ of the anti-Semites.

The Opening Ceremony

of this new Reichstag, which is the eighth since the German Empire was proclaimed in 1871, was a scene of great magnificence. Every one felt that it was the first scene of an era momentous to Germany, and through Germany to the whole world. The Fatherland was about to take its place in the van of civilization, and to lead in the new dispensation of recognition of the rights of labor. The Emperor's speech was, therefore, awaited with eager expectation, and all the leaders of society, and of the old system of aristocratic predominance were gathered to hear it. The Empress was present, and the diplomatic gallery was filled with the representatives of foreign powers. When the Emperor and the court entered, there was a general cheer, spontaneous and sincere. As he rose with the paper in his hand, there was a hush of expectation and an impressive silence, which continued throughout its reading, broken only by here and there a shout of applause. In firm, well-separated words he read to an assembly of statesmen, warriors, and diplomats, such a speech as Germans, at least, have not been brought up to expect from such a quarter. Prussian kings usually have been little more than soldiers. One or two have been dreamy scholars or amateurs in art. Never until now, has a Hohenzollern publicly pledged himself to the service of every-day workers, the plain people of the country, recognizing them as the real basis of national happiness as opposed to the pretensions of any caste or class. Not a syllable of his words was indistinctly uttered, nor was any effort made by him in the direction of oratory.

The Emperor's Speech

was in no way a disappointment. His Majesty said he hoped it would be practicable at the present session to solve the important and pressing questions which would come up for consideration. He wanted, above all things, to effect further legislation for the protection of the workingmen. The strike movements during the past year had suggested an examination of the question whether the laws of the existing State organization adequately took into account those wishes of the workingmen which were justifiable and capable of realization.

The questions claiming the most attention were those of Sunday rest, and the restriction of women's and children's labor. The federal governments were convinced that the proposals of the last Reichstag might, in their essential points, become a law and be carried into practice without detriment to other interests. The legislative provisions for the protection of workingmen against dangers threatening their lives, health and morals, were susceptible of amendment, and were also the laws relative to the issue of labor regulations. The rules concerning workmen's books also required to be supplemented with the object of assuring parental authority in view of the increasing insubordination among youthful workingmen. His Majesty said that bill on this subject would be laid before the Reichstag.

Another bill would be submitted for the better regulation and organization of industrial courts of arbitration so that the courts may be appealed to for the settlement of disputes between employers and the employed.

Anxious for Reforms.

The Emperor continued:—"I trust you are willing to co-operate in order to bring about an agreement between the legislative bodies upon the proposed reforms, and thus take a significant forward step in the peaceful development of the conditions of labor. A just solicitude for the workmen constitutes the most effective means by which to strengthen the resources with which I and my exalted allies are resolved to oppose with unbending determination any attempt to disturb the legal order of things. In effecting these reforms only such measures will come up for consideration as can be carried out without endangering the industry of the Fatherland. Our industry only forms a link in the economic work of the nations competing in the world's markets. I have therefore made a point of going about among the European States where economic position has the same character, for the exchange of views regarding a joint recognition of the legislation required to protect workmen. I most gratefully acknowledge the favorable reception of my suggestions by the States concerned.

"The resolutions adopted by the recent Law Conference in Berlin expressed their common views upon the most important field of work and culture of our time. I do not doubt that the principles laid down in those resolutions will form the seed, under God's help from which will spring up happiness. The workingmen will be blessed by the fruit, which will be harmonious relations between the people."

The affairs of Germany, such as usually form the main topics of imperial and royal speeches, were then summarily dealt with. The brevity with which they were handled, showing by comparison how much more urgent the Emperor deemed the subject of the rights of labor. The full text of his speech, made about eight hundred inches of type in a German newspaper, ten

h relate to the workingman, two to foreign ions, two to the army, one to the budget,
one only to colonial enterprise in Africa.
metically, one might conclude that all the ches of his government together do not t for as much in his estimation as the daily of the nation's backbone.

EVANGELIST H. R. KEATES.

(See Portrait on Page 364.)

TE wonderful revival now in progress in teenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, York, is attracting general attention through city. It had a small beginning, but it has n steadily, and now seems destined to be a widespread movement. It will, therefore, rest our readers to see the portrait of the
who has been used of God to start the work, it is now given on another page of this issue.
H. R. Keates is an Englishman, though he spent a considerable time in this country.
was born at Wolverton in 1846. He had a y father and mother, and was early trained ious ways. But as he grew up he strayed the paths of frivolity. At one time he was ngly attracted to the stage, and even made appearance there on one or two occasions own to his father and mother. He dis-ed so much talent that he was offered a lar engagement with a theatrical company.
contract was duly drawn up and the mana-signature attached; but Keates would not until he had taken a night to think of it.
night his mother was praying for him. She a presentiment that some crisis in his life impending and she went to his room after ad retired to rest and spoke to him so stly that the next morning, when he rose, rest act was to burn the contract.
was not until 1874, however, that he was y brought to Christ. Then he began to with all his heart. First, he labored among men under him in the railroad office in h he was employed, and he was blessed in ng many of them to the Saviour. After-rd, he became a preacher in the Methodist ch, and still later he joined the Salvation
r. He remained in that organization five g, and held a very responsible position in it gland, and afterward in America. He had conscientious scruples about some of the t developments of that movement, and decided that it was his duty to resign.
t this time he became acquainted with p Richardson, of the Reformed Episcopal ch, formerly of Chicago, whom he met in nd. The Bishop encouraged him in his
: to give himself to the direct work of soul-g and ordained him to the ministry. At ad of last year he came to this country.

AN UNSATISFACTORY LIFE.

y of the S. S. Golden Text for June 15: "Take l, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life isteth not in the abundance of the things
h he possesseth." (Luke 12: 15.)

a small office, the shelves of which were with papers, sat Mr. Mendon, the head of mercantile house whose transactions in-l millions of dollars annually. He was writing, as he had been since early in the ng, with occasional intervals, in which he udience to heads of departments, to his
; and to various representatives of firms hom he had business relations.
had written without interruption for near-hour when a card was brought to him
g the name of the Rev. Frank Davidson.
itated a moment, and was half inclined to ord that he was too busy to see the call-finally changed his mind, and told the o send him in. The visitor was the new of a church in the street near Mr. Men-business premises. He briefly explained id then said that he was raising a sub-o start in business a woman who had y been bereaved of her husband, who en a clerk in Mr. Mendon's employ.
Mendon looked earnestly at the clergy-hile he was speaking, then glanced over the subscription list, and wrote a cheque for a liberal sum. The clergyman thanked him and was about to leave, when Mr. Mendon said:

"I have been trying to think when and where I can have met you before. Your features are familiar, and yet I fail to place you."

The clergyman smiled. "Recall Dr. Arnold's Latin class," he said, "and the boy who used to sit next to you there, and you will have it."

Mr. Mendon sprang from his chair, and grasped the clergyman's hand. "Why, Frank," he said, "how stupid of me. Of course, I remember you perfectly, though I have not seen you for thirty years. And so you went in for theology, after all, as you used to say you would, and you are come to St. Stephen's? Well, it is not often I see an old school-fellow; you must come and dine with me. I will let the work go for this evening."

The clergyman, after some ineffectual resistance, yielded, and the two men were soon on their way to the merchant's splendid mansion, outside the city. It was a beautiful home, luxuriously furnished. Pictures, books, a lovely garden, and all that could be purchased with money to make life enjoyable had been added to the home. Mr. Davidson strolled through the house and grounds by the side of the proprietor, and listened to the stories he told of how he acquired this and that precious treasure.

"You must be very happy here," he said, as they entered the dining-room after the survey
"At any rate you have all the means of happiness that money can procure."

"Yes," said Mr. Mendon, "I suppose I ought to be happy, but I cannot say that I am. I used to think, when I bought this place and began to fill it with such things as I liked that after I had made a certain sum, I would quit business and settle down to enjoy my life. But I begin to realize that I could not enjoy the quiet and rest.
Work and money-getting have become a second nature to me."

"That is possible, I suppose," said Mr. Davidson.

"Yes, I am proud of the place, but it does not content me. When I am here I spend most of the time in this room and my little office in the rear. I look over it periodically to see that it is in order, but it gives me little pleasure."

"Why do you work so hard?"

"The business requires it. It is a splendid success. You would be surprised to know what it brings in. It would be a sin to leave it for some one else to spoil."

"And how about your soul? It is a clergyman's question; but let me ask it as your friend."

"Ah! the answer will not satisfy you; it does not satisfy me. I have been too busy to attend to it. I know I ought not to say so. I have always meant to make that an earnest matter. At first I put it off, with other things, until I had made a fortune. And then I had so much else to think of. But I must not put it off much longer. Now you have come, you will help me, and I'll come to your church."

"That is very sad. I had great hopes of you as a boy. I thought you would be a great preacher or a missionary."

"Ah! I have done better, have I not?"
And Mr. Mendon looked around the room and out of the window over his grounds.

"In a worldly point of view—yes. But if you lose your soul you had better have remained poor. Come, my friend, let us pray together, now."

"No, it would be of no use. I have not time to attend to religion, and when I do begin I want to go on. In a few weeks some important matter will be closed up, and then I will begin without fail. Come, don't look so serious. I will make you a definite promise. In a month from to-day you shall come here and hold me to it,
and put me in the way."

Mr. Davidson had to accept that promise as the best he could obtain, but before the month had passed he was called to read the burial service over the remains of his friend, and he knew that there was no hope in his death.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Girl Who Heard with Her Eyes, Astonished a gentleman who recently paid a visit to the New York Asylum for Deaf Mutes. As he was approaching the building he met a bright young lady, of whom he asked: "Can you direct me to the asylum?" "Yes," she said, "it is over yonder, and as I am going there, I will show you the way. Have you any children there?" "No," he replied. "I am going to attend the annual exhibition." They had a pleasant walk through the grounds, and all the way the young lady and her companion kept up an interesting conversation. When nearing the main entrance he asked her how many children were in the institution, and she replied that there were over three hundred deaf mutes, and a number of pupils who were deaf, but could speak as well as anybody. "I am one of the latter," she added. "I can speak fairly well, as you perceive, but I have never heard a sound." "How on earth, then," asked her surprised companion, "have you been able to answer my questions if you did not hear them?" "Oh!" said she, with a smile at the astonishment of the other. "We hear with our eyes."
The man could scarcely believe it, but it proved to be true. It is so in spiritual matters. The poor and the ignorant, and those who have the least natural advantages, often astonish us by their quickness to hear and understand the things of God. (Matt. 11: 25.)

A Bidder at an Auction Sale Was Unjustly condemned by the whole company recently.
The Constitution, of Atlanta, Ga., in reporting
the sale by auction of some household effects, says, that one of the lots was a pretty pair of crutches. In the crowd was a poor crippled boy, and the crutches were just the right length for him. He was the first to bid on the crutches.
An elderly well-dressed man bid against him.
There were cries of "Shame!" "Shame!" in the crowd. The boy made another bid, and once more he was overbid by the same old gentleman. The boy bid all he was able, and turned away with tears in his eyes. The crutches were knocked down to the elderly man, and to the great surprise of all he took them to the poor little boy and made him a present of them.
There probably never was an old man who was more abused and praised in such a short space of time as was the purchaser of the crutches. But he heard none of it, and disappeared even before the grateful boy could thank him. The time will come when many events which now we speak of as the inscrutable dispensations of Providence, will be seen in a similar light. God thwarts our efforts, and brings to nothing our well meant designs, in order that He may do better for us than we hoped to do for ourselves. (Rom. 8: 28.)

A Murderer's Extraordinary Confession Is Reported from Springfield Mo. On May 22d the sheriff of Stone County placed a man in prison who said he had committed a murder; that he and another man had planned to rob and murder an old school-teacher. The old teacher was persuaded to go with them to Stone County, Mo., to look for a location for a little store which he wanted to establish. When the men reached Cow Creek, a wild and lonely region on the Missouri border, the victim was persuaded to leave the main road and take a path leading through a deep hollow. There the murderer says he accompanied him and shot him twice and took his money and watch. After robbing his victim he thought of killing himself, but the dying man begged him to live and try to get forgiveness for the crime. The most unique part of the confession is the murtherer's statement that he asked the dying man to pray for him, and that the murderer and his victim did actually clasp hands in that lonely hollow and pray together.
It was Christlike magnanimity and it is not surprising that the murderer feels remorse at killing such a man. The time is coming when every man who has rejected Christ who prayed for His murderers and all who have been unfaithful to Him after calling themselves Christians will feel still greater remorse, "seeing that they crucify the Son of God afresh." (Heb. 6: 6.)

THE NIGHT COMETH.

By W. E. Blackstone.*

The Age of Progress—Not in Godliness—The Night of Infidelity following the Age of Discovery—The World Exposed to Satan's Insidious Attacks—The Antichrist at Hand—Progress in Refinement—Vice and Unbelief Rampant—The Savorless Salt—Only One Soil Productive—The Laodicean Age.

WE hear in these days so much boasting of the advance of science, the discoveries of philosophers, and the achievements of art, that we are not surprised to learn that this age is beyond all others the age of progress. But all the progress made does not prove that there is an increase of Godliness in the world. Many of the acknowledged leaders, to-day, in science and philosophy, yes, even those who rank the very highest among them, are positive infidels.

It is strange, indeed, that the Christian optimists, in their noisy trumpetings of the strides of science, should lose sight of this momentous fact. It is not improbable that all this vaunted progress may usher in and wickedness of devilish malignity. It has been so before in the world's history. The power, splendor, and wisdom of David and Solomon were followed by the idolatry and the shedding of innocent blood of the reign of Ahab and Manasseh, resulting in the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the Babylonish captivity. The temple, built by Herod, was one of the grandest works of art. It flashed with splendor, and the temple service was conducted on a magnificent scale. The Jews of his time enjoyed great privileges in literature and learning, and yet they crucified the Lord Jesus.

A Period of Unbelief

The world by "wisdom" or philosophy" (Col. 2:8), or "science falsely so called" (1 Tim. 6:20) can never find out God. Indeed, we have a clear evidence of this, in the rationalism, infidelity, and atheism of our day. No matter how refined and polished is their garb or the delicacy with which they may be set forth, still they are only the poisonous deceptions of Him, who can appear as "an angel of light" (2 Cor. 11:14). The truth is, that Satan is the arch enemy of God, and the world, in this present evil age (Gal. 1:4) is in his power (John 5:19) so that he begets the people of God with his "wiles," and arrays against them "principalities . . . powers . . ." and the rulers of the darkness of this world." (Eph. 6:11-13.)

Darkness Coming.

Surely, then, this wicked world, which is so radically opposed to God, and under the present control of His arch enemy, is not growing better. On the contrary, judgment, fire and perdition are before it. (2 Pet. 2:2-6; Jude 7; Mark 9:43-48, etc., etc.) Perilous times are coming (1 Tim. 4:1, etc. 2 Tim. 3:1, etc.). "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." The tares, which naturally grow much faster than the wheat, shall continue up to the harvest. (Matt. 13:40.) "The mystery of iniquity," which already worked in the days of the apostles, shall culminate in "the man of sin" the personal Antichrist, whom even the mass of the Jews will receive (John 5:43; Isa. 28:15-22), and who will be so great and rule with such universal authority, that he is to be destroyed only by the personal appearing of the Lord Himself. (2 Thess. 2:8.)

There is no hope then, for the world but in the coming of Christ the King. And praised be God for the promises. The Lord will come at the end of this age. Antichrist will be destroyed (2 Thess. 2:8; Rev. 19:20). All things that offend shall be gathered out (Matt. 13:41-43) and the Millennial Kingdom of righteousness shall be established on the earth.

But it is insisted that the world has made Progress in Civilization and refinement, in benevolence, in personal liberty, international fraternity, Christian work, etc. In proof of this, the abrogation of slavery is often cited—also the cessation of the inquisition and martyrdom—the establishment of charitable institutions, the great postal and commercial means of communication, built upon the agencies of steam and lightning—the right of trial by jury, international arbitration, missionary triumphs, etc. But we answer that civilization and refinement are not the source of holiness. They may elevate the head while the heart is untouched. The gilded palace of sin is as certainly the gateway to hell, as the darkest den of vice. The cultured and scientific atheist is as surely in the service of Satan, as the thief or the murderer. Jesus Himself classed them all together when He said "he that is not with me is against me." (Matt. 12:30.) So it matters not how much more like an angel of light the serpent may appear, nor how civilized and refined the world may be. Satan is the devil still. And the world is still the world.

His ways and methods may change, but

The Spirit of Darkness

is the same. And accordingly, we see that while slavery is disappearing—Communism, Socialism, and Nihilism, are lifting their godless, headless forms. And darker are their forebodings than were even the days of the inquisition and martyrdom. Oppressing monopolies, systematic speculation and fraud are parallel with charitable institutions. The mails, so useful for news and correspondence, afford a most convenient agency for disseminating the flood of obscene literature which is blasting the morals of the young. Trial by jury has too often proved a mere farce, in which the criminal escapes. The nation which opened the way for the missionary, also forced upon the teeming millions of China the awful curse of opium.

It is also argued that, as Christians are the light of the world, and the salt of the earth (Matt. 5:13, 16; Phil. 2:15), the greatly increased number of professed Christians must certainly have augmented the light and the salt, and consequently have made the world better. But let us notice carefully that Jesus speaks of the salt losing its saltiness and becoming good for nothing, and He also intimates that the light may be hid under a bushel. And therefore He exhorts. "Have salt in yourselves." (Mark 9:50.) Evidently the Jews lost their "savor," (Matt. 5:13) and "were broken off." (Rom. 11:20.) This leads to the solemn query—is the professing Church progressing or declining in faith and spiritual life?

The Kingdom in Mystery

(Matt. 13:10, 11), or the state of Christendom until Christ comes again, is taught us, we believe, by the parables of Matt. 13. "The parable of the sower shows the varied and imperfect reception of the Word. The parable of the tares shows the early and continued effect of Satan's presence among the saints. The parable of the mustard-seed shows outward growth sheltering evil. The parable of the leaven shows the gradual and utter corruption of the truth. The parable of the treasure hid in a field shows what Israel is to be in the world. The parable of the pearl of great price shows what the Church is to Christ. And the parable of the drag-net shows the cleansing of the kingdom at His Second Coming."

There is, perhaps, but little opposition to this interpretation of the parables, excepting that of the leaven, which has been extensively interpreted to teach exactly the opposite, viz., that the power and influence of the Gospel or Christian life is to permeate the masses of the world, until the whole is leavened into holiness. The inconsistency of this is seen when we consider that precisely the contrary is taught by the parable of the sower and the tares, each of which most undisputably show that evil is to continue and grow up to the end of the age. This is surely the most sufficient and scriptural reason for assigning the same typical meaning to the leaven, in this and the correlative passage (Luke 13:21), which we find it to bear in the numerous other passages, where the same word is used, viz., the corrupting influence of evil and the symbol of death.

Here then we are most emphatically taught not only that the world is growing no better, but that the professing Church itself, will lose its saltiness, becoming nominal and lukewarm whose end is graphically depicted. (Rev. 3:16) The entire teaching of the Word of God, we believe, agrees with this.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Blood Bought Ivory.*

EVERY tusk, piece and scrap [of ivory] in the possession of an Arab trader has been steeped and dyed in blood. Every pound weight has cost the life of a man, woman, or child; for every five pounds a hut has been burned; for every two tusks a whole village has been destroyed; every twenty tusks have been obtained at the price of a district, with all its people, villages, and plantations. It is simply incredible that because ivory is required for ornaments or billiard game the rich heart of Africa should be laid waste this late year of the nineteenth century, signified as it has been by so much advance; the populations, tribes, and nations should be utterly destroyed.

Starvation Camp.

After informing the unfortunate cripples our intention to proceed forward until we could find food, that we might not all be lost, and seek relief as quickly as it could be obtained, I counted the fifty-two men, eighty-one loads and ten canoes in charge of Captain Nelson, bade him be of good cheer, and, hoisting our loads and boat on our shoulders, we marched away.

No more gloomy spot could have been selected for a camp than that sandy terrace, encompassed by rocks, and hemmed in narrowly by the dark woods, which rose from the river's edge to the height of six hundred feet, and presented the never-ceasing uproar which was created by the writhing and tortured stream, and the two cataracts which ever rivalled each other in thunder. The imagination shudders at the helpless position of those crippled men.

And what of us, trudging up those wooded slopes to gain the crest of the forest upland, tramp on and on, whither, we knew not, for how long a time we dared not think, seeking for food with the double responsibility weighing us down for these trustful, brave fellows with us, and those, no less brave and trustful, whom we had left behind at the bottom of the horrible canon.

Stanley's Donkey Eaten.

Ah, it was a sad sight, unutterably sad, to see so many men struggling on blindly through the endless forest, following one white man, who was bound whither none knew, whom most believed did not know himself! They were in veritable hell of hunger already! What nameless horrors awaited them further on none could conjecture.

My poor donkey from Zanzibar showed symptoms of surrender. Arums and amoma every day since June 28th were no fit food for a dainty Zanzibar ass, therefore to end his misery I shot him. The meat was as carefully shared as though it were the finest venison, for a wild and famished mob threatened to defy discipline. When the meat was fairly served a free fight took place over the skin, the bones were taken up and crushed, the hoofs were boiled for hours, there was nothing left of my faithful animal but a spilled blood and hair; a pack of hyenas could not have made a more thorough disposal of him.

Help at Last.

We descended the slope of the clearing to the little valley, and from all sides of an opposite slope were seen issuing lines of men and women to welcome us with friendly hails. We looked to the right and left, and saw thriving fields, Indian corn, rice, sweet potatoes, and beans. The well-known sounds of Arab greeting and hospitable tenders of friendship burst upon our ears; and our hands were soon clasped by lusty, huge fellows, who seemed to enjoy life in the wilds as much as they could have enjoyed it in their own lands. These came principally from

* From his work entitled Jesus is Coming. Pp. 156; price 30 cents; published by F. H. Revell, 148 Madison street, Chicago.

* From Mr. H. M. Stanley's article on the Emin Pasha relief expedition in Scribner's Magazine for June, which contains also articles on "City Houses," "The Rights of the Citizen," "Amateur Field Athletics," three chapters of Harold Frederic's serial story and other interesting matter. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

nyema, though their no less stout slaves, arm-with percussion muskets and carbines, echo-heartily their superiors' sentiments and professions.

We were conducted up the sloping clearing through fields of luxuriant grain, by troops of men and youngsters, who were irrepressibly licentious in their joy at the new arrivals and the promise of a holiday. On arrival at the village we were invited to take our seats in the shady verandas, where we soon had to answer to hosts of questions and congratulations. The caravan filed past us to its allotted quarters, which men were appointed to show, numerous were the praises to God uttered by them for our marvellous escapes from the terrible loneliness that stretched from their settlement to the Basopo Cataract, a distance of miles—praises in which, in our inmost hearts, one of our sorely tried caravans most readily joined.

THE RICH FOOL.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Lesson for June 15, Luke 12: 13-21; Golden Text, Luke 12: 15.

Life the Leaven of the Pharisees—A Secretive Life—An Unanswered Prayer—A Type of Many—Warning Against Covetousness—Spiritual Covetousness Possible—The Glory of Service—The consistency of the Money-Making Christian—A Product of a Degenerate Time—The Man's Interview with his Soul—The Authoritative Listener—His Judgment—The Terrible Summons to the Hardened Soul.

JESUS was teaching His disciples, as He often in the presence of the multitude. The soul of God's children is no secret place; God reveals Himself to the world by His dealings with His children. He had been saying to them, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." What was the leaven which specially belonged to the Pharisees? Surely, self-life. The Pharisee liked to attract attention to himself, therefore he made broad his phylacteries and enlarged the borders of his garments; he made long prayers in public; but no mention was made of his "rising up," as Jesus did, "at a while before day," to pray to his Father who is in secret. He loved the first place, the uppermost rooms at feasts . . . and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi." (Matt. 23: 5-7.)

All for Self;

Pharisee had no care for the widow, or the aged, or the needy. Self was his idol; all life, all his prayers, all his hopes centered in himself; he saw the world, and God, and fellow creatures, only in the light of how far they might serve his interests. "Beware of this leaven," said our Lord. It was this which made the Pharisee's prayer to savor of "I"; "I thank thee that I am not as other men are; I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess" (Luke 18: 11, 12.)

Self-life is very secretive; it hides all which is advantageous to it. But Jesus taught "There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, neither hid that shall not be known."

There was power in the words of Jesus, and the multitude could easily observe the hold they had of the disciples. But "the leaven of the Pharisees," was also at work. One of the commentators thought, "If I can only make use of the power which that Man has over the minds of men to influence my brother, I shall get the publicity I have so long desired," and he actually conceived the design of utilizing Jesus for his own purposes! "Master," he said, "speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." The history of most unanswered prayers is a similar one, the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees is in them. Man wants to utilize all power to his own selfish ends, and to be God the servant of his own human will, his earthly ambition, his selfish affection—in short his self-life! And Such Prayers God Cannot Answer.

If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." (John 15: 8.) "He that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto My Father; and whatsoever ye shall ask in My name that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son." But the Father is not glorified in the Son when he who prays does not do the works of Christ, but his own selfish works. The "whatsoever" is granted to him whose life is to do the work and will of Jesus, who, like Paul, can say, "To me to live is Christ."

Jesus answered: "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you? And He said unto them, Take heed; beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." A man's life consists in what he is, not in what he has. A man's possessions may be a mere accident, but his true life is the sphere which he fills toward God and man. He may possess money, houses, lands, titles, or talents, graces, beauty; but all this is outside of his real life. His real life, which tells on earth, and is written in heaven or hell, cannot be independent of his God and of his fellow creatures. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." (Rom. 14: 7.) Lot had great possessions in Sodom, but his possessions did not make him the man he was. It was his self-love which took him down to Sodom, and in order to save his soul the possessions for which he had lived must be destroyed. His life consisted in a divided heart, and his history has come down to us as a warning. Abraham's life consisted not in his sheep and camels, his servants and handmaids, but in his relation to God as His "friend." (Isa. 41: 8.) His riches never helped any one else to become rich, but his relationship to God not only told upon his own generation, but upon every generation of men since, so that to this day the Scripture holds good: "They which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." There is a

Spiritual Covetousness

as well as an earthly covetousness. Some Christians are perpetually straining after some spiritual power or spiritual satisfaction which they want to have, and to be conscious of having—something which seems to them a kind of goal. But here, too, "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesses." Jesus "emptied Himself," (Phil. 2: 7, R. V.) and the Father that dwelt in Him did the works. (John 14: 10.) It was in no consciousness of power as Man that Jesus lived. "I can of Mine own self do nothing," (John 5: 30) He said. The hunger after some superiority of spiritual power—something more than others—is a form of covetousness. The yielded spirit takes the lowest place, and is willing to be nothing and to do nothing, and God says it is the greatest. The noblest spirit is the one who serves, and God says it is the first.

"And He spake a parable unto them, saying: The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully; and he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?" "He thought within himself," took counsel with the meanest counsellor he could find—himself. Paul's idea was, that "laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." (Acts 20: 35.) But the rich man had never yet tasted the luxury of helping the weak. The leaven of the Pharisees, the self-life, had leavened the whole lump, and every conception of his small mind was centered upon his contemptible self. Writing to the Ephesians, Paul says again: "Let him that stole steal no more, but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good,

That we May Have to Give to him that needeth." The possibility of a man, a Christian man, living to increase his own riches, better his own position in the world, or make a name for his family, evidently never entered the mind of Paul. It needed the present degenerate days of the Church that it might be possible for a man to name the name of Christ, and yet to give his life to making a name for himself; to accept of the blood of Christ as the ransom for his soul, and yet spend all the strength of his life to accumulate to himself riches and comforts in the very world in which He who died for him had "not where to lay His head." It needed an age such as ours to develop the awful contrast between a Saviour who "pleased not Himself" and a Church of His professed followers who accept of His salvation, but whose lives are lived not "unto Him who died for them," but to themselves!

When the repentant crowds who hung upon the inspired words of John the Baptist asked him, "What shall we do?" he answered them, "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise." (Luke 3: 11.) But the rich man's counsellor gave him no such advice, and he came to the decision, "This will I do: I will pull down my barns and build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, soul thou hast much goods laid up for many years, eat, drink, and be merry." Miserable man! It was not thus that David talked to his soul; his song was set to another key. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name, bless the Lord O my soul, and forget not all His benefits." (Psa. 103: 1, 2.)

There was one present at the rich man's interview with his soul whom he did not reckon upon, or take into account. He listened silently until the affair was settled, and then broke in with the authority which belongs to Him as the Lord of life and death,

"Thou Fool,

This night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" It is an awful thing for a soul when the first conscious communication from God is a call to surrender a misspent life into the hands of Him who can only be a Judge to him. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." (Prov. 1: 7.) "The fool hath said in his heart, no God." (Psa. 53: 1.) But his saying so cannot blot God out of His universe, nor yet annul the responsibility he himself is under to that God who has created him, provided for his redemption, and who will judge him at the last day. It is the fashion in this day to ignore God, to laugh at the supernatural, and to doubt answers to prayer. "An adulterous and sinful generation" find it inconvenient to have a holy God moving and living and working among them, and so they lift up their created reason against Him who created it, to banish their Maker from the world they live in. Vain hope. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision." (Psa. 2: 2.)

But first, as the Good Shepherd He goeth after the lost sheep. In every man's life, even that of the most worldly, there are moments when the Spirit of God strives with him, and when he is conscious that it is a time of crisis with him. Every man at some time or other has a conviction that God is real. And these are which determine the eternity of a soul. When a sinner at such moments turns away from God, such opportunities become more and more rare. The Spirit, who is quenched, does not force Himself again upon a sinner; and he becomes more and more indifferent and callous, until, like an unexpected thunder-clap, God's voice summons him, "Thou fool," this night thy soul shall be required of thee. Such was the voice which, louder than the Red Sea's roaring, rung in the ears of Pharaoh, such was the awful whisper of the witch of Endor to King Saul, such was the call to the rich man who in his life-time received his good things; the tale of life was told, and they had not begun to live for eternity, their whole existence was one grand, terrible, irremediable mistake, and God's epitaph over such a lost soul is the awful word, "Thou fool." "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God." We exist for God, self is a usurper of His rights, "Christ died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again." (2 Cor. 5: 15.)

Solemn Moments

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

FORWARD!

MOST cheering are the reports that come to us from the Publishing Department of this paper. The field seems illimitable. We believe that a consecrated printing-press is the mightiest of all agencies for lifting the fallen, instructing the ignorant, and saving the lost. We have no faith in the successful doing of anything save that which is done through Christ, in Christ, and for Christ. We want to speak His praise now and forever. We believe His gospel the freshest, fairest, gladdest thing that was ever told. We shall make no compromise with anything hostile to it. We believe in the gospel as Christ lived it, Paul wrote it, Payson prayed it, and Whitefield preached it. We do not want to cut our religion to suit the times, but cut the times to suit religion. We have no sympathy with the modern Christianity that is made up partly of Rationalism, Materialism, and Humanitarianism, with a slight tincture of gospel for flavoring, as ten drops of vanilla go into a gallon of other liquid. We want the "strong meat" of the Word, and not "milk for babes" skimmed and diluted. So many are now trying to feed us with a sort of religious pap sweetened with molasses. We wish we could have a half-dozen John Knoxes walk through our modern Christianity to give it pluck and backbone. If any contributor has on his table directed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an article that looks both ways, half truth and half error, half light and half darkness, let him change the direction on it to the editor of The New York Weak-in-the-Knees, and thus save the plethora of our chip-basket. So also do we more and more believe in denominational brotherhood. With a grandfather born in one denomination, and a father connected with another, and a brother converted at a Methodist "anxious seat," and dearest friends put clear under the water in John Dowling's Baptistery, and near relatives in beautiful Liturgy praying every Sabbath "From famine and pestilence and sudden death Good Lord deliver us,"—we never had any sympathy with a sectarian strife, and as for bigotry, that owl of the night, we always keep on hand a gun loaded and capped to bang away at it. We have known so many good men in all denominations, and so many bad ones, that we have got done asking whether the post and rails that divide the ecclesiastical farms came from Princeton, Andover, Middletown, or Rochester. When we are told that heaven has "on the East three gates, and on the West three gates, and on the North three gates," we dare not compel men to crawl into heaven through our auger-hole. Evangelical always: Sectarian never!

STIR THEM UP.

THERE has somehow got abroad an impression among our young ministers, that the people will not take the unadulterated gospel. It is thought that instead of the theory that men are corrupt and unsavable, save through Christ, we must flatter them with the idea that there is good enough in them, if it could only be brought out—we must flatter them, and tell them what fine fellows they are, and that if they have a little fixing-up they will be all right. Hence, religion is often presented as a weak sentimentality rather than an infinite necessity. To please the fastidious taste of the day, we must make our sermon a sort of cream meringue, light and frothy, and sweet, and almost vanishing at the touch of a spoon. O vast mistake! The people are hungry for a stout gospel with bones in it. The greatest novelty for an audience now is Repentance and Faith. The people are ready to hear, if we are not too great cowards to speak it. Do not let us be patting them on the backs when we ought to be rousing their souls.

THE WEDDING.

It is a bad sign when our hearts make no response to the hilarities of life, and we stand grim and stupid in the presence of those who unite hands and hearts and destinies. If there is anything that stirs my soul in natural scenery, it is to stand at some point where two rivers come down and join each other, each tinged with the story of the forests through which it has rolled, and then, while the hills look on and the woods swing their censers, and the stars put forth their blossoms of light—the two rivers join hands for their journey to the sea. But a more thrilling scene is the conjunction of two immortal lives, born far apart from each other, and watched by different maternal tendernesses, and coming through different experiences, yet just at the right time united to move thereafter together until they reach the sea which bounds our mortal condition. What a matter of thanksgiving to Him who setteth the solitary in families, that in the vast majority of instances it turns out to be that the marital union is the one the very best possible. Because through the gossiping of society and the newspaper press instances of connubial variance come to hand, we are apt to conclude that the whole thing is guess-work, or a lottery in which there are not as many prizes as blanks. We forget that the one instance of marital discord brought more attention than the five thousand instances of marital harmony—just as one violin out of tune would scrape to pieces Thomas' orchestra. I believe that most of the matches are made in heaven, while we must admit that here and there, because of the fume, and bluster, and complaint, and rumpus, and smoke, there seems to be a match whose sulphur indicates the other place. The affiancing may be different from what we expected, but in three-fourths of the cases you are surprised at the coming together of those who have been so opposite; but God, who knows both the temperaments, and all the circumstances decrees for the best. Indeed, it is on these differences of temperaments, the household happiness and success depend. The one is too fast the other too slow; but by counterpoise they are just right. The one is nervous, the other lymphatic, and they counterbalance each other. The one is a spendthrift, and the other miser and the result of the two is a reasonable medium in the uses of money. The one too brilliant and the other too dull, and they compromise a healthful common sense. With this feeling that, however it may seem to us, in all probability the union is for the best, we go to our weddings with our hands full of congratulations, and our hearts full of hope. The more flowers in the hair, the more silver among the bride's presents, the more jubilant the music, the better it pleases us. We give a hearty amen to all the prayers. Our best wishes go on with the ring, and as the trunk is heaved to the carriage-box, and the sound of the swift wheels are heard in the distance, we feel that the blessing of the Lord God will go with them all through. Let the marriage bell ring. All success to the periodicals which give especial attention to these brightest scenes of earth. And blasted be the influences which would dishonor that institution which was absolutely the only living thing which floated off from shipwrecked Paradise to bless our race—how beautiful, consecrated, jubilant, heaven-descended marriage.

SCIENTIFIC FARMING.

THERE are now in the United States about fifty agricultural colleges. They are doing much for the science of farming. May all success attend them. We think, however, that men seldom get to be practical farmers through such institutions. The students have so delicate a tin that they will not much like going out into the teeth of the northeast wind to sow winter grain. Many of the best farmers in the best farming regions of the world never heard of an agricultural college. The practical part of the science of agriculture must be dug up by two brawny hands out of the middle of a cornfield. They make the successful farmers who come in the regular line of succession. Their father tills the soil, and their grandfather and their great-grandfather who went from plow to Lexington and back from Lexington to the plow. Many a man puts down his gilt-edged book on phosphorus and sub-soiling, puts on his gloves, takes a jack-knife, and goes out to trim his grape-vines, trimming them in the wrong place—and is under the delusion that he is a farmer. That does very well if you have inherited, or first made your fortune, and have an income of twenty thousand dollars a year, and you can afford to lose a thousand of it annually in experimenting with cows and chickens and unheard of rotations of crops. But if we wanted our boy to become an agricultural success, we would put him when very young in the furrow and tell him to go ahead until he comes to the haystack then turn round the haystack to go back to the furrow. By all means through agricultural colleges keep up the science of farming, but let none suppose that you can keep your soft hands and untanned cheeks and fastidious tastes and yet be a successful tiller of the soil. You must learn to rough it.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Original Package Question Came to a vote in the Senate on Thursday last. There are no doubts about the bill being constitutional, probably there will be a debate in the House at that phase of the question; but there can be no doubt as to the propriety of the measure. The decision of the Supreme Court placed the laws that have passed the Prohibition amendment in a ridiculous position, and deprived them of the power, which they ought to have, of deciding a question intimately concerning their own affairs. The bill, which passed the Senate by a vote of 34 to 10 provides that all fermented liquors, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids imported into any State or Territory for use, consumption, sale or storage, shall, on arrival in such State or Territory or (remaining there) be subjected to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in exercise of the police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors or liquids had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

More Fruitful Source of Surprises was invented by our legislators than the Alien and Labor Law. It was thought that the law was exhausted when a church was fined for inviting a clergyman from abroad; but now it appears that it is a violation of the law for mechanics to come here in response to an advertisement. That is the ruling Secretary Winthrop made last week. The Builders' Exchange of Chicago, advertised for carpenters in a Canadian newspaper, and learned to its surprise that the advertisement constituted a contract within the meaning of the law. It is a curious decision, grounds for which do not appear on the surface.

Probably it would not stand the test of a court of law. There is, however, no reason to quarrel with it, as it will operate in the case of the strikers to the advantage of the weaker party in the struggle. The strikers will now have less reason to dread their employers filling their ranks with foreigners. They will have no reason at all to dread it, if Mr. Windom should go a step further, and exclude foreign workmen from coming to this country through reading in newspapers that there is a strike in their own country in America.

An Attempt to Suppress the Louisiana Lottery ought to have the moral support of the Christian public of the United States. It is an effort to be made to disguise the real character of the enterprise, and it may succeed. That the lottery is a source of mischief to the State, instead of a benefit, is evident. Savings-bank deposits in Louisiana show that it is pauperizing the people. In other States deposits have nearly doubled in amount in the past ten years; but in Louisiana they dropped from two millions in 1879 to less than one million in 1889. It makes no difference whether the lottery pays forty thousand dollars a year to the educational fund. The fact that a man a year is now offered for the privilege, is what a beggarly percentage of its profits have been contributed to the objects for which it is ostensibly established. The State cannot be expected to continue a partnership in the iniquity, wrong in principle and wrong in policy. It stimulates and nurtures the gambling spirit in a State constitutionally prone to the vice, and is therefore a moral evil. It is wrong, it is foolish because then the State should run the lottery itself, and take all the profits. The men who are trying to clear the skirts of their State of the defilements of the pest should have encouragement of knowing that the sympathy of all good men in the country is with them.

Distressing Railroad Disaster at San Francisco, on Friday, emphasizes the necessity of a rule, now established in the East, that in reaching a place where there is known risk, an engineer shall bring his train to a dead stop. In this case the train from San Francisco to Oakland had to cross the draw-bridge over Oak Creek. A man is stationed at the bridge to wave a red flag if the bridge is open, and the engineer is required to reduce speed so that he may stop in time if he sees the red flag. On Friday the bridge was open to allow a yacht to pass through when the train approached. Whether the flag was waved, or the engineer did not see it, or was unable to stop his train, does not appear. The engine went right into the chasm, dragging after it the first of the three coaches composing the train. Happily, the coupling between that and the next car broke, and the two rear coaches were saved. The tide was in, and the coach was completely covered by the water. About forty passengers were in it. The men broke the windows and some of them made their escape, and were rescued by the boats that were quickly at the scene of the disaster. The other men, women and children—twenty-nine, it is feared—could not get out, though the cuts on the bodies that were recovered, and their torn clothes, indicated that they had made a struggle to do so. Nineteen bodies were brought up, but it is feared that ten others died whose bodies were washed away.

Mr. Stanley Bitterly Complains of the Indifference of the English Government to its African interests, and compares its attitude unfavorably with the assistance the German Government is giving to Captain Wissman. Speaking last week at a public banquet in London he remarked, that if it were merely a question of rivalry between an English and a German company he should not mind, but when the Government backed up the German company it was not a fair fight, and the capital which would have made a railway right up to the Victoria Nyanza would be wasted. Instead of people in two years' time being able to take tickets to the Victoria Nyanza, the company would have nothing to show except a bushel of treaties. But to the Germans there was nobody to say even "Bo!" He could speak very forcibly, but he was restrained. Lord Salisbury, in reply says that the English Government has surrendered nothing. There have been negotiations with Germany, but the public must not be disturbed by Mr. Stanley's words, as he is not behind the scenes.

The Arrest of Fifteen Russian Nihilists in Paris, proves that in spite of recent assurances to the contrary, the Order is still active. The French police had received information that a plot to kill the Czar was being organized in Paris. They made a search but obtained no clue to the plotters until May 12th. Then a number of trees in a field near Nancy were found to have been injured by explosives. On inquiry it was found that several men had been experimenting with dynamite in the field. A number of metallic tubes were found in the field, and these were traced to the seller of the tubes. From him was obtained the information which led to the arrest of the whole party. Five of the plotters are students and five are young women. In the lodgings of the leader were found a quantity of incriminating documents, a number of finished bombs, and the ingredients for filling others.

England has a New Fishery Trouble on Her hands. This time her antagonist is on her side of the ocean, though the matter in dispute is on ours. It appears that under several treaties dating as far back as 1713, France claims to have acquired the right of controlling the fishing on the northern coast of Newfoundland. The people of Newfoundland contend that they have a concurrent right of fishing there, but lately the French have forbidden it, and have threatened to cut the nets if they were not removed. They have also closed the lobster-canning establishment on that shore, and have sent an armed force to enforce obedience. The Legislature of Newfoundland has sent an appeal to England for protection, and the people are so disgusted with the failure of the Government to interfere on their behalf that they threaten to refuse payment of taxes. They claim that if England will not protect them she is not entitled to their money. This question of the Newfoundland fisheries has long been a source of trouble. The English Government concluded an agreement with the French, which they supposed would settle it, for this season at least; but the people of the colony claim that their interests were sacrificed, and that the agreement was made in direct violation of an understanding that no settlement of the question should be made without the approval of the Newfoundland Legislature. The French Government has made the suggestion that the value of the French rights should be submitted to arbitration, and that England should purchase them partly in money and partly in African territory.

BRIEF NOTES.

A gold watch is to be given away at the end of this month in connection with the canvass for new subscribers to this journal. For particulars see the second page of cover.

The revival in the Seventeenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, continues with unabated interest. Mr. E. P. Telford arrived as arranged, and on Sunday last commenced his campaign against sin and Satan in that densely populated district. In the evening, the largest congregation Seventeenth Street Church has held in the last ten years assembled to hear him. Mr. Telford delivered a most impressive sermon from the words, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" (11 Kings 18: 21.) The audience was deeply moved, and when the invitation was given to those who desired to commence a new life, to come to the altar for prayer, there was prompt response. The services are being held every night this week at 7:30. Rev. H. R. Keates, Mr. James H. Cannon, the Wesleyan Singing Band, and the pastor of the church, are assisting Mr. Telford in this most interesting work.

The general Synod of the Reformed Church in America commences to-day at Asbury Park, continuing a week.

A millionaire missionary is now laboring in China under the auspices of the China Inland Mission. He devotes the balance of his income to the work.

Mrs. Amanda Smith, who has been laboring in Liberia, is now in England in very poor health. She is believed to be recovering, and hopes soon to return to America.

Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, who is well-known to our readers as a prominent teacher of Faith-healing, was married on May 14th to Mr. George S. Montgomery.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has just closed a very successful series of meetings at Farmington, N. H., which has resulted in the conversion of nearly one hundred persons, and the quickening of Christians.

Rev. A. B. Simpson's Church in New York has now twelve missionaries in the foreign field. There are four in China, three in Africa, three in Japan and two in India. A farewell meeting was held at the Home on May 12th, to commission several others for the Sudan.

The receipts of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions last year amounted to $794,066.44. From churches, $291,719.86; from Woman's Boards, $280,285.51; from Sabbath-schools, $36,062.56; from legacies, $112,877.68; from miscellaneous $73,120.83.

Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D. D., formerly of Philadelphia, has been appointed Alexander Duff lecturer on Foreign Missions for the four years' term 1890-1894. This necessitates a course of lectures in three centres in Scotland. He is expected to return to America this week.

Rev. B. Fay Mills closed his evangelistic services at Bridgeport, Conn., on May 21st. Nineteen churches united in the movement. About fifteen hundred persons have signed cards expressing their desire to begin the Christian life. The business men's prayer meeting held daily during Mr. Mill's stay will be continued.

Major Whittle closed on Sunday last a series of services in Mildmay Conference Hall, London, which have been held every day for two weeks. The numbers present were large, and believers, especially, were greatly profited. He will hold a few services this week in Ireland, and will then sail for home. His transatlantic campaign has been wonderfully blessed.

Dr. George F. Pentecost will take a prominent part in the exercises at Northfield, Mass., this month and next. He will speak daily at Stone Hall, Northfield, each morning, and in the village church each Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday, from June 1 to 14, and after that daily in the church. The annual sermon before both schools will be given on Sunday, June 15, by Mr. Moody. Dr. Marcus Rainsford of London, Dr. MacArthur of New York, and Dr. L. W. Munhall, will also take part in the meetings.

The National Temperance Congress, of which a preliminary announcement has already been made here, will be held on June 11th and 12th, in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. This is an effort to unite Temperance men of all shades of opinion in organized effort. Every anti-liquor man or woman will be welcomed. All local State and National Societies should send representatives. Conferences will be held during the day and mass meetings on both evenings. The call for the congress is signed by representative men, some of whom are Prohibitionists and some opposed to Prohibition. Particulars as to the programme, hotel accommodation and reduced railroad rates may be obtained from the Secretary, Mr. Joseph A. Bogardus, 167 Chambers Street, New York.

THE FACE ILLUMINED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone," etc.
Exodus 34:29-35.

The Long Fasts of Moses—His Strength Supernaturally Sustained—Only a Meek Man Could Bear the Glory—I. How the Glory Came—A Reflection of the Glory He had Seen—A Prayer Answered after Fourteen Centuries—The Result of Fellowship—And Intense Intercession—And Faithfulness With the People—II. What the Shining Meant—Special Favor for Moses and the People—The Seal of his Commission—III. Why Moses Did not Know It—The Meek Man Could not Know—Absorbed in the Welfare of Others—IV. Why he Wore a Veil—Lessons From the Illumined Face.

A FAST of forty days does not improve the appearance of a man's countenance: he looks starved, wrinkled, old, haggard. Moses had fasted forty days twice at the least; and according to many competent authorities the tenth chapter of Deuteronomy seems to imply that he fasted forty days three times in quick succession. I will not assert or deny the third forty days; but it is certain that, with a very slight interval, Moses fasted forty days, and then forty days more; and it is probable that to these must be added a third forty. Small attractiveness would naturally remain in a face which had endured so stern an ordeal; but the Lord whom he served made his face brilliant with an unusual lustre.

Moses Did Not Know,

at the time, that his face was shining; but he did know it afterward, and he has here recorded it. He gives in detail the fact of the brightness of his own face, and how others were struck with it, and what he had to do in order to associate with them. We are sure that this record was not made by reason of vanity, for Moses writes about himself in great lowliness of spirit: it was written under divine direction, with a worthy object. The man Moses was very meek, and his meekness entered into his authorship, as into all the other acts of his life: we are therefore sure that this record is for our profit. I am afraid, brethren, that God could not afford to make our faces shine; we should grow too proud. It needs a very meek and lowly spirit to bear the shinings of God.

It would appear, so far as we can make out the narrative, that his face continued to shine long afterward. After Moses had come down from the mount, the brightness began to diminish. Paul tells us that it was a "glory to be done away;" but when he went into the holy place to commune with God, the brightness was revived, and he came out again and spoke to the people with that same glowing heaven upon his brow. When he addressed the people in the name of God, he took off the veil, and let them see the brightness of God in His ambassador; but as soon as he had done speaking, and fell back into his own private character, he drew a veil over his face, that none might be kept at a distance thereby. The man Moses was as meek with the glory on his countenance as before it gathered there. Brethren, if God honors you as preachers or teachers, accept the honor, but do not attribute it to your own worthiness, or even to your own personality; but ascribe it to the office to which the Lord has called you.

I. With this as my preface, I shall now come immediately to my subject. Here is Moses with a strange glory upon his countenance. We will first answer the question, how came this glory to be there? The skin of Moses' face shone; how came it to do so? The answer is, it was

A Reflection of the Glory

which he had seen when he was with God in the holy mount. It was the result of that partly-answered prayer, "I beseech thee, show me thy glory." God could not, at that time, grant the prayer in its fulness, for Moses was not capable of the vision; and the Lord told him, "Thou canst not see my face, and live." I look upon that prayer, however, as a very wonderful one, for this reason, that it was answered to the full, fourteen hundred years after it was presented. The glory of God is only to be seen in the face of Christ Jesus; and on the top of Tabor, Moses saw the Son of God transfigured, and his prayer was there and then answered to its utmost bounds. In the transfiguration, God showed to Moses His full glory; for he was then made able to behold it. But though on the top of Mount Sinai he could not see the full glory of Jehovah, yet he had seen enough to make an impression upon him of such a kind that the skin of his face shone. God is light, and they that look upon Him are enlightened, and reflect light around them.

Came of Fellowship.

The light on the face of Moses was the result of fellowship with God. That fellowship was of no common order. It was special and distinguished. I do not doubt that Moses walked with God after the fashion of believing men in the pursuit of his daily calling; but he spent two periods, of forty days each, in solitary fellowship with God. Everybody was away; Aaron, Joshua, and all the rest were far down below, and Moses was alone with God. His intercourse with God was intense, close, and familiar; and that not for one day, but for eighty days, at the least. Protracted fellowship brings a nearness which brief communion cannot attain. Each morning's sun found him still in the light of God; each evening's dew found his soul still saturated with the divine influence. What must be the effect of such whole-hearted, undisturbed fellowship with God? Oh, for the enjoyment of such heavenly communion! My brothers and sisters, have we not lost a great deal by so seldom dwelling apart, so little seeking continuous, absorbing fellowship with the Most High? I am sure we have. We snatch a hasty minute of prayer; we afford a hurried quarter of an hour for Bible reading, and we think we have done well. Very far am I from saying that it is not well. But if for minutes we had hours, the gain might increase in proportion.

I would have you note that this communion with God included intense intercession for the people. God will not have fellowship with our selfishness. Moses came out of himself, and became an intense pleader for the people; and thus he became and the glory descended on him. The Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends. The Lord loves intercessory prayer; and if ever He makes a man's face to shine, it is when he, like Christ, has made intercession for the transgressors, and poured out his soul, not for himself, but for a guilty company.

Like the Son of God,

Yet once more. This man Moses not only obtained this brightness by his long communion and his intercessory prayer and self-oblivion, but by his faithfulness among the people. When he went down in the interval between the two fastings, and found the people worshipping the golden calf, he did not spare them. He loved them, but he did not keep back the stern blow of justice. Grand old Moses! Faithful servant of God! Unbending executioner of divine justice! Meek wert thou, but by no means indifferent to truth and righteousness. God chooses not milksops, destitute of backbone, to wear His glory upon their faces. We have plenty of men made of sugar, nowadays, that melt into the stream of popular opinion; but these shall never ascend into the hill of the Lord, nor stand in His holy place, nor wear the tokens of His glory. Moses was no trimmer, no hunter after popularity; but he was sternly true to his Lord, and hence he was such that the Lord could safely make his face to shine. Enough of this, though much more might be said; learn the useful lesson which this part of the subject teaches.

II. But, secondly,What Did This Shining Mean?

This brightness on his face—what did it signify? Very briefly, it meant this: "God's special favor for Moses. God seemed to say, 'This is my man: I have chosen him above all others: among those that are born of woman there is no greater than he: I have put a measure of my own glory upon him, and the token thereof shines in his face.'" Surely, it also meant special favor for Israel. If they could but have understood it, they would not have been afraid, but conscience made them cowards. God effect, said to them, by the shining of the face of Moses, "I have had favor upon you, for I have accepted your intercessor. My servant Moses has been pleading for your lives, and proof that I have accepted you and will spare you, I have written your pardon across his shining brow." Favor to Jesus is favor to us.

This brightness on the face of Moses was God's witness to his commission. He had a witness, for he had glorified him. The people could not doubt his commission when they looked upon his shining face. And more. It was not only a witness of his office, but it was an increase of his power.

The People were Overawed

by this strange new light. They dared, after this, to murmur against Moses, for they dared to murmur against God Himself; still, to a people of such a temper as theirs, supernatural light must have been a source of wonder and of awe.

The pith of the whole thing, I think, lies in this—the face of Moses shone typically, to show us that there is a great glory about the law of God. It has a glory all its own from its spirituality, its holiness, its perfectness, its justness, its immutability, its power over the conscience, and so forth. It has eminent glory, because it has been ordained of God Himself, and there stands as the sacred rule of the universe. This is not what Paul understands by the glory of the law. He makes the glory "of that which was to be abolished," the glory of the ceremonial law, to lie in its end. Now, the end of the law for righteousness is Christ. The law was given to point us to Christ, to drive us to Christ, to be our schoolmaster to whip us to Christ, to convince us of our need of Christ, and to take us out from every other hope but that which begins and ends with Christ. The glory of the law is Christ. And so Moses comes with a glory on his face which the children of Israel could not perceive, nor steadfastly look into.

III. And now, thirdly,Why Did Not Moses Know of It?

For we read that "Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone." I answer, first, that it is not easy for a man to see his own face, unless he can borrow a looking-glass. Speaking in the plainest, the meaning I intend is this: it is not easy for a man to form an accurate judgment of his own character. There are people in the world who think they see their own faces clearly; but they shine like suns; and yet they do not shine at all, except it be with brazen impudence and self-conceit. In other cases, lowly men are afraid that their faces do not shine at all; but yet they are brightness itself. It is no part of the shining of some faces that their owners are modest and humble. Brethren, we cannot see our own faces; and until you know your own characters. Upon reflection, you may arrive at something like a judgment, but it is not one which you may safely rely upon.

Our own judgment of our own character usually errs on the side of partiality to ourselves. Nor is the evil so readily cured as some suppose, for the gift of seeing ourselves "as others see us" is not so corrective as might be supposed. Some persist in seeing us through the colored spectacles of prejudice and ill-will; and this injustice is apt to create in us a further partiality to ourselves. If other men make mistakes about us who can see us, they probably do not make such great blunders about us as we do about ourselves, since we cannot see our own faces. Truth to tell, we are very fond of ourselves, and have our own characters in high esteem; therefore we are unfair judges on points of difficulty about ourselves.

Another reason why he had not thought of his face was, that he was so much engaged in doing good to others. He gave himself up for those stiff-necked Israelites; he actually lived for them, and offered himself before God to die for them. He carried the whole people in his bosom.

he carries her child. He fed his flock like a shepherd; and, like the Good Shepherd, he would give his life for the sheep. Oh, the self-sufficiency of the man Moses! He never thought of his own face; for he was thinking about other faces. What would he have given if they had been capable of such nearness to God as he himself enjoyed! Oh, to be so absorbed in doing good, that we have our own personal repute! Then a man may be good in self-forgetfulness, and may find himself famous to his own amazement.

Not a Thought or a Care

It is well when men are not self-conscious. The best, my beloved brethren, that our faces should shine to others, and not to ourselves. You might know your own excellency, do not let it, for there is an ill savor about self-consciousness. To come forward and say, "I am utterly holy," is babyish. It is like a child who says, "See my new frock! Look at my pretty frock!" I tremble to hear one say, "I quite passed out of the conflict mentioned in the seventh of Romans, I have got it, and I have got that." God save us from being too much about the shining of our faces! May the light of His countenance illumine the whole circle of our being, while we lie at the feet, mastered by a reverent awe of Him!

I must hasten on to another interesting question. Why did Moses wear a veil? Having brightness on his face,

Why Did He Hide it?

In answer, in part the natural meekness of the Lord led him to do so. He was forced into the position of leader; he never wished to be prominent, but the Lord put great pressure upon him in the desert, and drove him on to be as strong as Jeshurun. He had no ambitions. Though he was to be as God to Pharaoh, he never exalted himself in the Egyptian court. Among the rulers he did not monopolize power; but he yielded to the chosen elders a portion of magisterial dignity. The man Moses was meek; and so to hide the brightness of his face was a pleasure, and not a trial to him. Many a lovely woman, he shrunk from the gaze. We shall do well to possess the quality of humility.

He veiled his face in tender condescension to the people. When they ran away from him, he sought to them to know why they were afraid. "O Lord, we fear that splendor on your brow," he said, "let me veil it," says he; "I would not veil it, but win." He always sinks himself, this Moses. The God-given glory of his face was not slight, nor seek to abate; but so that it would bring him honor from men, he put under a veil. That he may come closer to people whom he loves, he is content to hide his glory. Let us also seek to bless the people, and to keep in touch with them.

The Veil.

A practical warning I would earnestly apply. Do not think we have a great many people who do not think we have a great many people who do not belong to them ourselves?—whose foolish hearts are blinded so that they do not see the light of the glory of God in the face of Christ? Is veiled for them? Are not many suffering from veiled hearts? In your circle there are many of God: you have heard of his face as he walks with God: others have told you of beauties they see in his character. You do not see anything particular in him; you, on the contrary, despise him, and avoid his company. He wears a veil for you. Here is the Book of exquisite sweetness! Your soul, how her face brightens when she reads how she has been sustained by it in the darkest trouble! You read it now and then; but you do not see anything remarkable in it, certainly nothing that charms you: the Book is a treasure to you. Am I not speaking the truth to many of you? Oh my friends, when you do not see Christ, and do not admire Him, confess that you must be blinded; when you do not see the glorious gospel of the blessed God, and do not charm you, conclude that the veil is upon your hearts. Oh, that you would turn unto the Lord! For when you turn to God, the veil shall be taken away.

I close with these

Lessons from the Face of Moses.

First, learn the exceeding glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. How so? Well, this was, so to speak, in a minor degree, the transfiguration of Moses; and all it came to was that his face shone. But when Christ came, he was transfigured as to His whole person. A word is used by an instructive commentator in reference to Christ's transfiguration which expresses a forcible idea: He speaks of it as incandescence. He was all brightness and light; surpassing the mere shining of the skin, even as the sun far surpasses every form of its reflection. The glory of Christ is beyond all comparison—the glory which excelleth. Oh, that I knew how to speak of it! "That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."

Another lesson is just this. See the possibilities of glory which await human nature. If Moses' face can shine here, I can understand how, in the next state, when we are risen from the dead, our bodies may be all light and bright, and we ourselves like flames of fire. "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Unless our Well-beloved cometh quickly, our bodies will be sown in dishonor; and now I see how they can be raised in glory. Then shall we put on "the glory of the celestial." We shall be among the shining ones, and as the sun in the kingdom of our Father. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be"—any more than it did appear what Moses should be—"but we know that, when He shall appear,"—whose appearing is more glorious than that of Moses—"we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."

Shall Ourselves Shine

Lastly, here is one more lesson. What honor God may put upon any one of us if we really put honor upon Him! My brothers, my sisters, if you are consecrated to God as Moses was, He can give you an unconscious influence which others will be compelled to recognize. Upon your brow the heavenly light of grace will rest; from your eyes the lamp of truth will shine. Walk in the light, as God is in the light, and have fellowship with Him; and then you, too, shall shine as God's light-bearers, and your whole life shall be as the star which guided the wise men to Christ.

O Spirit of God, rest on every one of us according to our capacity to endure the tongue of fire! Say unto us, O Saviour, this morning, "Go forth, my friends, and be burning and shining lights to my praise." Amen.

A CHINAMAN'S SOUL CRAVING.

IN Christian lands we have little opportunity of realizing what men will bear for the sake of Christ. But the martyr spirit is not dead. The religion for which men were willing to go to the stake hundreds of years ago is still as precious to men in the end of the nineteenth century and is still capable of inspiring them with the courage to suffer rather than renounce it. The Rev. J. T. Turner mentions a case in point, which occurred under his own observation in China. He says:

"I was sitting in my study in the province of Shansi, one Saturday night, thinking of the services of the coming day, and presently some man rushed into my room and said that Mr. Lea had been seized and beaten by the officials. We had two brothers of that name who came in every week from their village home to spend the Sunday with us to hear the Gospel. On this occasion, as they entered the city gates, one of them was seized by the marshal of the district magistrate, and taken off to the Judgment Hall in his bureau. As he stood there, the magistrate said to him, 'Have not I, your ruler, put out a proclamation forbidding you to learn this corrupt religion?' And the man said, calmly, 'This religion is not corrupt, it only teaches us to love God.' The official was enraged and said, 'Down with him,' and that man was flung upon the ground. 'Give him 200 blows,' and with a rod as thick as my wrist, that man received 200 blows. And then the magistrate said, 'Now, if any of you go and learn that religion, I will beat you to death,' and, although legally he had no right, yet he had power to do it. That man was brought to me straight from that Judgment Hall, and as I bent over him and dressed his wounds, the tears would come into my eyes. It was the first man I had ever seen bleeding for the sake of Jesus, and I felt it was a solemn moment. He looked up in my face; and said with a triumphant look, which I shall not soon forget, 'Oh, sir, it is nothing'; this is mere physical pain. You do not know what I have suffered in my heart for want of this religion.' What a revelation! I think that to satisfy the cravings of one such heart is worth all the money that has ever been spent on missions. Nor was the man exaggerating. There are many men in China whose cravings for spiritual peace are agonizing. The penances they voluntarily undertake prove that. I remember standing on one of those roads one day. In the distance I saw a man, and as he came along he lifted up his hands to heaven and then cast himself at full length upon the ground. I watched that man, and I found that, after lifting up his hands and flinging himself full length upon the ground, he made a mark where his fingers touched, and then he went forward and put his feet to that mark and went down again. That man had come all the way from the South of China, to the North, measuring every inch of the ground with his body. Why? He was going on a pilgrimage to a sacred mountain. That means that he was thirsty for something to satisfy him. We who know of the water of life, the which if a man drink he shall never thirst, are bound by all that is holy and humane to tell such men of it."

A SCEPTIC'S TRIALS.

AN incident related by an evangelist illustrates two facts which have often been observed. The first, that an infidel in trouble, gets little sympathy or help from his fellow unbelievers, but is more likely to be helped by Christians; and the second, that the really honest sceptic, when led to Christ, generally pays for the effort, by becoming an earnest Christian. He says:

"I took a deep interest in a workingman, who lived in my district when I first took charge of it. His intelligence and mental activity, first attracted me and afterward, his kindness of heart affected me still more.

"He had imbibed sceptical notions, and always took good care to air them whenever I called to see him; yet he seemed to ask questions with a view to get at truth. Month by month I worked and prayed for this man's conversion, and, in this way, three years passed by, during which time I had followed him from one spot to another, round and about my district, for he had removed several times. I never knew this young man out of trouble, neither have I ever witnessed a struggle so severe as his for existence. His dairy was the first to go; then he was stricken down by a severe illness, long and painful. His wife was taken ill about the same time, and was conveyed to the hospital. On their recovery, the youngest child of three, of whom the father seemed dotingly fond, was taken from them by death. Then for months he joined the ranks of the unemployed, wandering about from place to place in search of work, while his wife and children were kept at the point of starvation.

"One Saturday evening at the commencement of this year, I called, as usual, to see them, and was saddened to find that all that week they had existed on a very small allowance of bread, and when I went in they had nothing in the house. The eldest girl that afternoon had fainted from sheer want. By my making their case known, they were relieved at once. I knelt down in prayer with them in the room, and pleaded earnestly that God in His mercy

Evangelist H. R. Keates. (See page 357.)

The Garfield Memorial.

Dr. Tucker, Bishop of Equatorial Africa.

On the following Tuesday, he found work, which has been constant to this day. He was much struck with this wonderful answer to prayer, and the impression never left him. He came at once to our Mission Hall, was converted, and is now one of the brightest, most sincere and useful Christians I have known."

BISHOP HANNINGTON'S SUCCESSOR.

(See Portrait.)

UGANDA and its district has been a fatal field for the servants of Christ. Bishop Hannington was murdered there, Bishop Parker fell a victim to the fatal climate, and now Alexander Mackay is dead. Yet the field is not to be abandoned. Another hand seizes the standard dropped by the hands of the dead, and another brave and valiant leader, undeterred by the fate of his predecessors, goes forth to carry on the fight against darkness, heathenism, and cruelty. On April 24th, the Rev. Alfred R. Tucker was consecrated Bishop of Equatorial Africa, and the same night he set out for his field of labor. So God raises up men who count not their own lives dear unto them, if they can win victories for Christ. No better proof could be furnished of the power of Christianity than the promptitude with which men step into the gap in the front ranks.

When news of Bishop Parker's death reached the Church Missionary Society, its committee looked around for a successor. The name of a man of remarkable energy, devotion, and heroic calibre was brought to its notice. He belonged to a family of artists, several of whom had won distinction in their profession. He was himself an artist whose pictures had won the praise of the critics, who predicted for him a brilliant future. He was also an athlete and pedestrian who had broken many records. On one day he had walked sixty-four miles including the ascent of four of the highest mountains in England, involving 12,000 feet of hard climbing. This man had at the age of twenty-eight abandoned his profession and his brilliant prospects to give himself to the service of God in the ministry. He had gone to Oxford to study and, instead of giving his leisure to frivolity and dissipation as so many Oxford students do, he had used it in going out into the villages to preach the Gospel in the open air. He had won the degree of M. A., had been ordained, and had worked with signal tokens of God's blessing in two curacies, and was, at the age of nearly forty years, toiling on with indefatigable energy. He was just the man for the post, but it was not for the Society to invite him to a position of danger. They made no movement toward him; but God was showing him His will.

By what is called a singular coincidence, but what the Christian recognizes as the Providential arrangement of God, Mr. Tucker, the man whom the Society had in view, went to them and offered himself as a missionary for Africa. The brave man had a wife and a baby boy, but they were willing to remain behind for three years, and Mr. Tucker said he was ready to go at once. He was accepted, was made the Bishop of the vacant see and is now on his way to his diocese. All honor to such a man! The Church throughout the world will bid him God-speed and pray for his preservation and success.

THE GARFIELD MEMORIAL.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most imposing memorials in the whole world was dedicated on May 30th, at Cleveland, O., to President James A. Garfield, twentieth President of the United States. We give in this issue a picture of its exterior. It is erected on a high ridge of ground in Lake View Cemetery. Its main feature is a circular tower fifty feet in diameter, and one hundred and eighty feet high. It is surrounded by a broad stone terrace which is reached by flights of wide steps. From the front of the tower projects a square porch which forms the entrance. The sides of the porch are divided into five panels of bas-relief, representing five periods of Garfield's life, and contain over a hundred life-size figures. The first, shows him as a young man teaching school; the second, represents an episode in the war, when Garfield rode through a storm of shot and shell in the battle of Chickamauga to carry despatches to Gen. Thomas; the third, represents Garfield addressing an audience of citizens; the fourth, his inauguration; and the fifth, depicts him in his coffin.

Passing through this porch the visitor reaches the interior of the tower, in the centre of which is the statue of Garfield in Carrara marble, standing on a pedestal. Arranged around it is a circle of polished red granite pillars, supporting a dome that forms a canopy over the statue, and outside them an aisle from which a general view of the interior is obtained. Above the pillars is a marble frieze representing the funeral procession, the figures in cream color on a background of deep red. Over the entrance door are figures of War and Peace, and underneath, the legend, "Erected by a grateful country in memory of James Abram Garfield, twentieth President of the United States; Scholar, Soldier, Statesman, Patriot; Born, 19th Nov., 1831; Died, Sept. 19th, 1881."

The whole is rich in color and gilding, and decorations. Beneath, in the crypt, are the remains of the lamented President, away from gaze of the public, and secure from the intrusion of strangers. The memorial, when complete, will cost $150,000; of which, one-half contributed by the citizens of Cleveland.

ARABS AT PRAYER.

(See Illustration.)

THE accompanying picture, engraved from photograph brought home by Dr. Talmage, presents a scene very familiar to every traveler in Mohammedan lands. At the hour of prayer the faithful Mohammedan ceases his employment wherever he may be, and no matter where he may be around him, and gives himself up to devotion. He will go to the mosque, if one is accessible, but if not, he prays where he is.

As a preparation for the ceremony, he will, if possible, go through a thorough ablution. His hands and arms, his face, neck, and ears thoroughly washed, he gargles his throat, washes his feet and as much of his body as the scanty dress of the country leaves exposed, before the hour when the call from the minaret of the mosque, "God is God, and Mohammed is prophet," shall sound. In all the better class of houses, there is running water in the inner courts for this purpose, and on the banks of every stream the poorer classes of people may be seen making their preparations.

This is the manner of the ceremony, as described by a recent traveller, who, like others, witnessed it daily while he was in Egypt: "The man next us raises his open hand till the thumb touches the ears, exclaiming aloud, Allah-hu-akbar—'God is great.' After uttering mentally a few short petitions, the hands are brought down and folded together near the girdle, while he recites the first chapter of the Koran, and two or three other brief passages from the same book. Now he bends forward, resting his hands upon his knees, and repeats three times a formula of praise to 'God most great.' Then, standing erect, he cries, Alla-hu-akbar, as at the beginning. Then he drops upon his knees, and bends forward until his nose and forehead touch the ground, directly between his outstretched hands. This he repeats three times, muttering all the time the same short formulas of prayer and praise. The next move brings him to his knees, and then settling back upon his heels, mumbles over various small petitions, with sundry grunts and exclamations, according to taste and habit. He has now gone through the regular Rek'ah; and standing up as at the first, and on exactly the same spot, he will perform a second, and even a third, if especially devoted with precisely the same genuflections.

hey seem to be wholly bed in their devotions manifest a power of isolaand abstraction quite ising. That is the result bit and education. Small ren imitate it to perfec-

There is certainly a unity in their mode of hip, and when peorfirm-a large assembly in the ues; or by a detachment diers in concert, guided eir genuflexions by an n or dervish who sings ervice, it is very impres-
I have seen it admirably rmed by moonlight on ild banks of the Orontes, e plain of Hamath, and ene was something more romantic. But alas! it y as villainous a set of rs as could be found n that lawless region."
nappily these conspiculevotions are too often,
the case cited, by no is an evidence of a ous life. In fact, many lers assert that it is a of the contrary. Wheth-
e men who make the
and regular prayers do impose on the people gain a record for piety, will divert suspicion them, or whether they that these prayers will down to the credit side eir account to counter-ce their evil deeds, does appear. Certain it is that prayers have no appreeffect on their lives, and therefore not an evidence ritution. The injunction
e Saviour, to avoid vain tions, and not to pray ing at the corners of the s as the hypocrites do

6: 5-7), is recalled by this description, re understand how the application of His s would be seen by His auditors.

WILL IT LIFT.
THE STORY OF A FOG.
By the Rev. J. Jackson Wray.
(Continued from page 350.)

FORE Jared Higginbotham knocked at that of the room in the Wellington Hotel, as ded in the last chapter, there had been a within the room which should be describ-On the other side of that door were the oung men from Australia, Gilbert Craske, and Frank Higginbotham who, as our rs will remember, was known under the of Richard Allanson to Gilbert and his r.
en they arrived in London, they went to Wellington to look for Mr. Craske, but did nd him there. The fact is, that Gilbert e, senior, was very uncertain in his moves. He had committed himself to a per-search after the widow with the silver and the more defeats and disappointments et with, the more resolved he was to pros-his self-imposed mission.
e young men were disappointed, but, as it lear that the "Wellington" was his recog-headquarters, they resolved to hire a o, and make that their headquarters, too.
the very first night of their arrival, Frank nbotham caught sight of his father. For moments he was in doubt, so greatly had otel keeper's form and features altered for-orse; and when conviction deepened into nty, he felt that he had received another tion—namely, that in his father's case the as worse than the first, and that in him he

MOHAMMEDANS AT THEIR DEVOTIONS.
(From a Photograph Brought from Egypt by Dr. Talmage.)

saw, in the worse sense of the term, a ruined man. He soon discovered that he also was lodging at the Wellington, and the young man was filled with apprehension and concern.

Gil saw that his friend was sad and in trouble, and with that tenderness of feeling and sympathy of nature which he had inherited from his father, he set himself to gain his companion's confidence.

"I say, Dick," said Gil, "to see you downhearted and in trouble is worse than being in trouble myself. Can't you trust a fellow, and give him a chance to lift the load a bit? What's the matter, old chum?"

"Look here, Gil, I could trust you with my life, and my reputation, which is of greater worth," said Dick, with strong feeling, "and yet
I have kept a secret from you for many a year, and have filled my own heart with sorrow at the fear of your one day discovering it. I have done wrong in so acting; my one excuse is this, that the reputation of another is involved, and that sealed my lips. But now I feel I must tell you."

"That's right, laddie," said Gil, drawing up his chair so that he might lean his arm on that of the easy chair in which Frank was sitting.
"Wait till I ring for candles, and then fire away."

"No, thank you, Gil, I prefer the twilight, I can tell my story better." And with this he heaved a heavy sigh at the thought that he needed to hide his blushes as he mentioned his own father's name.

I need not recount the sad story that the high-spirited and humiliated young man poured into the astonished ears of his friend.

Frank concluded his story in tears, and for that matter, true-hearted Gil also let fall his tears for company. "Now," said Frank, "you have heard the whole miserable story from the beginning, and you can understand how wretched and unhappy the sight of my father, and such a sight, has made me. Yet God knows I love him, and I would give all I have in this world, ay, my life, I think, for my mother's sake, if I could hear my father say: 'I have done wrong, and I repent, and, as far as in me lies, I will make amends before God and man.' Gil Craske, dear friend! for want of that I think my heart will break."

Placing his hand on his companion's shoulder, Gil said:
"Heart up, comrade! Heart up! You and I have been taught to believe that the grace of a merciful God can meet the biggest wants we've got. We may surely pray for this, and who knows, you may yet hear your father confess his grievous sin."

"God grant it," said Frank.
"Night and day I've prayed for it for years! but it tarries, tarries, tarries. Will it ever come?" Frank buried his head in his hands. His friend sat by him in the shadow. The room was filled with the gloom of evening; two hearts were filled with greater gloom. They sat in the silence and the night wore slowly on.
It was while they were so sitting that Jared knocked at the door, and entered without waiting for permission, as related last week.

"Is Mr. Allanson in?" said
Jared, with a low, firm voice.
He can indistinctly perceive some one standing near the fire, whose dull, red glow, was seen amid the mist which filled the room.

"Yes," said Gil Craske, "but wait, I'll call for lights." Ah, there was no doubt now, that was Mr. Allanson's voice, and even through the gloom he could see that that was Mr. Allanson's form and features.

"No, no, sir!" said Jared, in a voice of pitiful entreaty. "Don't have a light! Oh, Mr. Allan-son, I have sinned against God and against you.
I stole your box of gold. I repent. Oh, God knows I truly and bitterly repent. Do with me as you will, punish me as you will, only take back the gold. Every coin is there. Oh, my God, I'm rid of the fiend at last, at last! May God have mercy on my soul."

Jared had thrust the box into Gilbert's hand, and, being rid of it, he waved his own hands to and fro in the air as if to realize his freedom from the hateful fetters of dishonest gold, and then sunk upon the floor in a heavy, helpless swoon.

Frank Higginbotham, for surely the name of "Richard Allanson" had now served its turn and done its work, had remained seated all the time, simply because he had no power to rise.
Now he rose, and staggered to the spot where the penitent sinner lay. "Gil, my friend," said he, "help me to lift my father. What he means I cannot tell. Whose box it is, I do not know;
but this I know—this I know, thank God. Oh, Gil, Gil, Gil! Help me to lift my father, for this penitent man is he."

I know that Gil Craske's honest cheeks were wet with a brother's tears, and if there are such things as tears of joy in heaven, I think the angels that rejoice over a sinner that repenteth had occasion to wipe the pearly drops away.

For some moments Jared lay as one dead. While they were quietly and confidently tending him and aiding his recovery, Gilbert said to his companion, "Frank my boy, that box is my dear old father's. I know it well, and could swear to it in any court of justice; and the gold in it is no doubt the large sum of money he lost."

"But why should he ask for Mr. Allanson?" objected Frank. "He could not know."

"Look here, old fellow," said Gil, hitting the truth exactly, as his shrewd wit often did, "you took that name to serve a purpose. Perhaps my father has used it, too. He may have followed your example, if he wanted a name to serve a purpose, too. Perhaps it has something to do with that mysterious lady he wrote about. That's quite enough by way of reason for any of Dad's romantic impulses. That's his box, thank God!"

Frank looked at his comrade with some degree of wonderment. It was new to hear him speak so feelingly about money. "Yes," he said, quietly, "I am glad you have got the gold again."

"Blow the gold," cried Gil, though what good could come of that operation I fail to see. "I said thank God, you buzzard, because, now that the affair is ours, no mortal out of doors need ever know." Then Frank understood, and a silent hand-grip was his sole reply.

No sooner had Jared come to himself again than he pleaded, in pitiful tones, that he might be dismissed to his own room—he would not leave it, only let him hide himself a little now that his shameful tale was told. Then Frank revealed himself; then Gil assured him of his father's forgiveness; and what could poor, dazed, melted, penitent, startled, astounded Jared Higginbotham do but weep? What better thing could he do than weep in silence? His tears were tears of pure repentance now mingled with tears of grateful joy. A few questions and answers on both sides soon laid bare all the truth, and it was felt by all that a speedy removal to the "Hilldrop Arms" was the best thing to do next.

That decision was a wise one for more reasons than they knew. They would find at Hilldrop the solution of several mysteries that were perplexing them, and there were hearts there which would be gladdened by the news they would carry with them. News of recovered gold, and better news still—news of a man reclaimed.

Matters were proceeding calmly down there, and pleasantly, for the Graythorpes' and their kind hostess, Mrs. Higginbotham, really enjoyed their visit as much as Mrs. Graythorpe and the girls, and declared it was doing her good. She said she would have "moped to death" while Jared was away in London if they had not been with her. They soon found, too, that there was more reason for her depression than they had suspected.

One evening, soon after the arrival of the Graythorpes, the three guests with their delighted hostess were gathered round the winter fire which filled the room with its red and cheerful glow. It seemed now to be Mrs. Higginbotham's turn to sigh and to carry an uncanny look of sadness on her face. We who know of the long absence of her darling laddie in a foreign land, and especially of the humiliating reason of his going—we who know also of the change which had come over the conduct and manner of her erratic husband, and of his mysterious visit to the great city—can understand how it was that the innkeeper's wife was pale and wan, and how at times she was unable to keep up that brisk and cheery tone and temper which was largely assumed for the sake of her beloved and welcome guests.

As the good woman—for she was, in truth, a good woman and a kind—sat there in the firelight's fitful glow, with her face in unconscious repose, Mercy was forcibly struck with the look of anxious care it undoubtedly wore, and of the presence within her of a spirit tired and ill at ease. True to her life-mission as an angel of good cheer, she set herself forthwith to lift the cloud by administering the marvellously potent medicine of cheerful music wedded to sweet and hopeful song.

"Godmother," said Mercy, using the familiar name to which only Millie had legiti-mate right, "you need a little of my 'soothingsyrup.' I do think God's gracious Providence has really provided music for us older children to quiet us when we are fractious, to soothe us when we are in sorrow, to ease us when we are in pain, and to act as a kindly cordial whenever the soul is sore, or the heart is sad." Both Millie and Mrs. Graythorpe had caught sight of the mournful shadow before its wearer succeeded in dismissing it at the sound of Mercy's cheery voice.

Millie's token of sympathy was a pair of arms flung tenderly round her neck, and loving kisses on cheek and forehead, as her dark tresses fell on Mrs. Higginbotham's fast silvering hair. Mrs. Graythorpe quickly moved her chair beside that of her familiar friend, and sat holding her hand right tenderly, while Mercy sang and played until the drawing-room was flooded with the tide of holy song, on which the spirit of the sore-tried wife and mother was lifted and upborne. Mayhap, Mercy's inspiring strains may cause some other drooping spirit "to take heart again." Here they are, the sweet, delicious words of that true mistress of poetry, Adelaide Ann Proctor:—

"I think if thou could'st know,
O soul that will complain,
What lies concealed below
Our burden and our pain;
How just our anguish brings Nearer those looked-for things
We seek for now in vain,—
I think thou would'st rejoice, and not complain.

"I think if thou could'st see,
With thy dim mortal sight,
How meanings dark to thee,
Are shadows hiding light;
Life's efforts crossed and vexed,
Life's purpose all perplexed,
If thou could'st see them right,
I think that they would seem all clear, and wise, and bright.

"And yet thou canst not know,
And yet thou canst not see,
Wisdom and sight are slow,
In poor humanity.
If thou could'st rest, poor soul,
In Him who rules the whole,
Thou would'st find peace and rest;
Wisdom and sight are well, but trust is best!"

"Yes, 'trust is best,'" said she for whom the golden and gracious song sermon was mainly intended, as she warmly thanked Mercy for her timely song; and the "angel of good cheer" felt abundantly rewarded as she noted that the shadow had fled, and trust and hope in God had brought a peaceful rest to take the dark benumbing shadow's place. God bless all shadow-lifters, say I, in this world of care, all smile-bringers in this world of tears! If each would try to be to each, these two, how soon this world might witness a change for the better. And, all the while, God's Providence, in most mysterious fashion, was a co-worker with Mercy and for good Mrs. Higginbotham, away in far-off London.

I need not stay to tell how our happy and grateful trio of Graythorpes wandered to and fro around the familiar haunts of their other, and, in some respects, happier days. Every field, and lane, and wood, as well as the old homestead of Hilldrop Grange, was explored again and again; the ruins of the old abbey called up tender memories of their childhood's days to both Mercy and Millie, for it had been a favorite playground in those happy times when they made the ancient walls and crumbling arches to resound with merry laughter as they played at "hide-and-seek" among its curious nooks and secret corners. And all the while Millie's roses deepened, and her strength increased. There was nothing "on the nerves" now, but the invigorating influence of Hilldrop breezes, the delightful effect of Hilldrop visions, and the unremitting stimulus of Hilldrop air.

One day, in the course of their peregrinations, they met our old friend Jimmie Sladd, who, much to my regret, and owing solely to the narrow limit of these pages, has dropped for a while from view. Thanks to the unforgetting kindness of Gilbert Craske and the Faringham grocer as a medium of communication, Jimmie's wants were constantly attended to, and, to use his own expression, he was "lying among the clover, like an owd 'unter 'at's run his last race."

"Of course, the old man had been delighted to see his former mistress again and "the young ladies," and equally, of course, they had taken the earliest opportunity of visiting their aged helper, for people of the Graythorpe strain and cast are never guilty of the indescribable meanness of those who, on the plea that "service is no inheritance," can turn their backs on those who have rendered them honest and faithful service, simply on the ground that they have no further use for them.

"Well, Jimmie," said Mercy, "how are you this morning? And what's the latest news?"

"Why," said Jimmie, placing his two hands on the top of his stick, and resting his somewhat stooping form thereon; "I'm all right in body and mind—righter 'i' mind than body, though, for I've had a few twinges of my owd enemy, the rheumatiz, an' I feels to hobble a bit more than common. But it's passin', it's passing. What a blessin' it is 'at things like them is passin', an' 'll pass altogether by-an'-by! I offends thinks when I hear 't parson say 'at a buryin', 'We never continny 'i one stay,' what a good thing it is for such things as rheumatiz, for instance, an' monny another thing that bothers us, keeps goin', praise the Lord!—an' better allus follows wuss, an' betteran' better still, if we bide it patiently."

"Well, that's good philosophy, Jimmie," said Mrs. Graythorpe, with a smile, "but I don't think you would get much good of it if it wasn't for the help of religion."

"That's just it, ma'am," said Jimmie, lifting his stick, and tapping the ground sharply with it by way of emphasis. "I don't tak' mitch account of 'losophy,' as you call it, but the love of Jesus does teach me a few things 'at's worth knowin'; an' that's one—that things 'at troubles us 'i various ways is passin'." Here Jimmie dismissed them one after another with a wave of his hand. "Ay, an' better still; it tells us that we hev good things 'i possession 'at doesn't pass, an' can't pass, an' won't pass; ay, an' better still," Jimmie continued, waxing warm, "it tells us of things that's comin', comin' as sure as sunrise, an' that's the 'glory that shall be revealed.' I've waitin' for it, missis—poor owd Jimmie Sladd's waitin' for it." Then, looking upward, with a smile such as a child might wear who catches a glimpse of his father's face, he said, "an' it's comin' by-an'-by."

(To be Concluded.)

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

BEAUTIFUL
GIRLS ruin their health and beauty by wearing some bad fitting corset—
BE SURE TO BUY FERRIS' GOOD SENSE CORSET WAISTS.
THOUSANDS NOW IN USE.
Best for Health, Economy and Beauty.
BUTTONS at front instead of CLASPS.
RING BUCKLE at hip for Hose supporters.
Tape-fastened Buttons—won't pull off.
CORD-EDGE Buttons.
Holes—won't wear out.
FIT ALL AGES—Infants to Adults.
Sold by Leading RETAILERS everywhere.
Send for Circular, FERRIS BROS., Manufacturers, 341 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO, WHOLESALE WESTERN AGENTS.

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"
"Retrograde" Seamed Mitts.
THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Dealers.

Dyspepsia

Makes many lives miserable, and often self destruction. Distress after eating, ache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depression, etc., are caused by this very common increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla, stomach, creates an appetite, promotes digestion, relieves sick headache, cleans mind, and cures the most obstinate case of dyspepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia but little appetite, and what I did eat did me, or did me little good. In an hour after I would experience a faintness or tired feeling, as though I had not eaten a Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and relished and satisfied the craving I had experienced. It relieved me of that fat all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am recommending it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown N. B. Be sure to get only

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell.

100 Doses One Dollar

JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT

Unlike any Other
Originated by an Old Family Physician
THINK OF IT.

In use over 40 YEARS in one Family.
DR. I. S. JOHNSON & Co.—It is sixty years ago learned of this now celebrated remedy for many ills of life—Johnson's Anodyne Liniment more than forty years I have used it in my family (unasked by you) I regard it one of the safest remedies that can be found, used internally in all cases it is claimed to relieve O. H. INGALLS, Dea. 2d Baptist Ch. Bangor, Me. Should have a house for Croup, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cuts, Bruises and Pains. Delays may cost a life. Relieve Complaints like magic! Price, 35 cts. per bottle, $2. Express paid. I. S. Johnson & Co., Bangor, Me.

LADIES' BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Use Only
Awarded highest honors
Paris, 1876; Frankfurt, 1874; Amsterdam, 1873; New Orleans, 1870; Melbourne, 1860; Paris, 1859.
and wherever exhibited
Paris Medal on every exhibition
Beware of Imitations

PIANOS UNIVERS

$150 to $1500
ESTAB. 1859.
They Lead the World
Sent for trial in your own home.
ABSOLUTELY PERFECT
DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!
Cat. Free.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N.Y. $35 to $100

25¢ PRINTING OUTFIT.

A WHOLE PRINTING OUTFIT, COMPLETE AND READY TO USE. Just as shown in cut. 25 Alphabets of best Type. Bottle of India Ink. 25¢. In case one with catalogue and directions. "THE PRINTING OUTFIT." Sets up any name, prime cards, paper, envelopes, etc. Worth 50¢. The best gift for young people. Postpaid only 25¢. For $1. Agents wanted. Ingersole & Bro., 65 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

LADY WANTED SALARY $1.50 SPECIALTIES. For our business in each locality. Intelligence, energy, but no experience necessary. Also good penman. Salary $100. GAY BROS. & CO., Capital $800,000—credit High, 84 Reade St., N.Y.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH working for us. Preferred who can furnish a horse and give the time to the business. Spare moments may be employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richd., Va.

AND POVERTY IN AN ATTIC.
Lester told us that the abundance of life consisteth not in the things that seeth (Luke 12 : 15.) Many rich men loved the truth of the words in their experience. Many of the Saviour's, too, have proved the converse of finding in the peace which He gives abundance, while possessing little of life's goods. An extreme case in a recently cited by a witness before a permanent committee of inquiry, which stigmatising the condition of the poorest of the community. He said: "I had a garret, reached by a narrow stair, with a rope nailed to the wall at the bottom, instead of a hand rail, gentle, delicate-looking sisters, sitting at a table, sewing the fatiguing blue shirts. Their mother lies on a bed in the corner of the room. They said, so they say, and ask me to examine 'remains' on the table, consisting of crusts of bread and something they butter. The sisters were too poor to have a machine, and they could not go out in any factory, for 'mother is so weak.' So they toil on, earning out two cents an hour. The home is clean, and round the walls my eyes saw sundry Scripture texts. The mother reclined upon her small bed and looked rightly and hopefully. 'How old are you?' 'Eighty-six.' 'And are you in pain?' 'Oh, yes, thank God, I feel strong.' Her face was a picture of contentment. The room seemed to me something very beautiful as we sat beside this aged saint's bed. The mother read things, written in un fading ink as we were going, she said, 'pray

PRISONER'S REGRET.
The prisoners in a penitentiary man girl whose depravity seemed as in one of her years. The crime she was incarcerated was a serious one. The chaplain went to see her in a outraged state of mind. She could not speak a few English words, and could not understand the language at all. The chaplain, when leaving her cell, left with a copy of the Gospel of John in German. She studied it diligently, and God's words. A complete change was wrought in her demeanor, and on the day of her discharge she besought the chaplain to retain the little volume. She was referring to some books belonging to the prison, and that none of them could be given. With quivering lips and tearful eyes she said: "Oh, sir, I am so sorry for that! I have never done me so much good as this book. I am sure if I had read it I should never have been sent here." At the small volume from the place she kept it, the chaplain discovered that one he had himself presented to her. He told her that she was welcome to it, and expressed the hope that the Lord would bless it to her soul. Kneeling at the door of the cell, the young woman held the little book to her heart, and exclaimed: "He has blessed it to me already! Him, and I thank you for it. I will read it over and over, and I am sure I shall come to good again."

OLD MISER'S DEATH.
A touching instance of a death resulting from love of money which we are assured is the root of all evil (1 Timothy 6 : 10) by a Scottish minister in a letter to his parish. "You mind old Jean in the back of 'Old Witch?' She died yesterday. An old creature! She was afraid to die of want, and to save a little she starved herself, and brought on Palsy with its hammer struck her like an ox—and they found her this morning lying half dead on her backstone. Great quantities of unwholesome food were found in her house, and she had thousands of dollars in money. The doctor agreed to use the money in getting soups and wines and all such things the doctor ordered; and old Jean died of them very heartily, under the care of her neighbors had provided them, and recovering fast, till waking up her attendant two mornings since at 2 a. m., to ask after money, she was stunned to hear that she had been eating and drinking her 'ain siller,' and so shocked was she that she swooned away and died soon after. What a mystery is human life and character! Queer specimen of it this! I tried again and again to speak to her of the most solemn things, but her heart was sheathed in gold and silver."

THE RECONCILIATION OF TWO MINISTERS.

The story of a quarrel adjusted by a poem is related in the life of the Rev. John Owen. He was much concerned over the estrangement of his two intimate friends, the Rev. Charles Simeon and Robert Hall. They had been dear friends, but a misunderstanding occurred, hot words were spoken and the breach widened, and in their anger they declined intercourse. After several friends had tried to restore peace and failed, Mr. Owen wrote these lines on two cards, and then left one at the house of each minister:

"How rare that task a prosperous issue finds,
Which seeks to reconcile discordant minds!
How many scruples rise to passion's touch!
This yields to little, and that asks too much;
Each wishes each with others eyes to see;
And many sinners can't make two agree.
What mediation, then, the Saviour showed,
Who singly reconciled us all to God."

The first who read the lines was so strongly impressed by them that he hastened from his house to call immediately upon his offended friend; the friend had also read the lines, and being affected by them, had done the same, and the offended persons met each other in the street. A reconciliation instantly took place—a reconciliation which was never interrupted till death separated them.

Healthy Exercise
That's what the work of washing clothes and cleaning house amounts to when it's done with Pyle's Pearline. Little or no rubbing; no drudgery; less annoyance; more comfort; more cleanliness; more economy; and a large saving of wear and tear on all sides. You'll find directions on back of package, for easy washing. It will cost you five cents to try it. Every grocer has Pearline—nothing else gives satisfaction to the millions of women who use and have been using PEARLINE for years—women who rely on their brains to save their backs.

Beware
Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers are offering imitations which they claim to be Pearline, or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—they are not, and besides are dangerous.

169 JAMES PYLE, New York.

ENGLISH DECORATED

Dinner Set, No. 90, 112 Pieces.
Premium with an order of $20.00.
Or packed and delivered at depot for $9.00 Cash. We have hundreds of other Sets, plain and decorated.

THE LONDON TEA CO., 805 Washington Street, Boston.

BABY WARDROBE.

PATTERNS. Complete outfit of 25 new and improved patterns for infants' clothes. Also 25 patterns of short clothes. Either set of patterns, together with full directions for making, amount and kind of material required, by mail, 50c.; both sets, $1.00. Such reliable patterns including every necessary article are needed by every mother.
Mrs. J. BRIDE, P. O. Box 2088, New York.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING." SOOTHENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

RUBIFOAM
FOR THE TEETH
DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED DENTIFRICE.
Cleanses, Preserves, Beautifies.
LARGE BOTTLES, PRICE 25 CENTS.
Sample Vial sent free to any address.
PREPARED AND GUARANTEED BY
E. W. HOYT & CO., LOWELL, MASS.
MANUFACTURERS OF THE Celebrated Hoyt's German Cologne.

DO YOU WRITE?

The Nette Bly Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. A perfect pen—as good as the best, except that no gold pen is used. Useful to office men, collectors, salesmen, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Sample sent to any address on receipt of price. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal discounts.

WM. E. PIAGET & CO.,
301 Broadway, New York.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.!
Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

If you are interested in SEEDS, PLANTS or ROSES,
write the Dingee & Conard Co., Westgrove, Pa.

RIDLEYS'
Grand St., N. Y.
STRAW GOODS.

Misses' Rough and Ready Sailors, fully trimmed, $1.17 each.
Ladies' Leghorn and French Chip Hats, finely trimmed, $4.75, $5.50, $6.50, $7.00 and $8.00.
Misses' and Children's Plain and Fancy Braid Hats, untrimmed, new shapes, all colors, 38c. and 63c.
Ladies' Neapolitan, Panama, Fine Milans, French Chip Manila Hats and Dress Hats, black and colors, 69c. each; bargains.
Boys' Military, Navy and Bicycle Caps, 47c., 59c., and 73c.
Large Assortment Boy's and Children's Straw Hats, 25c., 35c., 48c. to $2.10.
Misses' Fully Trimmed School Hats, 38c., 48c., 59c., and up.
Millinery Novelties, Ribbons, Laces, Silks, Velvets, Ornaments, etc.
Ladies' and Misses' Wraps, Jackets, Capes, Outing Coats, Suits, Muslin Underwear, etc.
Boys' and Men's Clothing, Ladies' and Misses' and Youth's Shoes and Slippers.

DRESS GOODS.
The Celebrated Fast Black HENRIETTAS,
SILK FINISH.

The only Fast Black Ground Wash Fabrics, with white figures, which are not affected by acids, washing or perspiration, 25c. yard; warranted. Also Plain Fast Black, guaranteed, 18c., 21c., 25c., 28c. yard.
A Complete Assortment of all New Designs just received and now on sale.
54-inch Turkish Mohair Brilliantines, leading Shades, 75c. yard; actual value $1.25.
300 pieces 48-inch Side Band Debeige Suitings, 29c. yard; worth 50c.
200 pieces, all the Latest Shades, in Cashmere, 22½c. yard.
200 pieces Zephyr Ginghams, 4½c. yard; regular price 12½c.
3 cases Crinkled Seersucker at 8½c. yard.

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.
SPECIAL LOT FINE ENGLISH FANCY Flannel Outing Shirts.

These Goods are from one of the Best Makers, combining all improvements, Fully Finished and Perfect in Fit. Worth $2.00 to $2.50,

At $1.29 Each.
HOSIERY.

2 cases Boys' Silver-Gray Summer Weight Angola Shirts and Drawers.
22 to 26 inch. 28 to 34 inch.
SIZE 23c. 25c.
Made to Sell from 38c. to 50c.

RIDLEY'S MAGAZINE,
Largely Illustrated. Contains Complete Price List of all Goods contained in our 85 Departments.
15 cts. Sample Copy; Subscription, 50 cts. Year.

ORDERS BY MAIL PROMPTLY AND CAREFULLY ATTENDED TO.

EDWARD RIDLEY & SONS,
309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand Street.
56 to 68 ALLEN St., 59 to 65 ORCHARD St., N. Y.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts.
If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.
SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.
AGENTS WANTED FOR "THE CHRISTIAN'S LEGACY."
102 sold in one church, 72 in one place of 789 people.
W. J. HOLLAND, 107 Duane St., New York.

ARE YOU SHINING FOR JESUS?

BY LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

Are you shining for Jesus to-day, brother,
Shining so clear and so bright,
That the souls that are perishing near you,
May be guided to Him by your light?
They are wandering far in the darkness,
They are lost 'mid the mazes of sin;
O brother, if brightly you're shining,
Perchance you may gather them in!

Are you shining for Jesus to-day, brother,
Shining in deed and in word?
Is your life by its purity showing
The likeness of Jesus your Lord?
The world watches closely, my brother:
If naught in your life it can see
But the fair, fragrant fruits of the Spirit,
Then the Father will glorified be.

Are you shining for Jesus to-day, brother,
Shining for truth and for right,
Where bold unbelief and its minions
Are posing as angels of light?
They would banish the cross of our Saviour,
They would silence that story of love;
Shine out o'er their folly, and show them
How futile such efforts must prove.

Oh, shine out for Jesus to-day, brother!
Shine where He needs you the most,
Shine where the darkness hangs deepest O'er the path of the straying and lost;
Shine only and always for Jesus,
And then when thy toiling is o'er,
In mansions of glory eternal,
Thou shalt shine as the stars evermore.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Humors run riot in the blood in the spring months. Hood's Sarsaparilla expels every trace of humor, tones up the whole body, gives a good appetite, and regulates the digestion.

INFLUENZA

OR

'LA GRIPPE.'

As this complaint is raging again in several large cities in Europe, and will no doubt prevail here again, all persons suffering with coughs or any lung complaints should not fail to use

WILBOR'S
COD LIVER OIL

AND

PHOSPHATES.

It gives immediate relief, and a permanent cure in a short time. It will prevent this fell disease from having a fatal termination. Be sure, as you value your health, and get the genuine, manufactured only by A. B. WILBOR, Chemist, Boston, Mass. Sold by all Druggists.

CHANCE FOR ALL

To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 34 pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

The Most Reliable Food For Infants & Invalids. Not a medicine, but a specially prepared Food, adapted to the weakest stomach. 4 sizes cans Pamphlet free. Write to H. C. (on every label). Palmer, Mass.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

"THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

BOVININE furnishes to the system all the constituents needed for making new and pure blood. USE BOVININE in all conditions of weakness, and especially when dyspepsia makes life a burden. USE BOVININE with infants that are white and bloodless, with children that do not thrive, and are puny and feeble, and with exhausted nursing mothers. USE BOVININE during convalescence from illness. "Nutrition is the basis of life."

THE J. P. BUSH MFG'G CO.,
New York City.

Perfect Days in June

Need perfect Lays for June—and here they are!

IN SHEET MUSIC FORM.

ELAINE. A Love Song. Van de Water. 50c
MIZPAH. Song. Adam Gelbel. 35c
SIGNAL BELLS AT SEA. Song. W. S. Hays. 40c
OLD HOME DOWN ON THE FARM. Dubois. 40c
VISIONS OF REST WALTZES. F. T. Baker. 60c
DANSE ECOSSAISE. F. T. Baker. 60c
EDELWEISS. Glide Waltz. T. E. Vanderbeck. 60c
BATTLE WON. Triumphal March. E. Holst. 50c

IN BOOK FORM.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. Very beautiful music. More than 40 sacred airs. Arranged by Leon Keach.
OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Arr. for Piano.
YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces.
CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION. 19 Piano Duets. Highly praised by good players.
PIANO CLASSICS. Volume 2. Marvellously good pieces, as are those of vol. 1.
SONG CLASSICS. Volume 2. Grand Music.

Any book or piece mailed for retail price, which, for any one of the superior books above mentioned is but $1.00.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.
C. H. DITSON & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

THE STANLEY BOOK.

JUST ISSUED,

Stanley; and His Relief of Emin Pasha, By E. F. SCOTT, Author of "Lectures on Africa," Etc. 250 Pages, with Maps and 20 Full-Page Illustrations. Paper, 25 cents; Half Russia, Marbled Edges $1.00. All classes of people are interested in the wonderful history and travels of this most wonderful man, and this book will have an immense sale. It will be mailed to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price. Agents wanted, to whom 50 percent commission will be paid. Send 25 cents for Prospectus Book, and go to work selling it. Address, J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, P. O. Box 2767, 57 Rose Street, New York.

THE GREATEST THING in the WORLD.

The address made at Dr. Moody's College at Northfield, by HENRY DRUMMOND. Leatherette, gilt top, 35 cents.

"Thoughtful and powerful, with a wealth of illustration."—Churchman.
"It is in Mr. Drummond's best vein."—Christian Union.

"A Brilliant Essay."
Sent by return mail on receipt of price. Every Christian man should read it.

JAMES POTT & Co., Publishers,
14 and 16 Astor Place, New York.

$100 A MONTH and $2 Outfit Free! Agents Wanted in every State to collect small pictures to copy and enlarge to a beautiful Oil Painting. The biggest thing out. Send for circulars, etc. Restorative Copying Co. Address, C. WINSLOW & CO., 274 Grand Street, New York.

WINNOWNED SONGS.

FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

By IRA D. SANKEY.
Already adopted for use by the Chautauqua Assembly, also N. Y., N. J., and other State S. S. Conventions. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If sent by mail, add 5 cents per copy.
Biglow & Main, The John Church Co., New York & Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

For Sunday Schools, Classes, etc., in every variety of design, material and workmanship.

Send 10 cents in stamps for new illustrated "Banner" catalogue.

J. & R. LAMB,
59 Carmine Street, New York.

The Great LIGHT
Frink's Patent Reflectors for Gas, Oil, or Electric give the most powerful, softest, cheapest, and best light known for Churches, Stores, Banks, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular & estimate. A liberal discount to churches & the trade. Don't be deceived by cheap imitations. I. P. FRINK, 551 Pearl St., N. Y.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores, and Residences.

H. S. NORTROP,
18 Rose Street, New York.

PEWS SEATINGS and FURNISHINGS for Churches, Halls, Sunday Schools, &c. Send for Catalogue, mentioning this paper. FORSYTHE & CO., 135 Degraw St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

TYPEWRITERS.

Largest like establishment in the world. First-class Second-hand Instruments at half new prices. Unprejudiced advice given on all makes. Machines sold on monthly payments. Any Instrument manufactured shipped, privilege to examine. EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Wholesale prices to dealers. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

TYPEWRITER 70 Broadway, New York.
HEADQUARTERS, 144 La Salle St., Chicago.

SHORTHAND Private instruction by practical verbatim reporter. 20 years' experience. No failures. Situations guaranteed. Book and Circulars Free. FRANK HARRISON, Stenographer, 233 Broadway, N. Y., or 721 Broad St., Newark, N. J.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.
VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA
"Largest Sale in the World"
Ask your Grocer for it, take no other. [62]

TRUITT'S VEGETABLE LOZENGE.

The Great Cure for Dyspepsia. You can eat anything you wish and at same time be cured. 50c a box. Druggists or by mail J. F. TRUITT, Man'r, Bridgeport, N. J.

TO MOTHER

If for any reason you cannot give your child, we can assure you that there is but one Food that is a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestion and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly of milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that it is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed. Facts told to any intelligent mother would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged, and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of giving any other Food, do not fail to ask us for a pamphlet of 64 pages, Our Baby's First and Second Year, by Marion Harland, which also contains a minute description of Lactopreparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food, their mode of manufacture. Send for it.

Read the above pamphlet and ask your Physician which Food is the nearest approach to mother's milk.
REED & CARNRICK, New York.

THE NEW MODEL,

OUR LATEST and BEST MOWER.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS

DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses. Patented 1879-1885, 1885-1886. No one using a Chart can compete with The McDowell Drafting Machine in Cut. Graceful and Perfect-Fitting. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use. Follows every Fashion. As Useful as the Sewing Machine. Free 30 days to test at your own risk. Send for Illustrated Catalogue. THE MCDOWELL CO., 6 West 14th Street, New York.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, as the machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

Ideal Felt Tooth Polishing

ENDORSED BY LEADING DENTISTS.

NON-IRRITATING TO GUMS OR ENAMEL
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS

Great men are like
SAPOLIO

They waste themselves to make the world brighter. Sapolio is a solid cake of Soap used for all cleaning purposes.

AGENTS Proof $100 month money back our new Talmage Bible. F. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curious Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 24. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.
PICTURES FROM EGYPT FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BROUGHT BY DR. TALMAGE.
OUR TROUBLES PAST. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Dog's Services Pleaded in Court, Etc.

TRUST IN OUR HEAVENLY FATHER. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
PORTRAITS OF DRS. FITZGERALD AND HAY-GOOD, the Newly Elected Bishops of the M. E. Church, South.
HORACE FAIRLEIGH'S NEED, A Story of the S. S. Golden Text. (With Illustration.)

SAVED FROM SHAME. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
AFTER THE SECOND ADVENT. By Rev. W. Haslam
Missionary Work in Madagascar—African Medicine and Philosophy—A Venerable Bride—A Russian Agnostic's Story—A Patriarchal Apostate, Etc.
WILL IT LIFT? By Rev. J. Jackson Wray. (Conc'd.)

ORIENTAL SCENES FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BROUGHT FROM EGYPT BY DR. TALMAGE.

1. Travelling in the Desert—II. The Sphinx—III. An Egyptian Lady—IV. Ascending the Pyramids—V. The Mammoth Effigy of Sesostris.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

ALL TROUBLES PAST.

"There was a rainbow round about the throne."

Rev. 4: 3.

The Rainbow Noah Saw—Only Visible to the People in the Ark—Only Seen After Rain—No Shower no Rainbow—How there Can be Rainbows in Heaven—Earth's Glories Preserved in Heaven—The Colors of the Foundations—The Celestial Ceiling—The Safety Implied—After the Deluge of Trial—And the Deluge of Sin—Of Blood—Of Sorrow—A Boyish Fancy—The Colors Symbolical.

As, after a night of fearful tempest at sea, one ship, more stanch than another, rides on undamaged among the fragments of spars and hulks that float about, so old Noah's ark, at the close of the deluge, floats on over the wreck of a dead world. Looking out of the window of the ark, you see the planks of houses, and the sheaves of wheat, and the carcasses of cattle, and the corpses of men. No tower is left to toll the burial; no mourners to form in line of procession; no ground in which to bury the dead. Sinking a line twenty-seven feet long, you just touch the tops of the mountains. Ghastliness and horror! The ark, instead of walking the sea, like a modern ship, in majesty and beauty, tosses helplessly: no helm to guide; no sail to set; no shore to steer for. Why protract the agony of the good people in such a craft, when they might in one dash of the wave have been put out of their misery?

But at yonder spot in the horizon we see colors gathering in the sky; at just the opposite point in the horizon other colors are gathering. I find that they are the two buttresses of an arched bridge. The yellow, the red, the orange, the blue, the indigo, the violet are mingled, and by invisible hands the whole structure is hung into the sky, and the ark has to sail under. An Angel swings his hand across the sky, and in the seven prismatic colors he paints with pencil of sunbeam the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature. God lifted up that great arched bridge, and set it over His own head in the heaven. John saw it, for he says, "There was a rainbow round about the throne."

A Triumphant Arch

I notice that none but the people who were in the ark saw the rainbow. It cast its shadow clear down into the water where the people were buried, and lighted up the dead faces with a strange radiance, but they could not see it. So only those who are at last found in Christ, the Ark, will see the overspanning glories of the throne. Hence you had better get into the Ark! As you call your family out at the close of the shower to show them the sign in heaven, so I want you all at last to see the grander rainbow round about the throne. "Look there!" says Noah to his wife, "at that bow in the clouds; and, Shem and Japhet, look! look!—the green, the yellow, the red, and the orange!" I should not wonder if some of your own children in the Good Land should after a while cry out to you, "Look, father! look, mother! there is a rainbow round about the throne!" You had better get into the Ark, with all your families, if you want to see it.

I notice also that the chief glory of God comes after the rain.

No Shower No Rainbow.

no trouble, no brightness of Christian comfort. Weavers are sometimes, by reason of their work, dusty and rough in their apparel; and so it is the coarse-clad tempest, whose hand and foot swing the shuttle, that weaves the rainbow. Many Christians are dull, and stupid, and useless because they have not had disaster enough to wake them up. The brightest scarf that heaven makes is thrown over the shoulders of the storm. You can not make a thorough Christian life out of sunshine alone. There are some very dark hues in the ribbon of the rainbow: you must have in life the blue as well as the orange. Mingling all the colors of the former makes a white light; and it takes all the shades, and sadnesses, and vicissitudes of life to make the white lustre of a pure Christian character.

Your child asks you, "Father, what makes the rainbow?" and you say, "It is the sunlight striking through the rain-drops." Therefore I wondered how there could be a rainbow in heaven, since there are no storms there; but then I conclude that that rainbow must be formed by the striking of heaven's sunlight through the falling tears of earthly sorrow. When we see a man overwhelmed with trouble, and his health goes, and his property goes, and his friends go, I say, "Now we shall see the glory of God in this good man's deliverance." As at Niagara Falls I saw, one day, ten rainbows spanning the awful plunge of the cataract, so over the abyss of the Christian's trial hover the rich-hued wings of all the promises.

The Rainbow in Heaven.

I notice that the most beautiful things of this world are to be preserved in heaven. When you see the last color fade out from the rainbow of earth, you need not feel sad, for you will see the rainbow round about the throne. That story about the world burning up has given me many a pang. When I read that Paris was besieged, I said, "Now the pictures and statues in the Louvre and Luxembourg will be destroyed; all those faces of Rembrandt, and those bold dashes of Rubens, and those enchantments of Raphael on canvas, and those statues of Canova." But is it not a more melancholy thought that ruin is to come upon this great glory of the earth, in which the mountains are the chiseled sculptures, and upon the sky, in which the "transfiguration" of sunrise and sunset is hung with loops and tassels of fire? I was relieved when I found that the pictures had been removed from the Louvre and the Luxembourg, and I am relieved now when I think that the best parts of this earth are either to be removed or pictured in the Good Land. The trees must twist in the last fire—the oaks, and the cedars, and the maples; but in heaven there shall be the trees of life on the bank of the river, and the palm-trees from which the conquerors shall pluck their branches. The Hudson, and the St. Lawrence, and the Ohio shall boil in the last flame, but we shall have more than their beauty in the River of Life from under the throne. The daisies, and the portulacas, and the roses of earth will wither in the hot sirocco of the judgment, but John tells of the garlands which the glorified wear; and there must be flowers, or there could be no garlands.

The rainbow on our sky, which is only the pillow of the dying storm, must be removed; but then, glory be to God! "there is a rainbow round about the throne." I have but to look up to the radiant arch above the throne of God to assure myself that the most glorious things of earth are to be preserved in heaven. Then let the world burn: all that is worth saving will be

Snatched Out of the Fire.

I see the same truth set forth in the twelve foundations of the wall of heaven. St. John announces the twelve foundations of this wall to be, the first, of jasper—yellow and red; the second, of sapphire—a deep blue; the third, a chalcidony—a varied beauty; the fourth, emerald—a bright green color; the fifth, sardonyx—a bluish white; the sixth, sardius—red and fiery; the seventh, chrysolite—golden-hued; the eighth, beryl—a bluish green; the ninth, topaz—a pale green mixed with yellow; the tenth, chrysoprasus—a golden bluish tint; the eleventh, jacinth—fiery as the sunset; the twelfth, amethyst. But these precious stones are only the foundation of the wall of heaven—the most inferior part of it. On the top of this foundation there rises a mighty wall of jasper—of brilliant yellow and gorgeous crimson. Stupendous cataract of color! Throne of splendor and sublimity!

You see that the beautiful colors which are the robes of glory to our earth are to be forever preserved in this wall of heaven. Our skies of blue, which sometimes seem almost to drop with richness of color, shall be glorified and eternized in the deep everlasting blue of that fiery stone which forms the second foundation of the heavenly wall. The green that sleeps on the brook's bank, and rides on the sea-wave, and spreads its banners on the mountain top, shall be eternized in the emerald that forms the fourth foundation of the heavenly wall. The fiery gush of the morning, the conflagration of the autumnal sunset, the electricity that shoots its forked tongue out of the thunder-cloud, the flame at whose breath Moscow fell and Ætna burn, shall be eternized in the fiery jasper. It seems as if all earthly beauty were in one billow to be dashed up against that wall of heaven; so that the most beautiful things of earth will be kept either in the wall, or the foundation, or in the rainbow round about the throne.

I notice the unspeakable

Attractiveness of Heaven.

In other places the Bible tells us of the floor of heaven—the waters, and the stones, and the fruits; but now St. John tells us of the roof—the frescoed arch of eternity, and the rainbow round about the throne. Get a ticket, and, carefully guarded, you go into the royal factory at Paris where the Gobelin tapestries of the world are made, and see how for years a man will sit putting in and out a ball of colored worsteds through the delicate threads, satisfied if he can in a day make so much as a finger's breath of beauty for a king's canopy. But behold how my Lord, in one hour, with His two hands, twisted the tapestry, now swung above the throne, into a rainbow of infinite glory. Oh, what a place heaven must be! You have heretofore looked at the floor this morning take one glance at the ceiling.

I notice what must be the feeling of safety among the people of heaven. Have you ever seen a cloud burst? There have been days when it rained as if it would never stop. You knew, if it kept on in that way long, all the nations would be drowned; yet you had no apprehension, for you remember the Bow of Promise painted on the cloud in Noah's time. So the glorified have but to look to the arch around the throne of the King to be reassured that the deluge of trial is forever past.

After the Deluge of Sin.

On earth, the deluge of sin covers the tops of the highest mountains. I heard an Alpine guide, amid the most stupendous evidences of God's power, swear at his mule as he stumbled in the pass. Yes, the deluge of sin dashes over the top of the highest mountain ranges. Revenge, drunkenness, impiety, falsehood, blasphemy, are but different waves of a flood that has whelmed nations. New York is drowned in it, Brooklyn is drowned in it, Boston is drowned in it, London is drowned in it, St. Petersburg is drowned in it—two great hemispheres are drowned in it. But the redeemed, looking unto the "rainbow round about the throne," see the pledge that all this is ended for them forever. They have committed their last sin, and combated their last temptation. No suicide leap into those bright waters; no profanity befoul that pure air; no villain's torch shall fire those temples; no murderer's hand shall strike down those sons of God. They know that for them the deluge of sin is assuaged, for "there is a rainbow round about the throne."

Now the world is covered with

A Deluge of Blood.

The nations here are all the time either using the sword or sharpening it. The factories of the world are night and day manufacturing the weaponry of death. Throne against throne, empire against empire. The spirit of despotism and freedom at war in every land: despotism against free America, despotic England against free England, despotic Germany against free Germany, despotic Austria against free Austria. The great battle of earth is being fought—the Armageddon of the nations. The song that unrolled from the sky on the first Christmas night, of "peace and good will to men," is drowned in the booming of the great siege-guns. Stand back, and let the long line of ambulances pass. Groan to groan. Uncover and look upon the trenches of the dead. Blood! blood!—a deluge of blood!

But the redeemed of heaven, looking upon the glorious arch that spans the throne, shall see that the deluge is over. No batteries are planted on those hills; no barricades blocking those streets; no hostile flag above those walls smoke of burning villages; no shrieks of chered men; but peace! German and Frenchman, who fell with arms interlocked in the field of death, now, through Christ reaven, stand with arms interlocked in love. Shields stacked forever; shields of battle hung

The dove instead of the eagle; the lamb instead of the lion. There shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mount, for there is a rainbow round about the throne. Now the earth is covered with

The Deluge of Sorrow.

Trouble! trouble! trouble! The very first utterance when we come into the world is a cry. Without any teaching, we learn to weep. What has so wrinkled that man's face? What has so maturely whitened his hair? What calls that sigh? What starts that tear? Trouble! Trouble! I find it in the cellar of poverty, and up among the heights on the top of the mountains; for this also hath gone over the tops of the highest mountains. No escape from it. You go into the store, and it meets you at your counting-desk; you go into the street, and it meets you at the corner; you go into the house, it meets you at the door. Tears of poverty! Tears of persecution! Tears of bereavement!—A deluge of tears! Gathered together from all earth, they could float an ark larger than Noah's.

At the glorified, looking up to the bow that is the throne, shall see that the deluge is over. No shivering wretch on the palace-step; no blind man at the gate of the heavenly temple, begging for alms; no grinding of the screw-driver of sin-lid. They look up at the rainbow, and in lines of yellow, and red, and green, and orange, and indigo, and violet, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Thank God for glory spanning the throne!

A Boyhood Fancy.

Our boyhood we had a superstition that at the foot of the rainbow there was a casket of gold; but I have to announce that at the end of this rainbow of heaven there is a box full out of the wood of the cross. Open it, and you find all the treasures of heaven.

That our eyes may all look upon this bow of promise, lifted by Christ's own hand! We trace the separate lines of beauty across the spectrum. In the line of red I shall see the blood of my Lord; in the blue, the bruises that marked His cheek; in the green, the freshness of His grace; in the violet, His humility; in all the curve of beauty, the bend of His right arm as He swung over all the redeemed.

At the end of what I told you at the beginning, what I tell you at the close—that none but those who are in the ark saw the rainbow, and only those who are at last in Christ shall see it amid the glories of heaven.

Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

A VENERABLE BRIDE.

LOVERS' quarrel of nearly half a century ending in a marriage at Independence, recently. A local journal says, that three weeks ago, rather a remarkable couple went to court House to be married. The bride was seven years of age and the bridegroom seventy. The story told by the latter is some fifty years ago, he and the lady who is his wife were living on adjoining farms near Aberdeen, Scotland. He had loved her from boyhood, and she had promised to marry him when he was able to provide a home for her. That period was rapidly approaching, when some young clergyman came to the village.

The girl admired the new comer, and over saw, or fancied he saw, a change in her manner toward him. He upbraided her with inconstancy, and she answered him with words. One day after seeing her walking with the clergyman he repeated his protest, and they had a bitter quarrel. The next day he went to beg forgiveness, but the girl would not see him. Finally she sent him back the engagement ring, and then he thought all was over. He was so greatly depressed that the country became hateful to him, and he came to America. He drifted to Wisconsin where he made money and became wealthy. About a year ago he thought he would like to see his old home again. He went, and while there, made inquiries for his old love. He heard that she had repented of her harshness to him, and hoped he would return or write her. At length, hearing nothing of him she married, had led an unhappy life, and had gone to America with her husband, who was an idle, shiftless fellow, who was now dead, and she was living in poverty. He secured her address, returned, and found her in Independence, Mo. She consented to marry him, old as they both were, and the aged bridegroom declared in conclusion, that they were as happy as the youngest bridal couple in the country. Doubtless, however, the bride's happiness is alloyed with regret, as she thinks that that happiness might have been her's for so many years, but for her folly in dismissing the man who loved her. So it is with many who are converted late in life. While rejoicing in Christ they mourn over the years that were spent apart from Him which might have been years of joy and service. (Joel 2:25.)

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Stuart's Hairbreadth Escape.*

ON one of my visits to the army, I took Dr. Kirk, Mr. William E. Dodge, and another friend from New York, to visit Camp Convalescent, about ten miles from Washington. Here we held a memorable prayer-meeting in one of our large tents; and the meeting became so deeply interesting that, when the drum beat for the soldiers to retire to their quarters, the colonel of an Ohio regiment (who I afterward learned was an infidel) said, as many of the soldiers rose to go, "Keep your seats; I will have you all excused for being out after hours." The meeting increased in interest, went on until it was ten o'clock, when it was with difficulty adjourned. As we passed out of the door the colonel asked us where we were going to stay for the night. We told him that we had to go to Washington, and pointed to our carriage that stood by the door. His reply was, "That is impossible, as all the sentinels have been posted for the night, and Gen. Grant has given orders that no civilian shall have the countersign." This order had become necessary through the countersign having been misused. To this I replied, that if Gen. Grant were there, I could get it. The colonel responded, "But he is not here, and you will have to stay with us for the night." Then Mr. Dodge said, "I have a most important engagement in New York, and must leave Washington by the early morning train."

The colonel then left to see what could be done about the matter. On his return, taking me aside so that my friends could not hear what he said, he told me that when we had got about two miles out of the camp we should encounter a sentinel, who would cry out, "Who goes there?" that I should then respond, "A friend, with the countersign;" to which the sentinel would reply, "Advance, and give the countersign;" that I was then to advance and give the countersign, which was Beverley. We left the camp and were stopped by the sentinel, who demanded the countersign as the colonel said he would. Leaving the carriage and advancing to within a few paces of where the sentinel stood, I saw him with his gun pointed at me and heard him exclaim, with a loud voice, "Halt, and give the countersign;" to which I answered with the mystic word, Beverley. Judge then of my astonishment when the sentinel responded, "Mr. Stuart, you have got the wrong countersign;" to which I replied, "What is the right one?" He answered, "I dare not give it to you under penalty of death, and had I not known your voice I should have shot you on the spot."

Returning to the carriage, with this startling news, nothing remained but to return to the camp we had left. On making our way to the headquarters of the general in command and explaining our trouble, he asked if Dr. Kirk was not one of our party, adding, that if so, the countersign might be imparted to him. It was Massachusetts. Up to this day we have never been able to understand why the colonel gave us the wrong countersign, which might have cost me my life. On retracing our steps toward Washington late that night, and going through the same ordeal, Massachusetts carried us safely through the lines. Upon coming up to the sentinel I was curious to ascertain how he recognized my voice. Strange to say, he told me that he heard me, some years before, address a Sunday-school, of which he was a member, in New York. Had it not been for this recognition, and his knowledge of my connection with the army, I should have been a dead man. Placing my hand upon his shoulder I asked him if he had the countersign. His reply was, "Thank God, I have." "What is it?" said I. His prompt reply was, "The blood of Jesus." Shaking my good soldier friend by the hand, and bidding him good-night, I said, "With this countersign there will be no danger of your being halted at the gates of Heaven."

A Bishop at the Front.

I had the pleasure of taking the venerable Bishop McIlvaine to the front that he might see for himself the work we were doing among the soldiers. On reaching Fredericksburg we found that the town was deserted by its citizens, and every house filled with wounded and dying soldiers, many of whom I visited in company with our good bishop, who at times, was so affected that he could not restrain his feelings. I can see him now in that splendid mansion on the hill overlooking the town, talking to our wounded men on the verandah, in the parlors, the kitchen, the dining-room, and the chambers up-stairs, until we reached the garret, on the floor of which, among other soldiers, lay a poor dying Indian, and the only English word that he seemed to understand was the name of Jesus. To see the venerable bishop go down on his knees, with his hands on either side of this poor dying soldier, and pray that the blood of Jesus might wash away his sins, was a sight I shall never forget. No wonder that he said to me, "Stuart, I must retire. This is too much for my feeble frame." During our brief visit to one of the factories which was occupied as a hospital, we found a number of persons gathered around the cot of a soldier who was near his end, without a hope in Christ, and begging for our prayers in his behalf. The Bishop joined this group and spoke to the suffering one as only he could. At this time my attention was drawn to a soldier on the other side of the room, whose face was so calm and placid that I felt that he was not much of a sufferer. The contrast between the two men was so great that I said to the latter, "You seem to be so happy that I suppose you did not suffer much in the battle." His only reply was to throw off the coverlet when I found that both his legs were gone. The grace of God sustained him, and his face was beaming with joy, presenting a sharp contrast to that of his neighbor, who was filled with despair. This Christian soldier who died that very night, said that he was willing to give his life for his country, and God took him at his word.

Volume XII., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1889, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, 1887, and 1888 are also for sale. None are on hand prior to 1884.

"The Christian Herald" Binder. — Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

* From the Life of George H. Stuart, Written by Himself. A deeply interesting work, describing not only Mr. Stuart's own eventful life, but the work of the Christian Commission in the War. With portraits of several famous men. Pp. 383; Published by J. M. Stoddart & Co., Philadelphia.

PICTURES FROM EGYPT.

(See first page.)

THIS week on the first page is another group of pictures engraved from a photograph brought from the Holy Land by Dr. Talmage. They are grouped on the principle of locality, these being all connected with Egypt and the desert. In publishing them we call attention again, to the main purpose we have in view. It is not so much to furnish interesting narratives of travel—though no countries in the world, supply better material for that purpose—but to throw light on the Scriptures. It is a remarkable and, to the Christian a most encouraging fact that the more the Bible lands are explored, and the more closely they are examined by men of learning, the more clear does the meaning of the Word of God become, and the more expressive are the passages which but for the exploration might have remained incomprehensible. The Bible can afford to invite the fullest investigation. Those who investigate with an impartial mind almost invariably believe.

The Camel,

which is the subject of Illustration No. 1, is one of the most convincing proofs in natural history of the world being the creation of a Being of infinite wisdom. Precisely in the place where neither horses, nor asses, nor any other beast could do the work that man needs to have done, the camel is found, with precisely the organs and qualities required for the service. Without its aid the desert would be almost impassable. It has a broad cushioned foot adapted for walking easily on the loose sand. It has four stomachs, one of which is fitted with membranous cells for holding water, thus enabling it to store a supply of this necessary fluid, sufficient to last it for four or more days without drinking—a quality indispensable for long desert journeys in which wells are few and far between. Then the hump on its back has its use, too. No animal can go so long without food. The hump which in a well-fed camel is large and firm at the outset of the journey, becomes small and flabby if food is scarce by the way, the beast having some extraordinary power of absorbing sustenance from this strange protuberance. Add to this its astonishing power of smell, enabling it to steer for the water long before its driver is aware that he is near a stream; eyes that have a prodigious length of sight, and nostrils which have a muscular power of closing against the entrance of the sand, and there is an animal specially adapted with wonderful foresight for the special work it has to do.

The value of the camel as a beast of burden was early recognized. Pharaoh gave some of them to Abram (Gen. 12: 16), and when his servant went to look for a wife for Isaac, he took ten camels as the equipage of the party. (Gen. 24: 10). Rebekah drew water for them (Gen. 24: 19), and when she returned with the servant to become Isaac's wife she rode upon a camel. The Ishmaelites who bought Joseph of his brethren were riding on camels. (Gen. 37: 25). And among the grievous losses the Egyptians sustained, during the prevalence of the plagues, the loss of their camels is specifically mentioned. (Exod. 9: 3). In the New Testament, too, the beast furnished our Lord with one of His most forcible illustrations. "It is easier," He said, (Matt. 19: 24), "for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." The eye of a needle referred to was doubtless the small entrance for foot passengers, at the gate of a city which was often called the needle's eye, in comparison with the large entrance for animals and vehicles. The tall, unwieldy animal, could enter at the small entrance, but it was with difficulty, as it is for the rich man to enter the kingdom of God. The phrase was a proverb in Palestine for an exploit so difficult as to be almost impossible.

There appear to be as many varieties in the camel as there are in horses. Some of them, whose strength is extraordinary, can carry loads of over six hundred pounds piled on their backs, and will travel at a pace of about three miles an hour, while the dromedaries, lighter and swifter, will keep up a pace of nine miles an hour for twenty consecutive hours. Some of them will go at a rate of twelve miles an hour for one or two hours. They are thus as much an indication of the trade of a country in the East, as the lines of railroad are with us, and it is to this fact that Isaiah alludes when, in describing the blessings of Messiah's reign, he says: (Isa. 60: 6), "The multitude of camels shall cover thee; the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah . . . they shall bring gold and incense." Travel on camel-back needs experience. It is comfortable when the animal walks, but the oscillation when it runs, with its long, swinging strides, is as trying to the inexperienced rider as a first voyage at sea. Dr. Talmage tried the experiment of a ride on a camel during his recent tour, but was glad to finish his journey on a donkey.

The Sphinx,

a picture of which occupies panel No. 3, of the illustration on the first page, has excited the wonder of many generations. It is a colossal image cut out of the solid rock, about three hundred feet from the second pyramid. Some idea of its gigantic proportions may be formed from the picture. The two men who stood there, when the photograph was taken, were men of ordinary size, yet they look insignificant beside the image. It measures 102 feet around the forehead, and the other features are in proportion. The inscriptions upon the image and on the surrounding rock indicate that it was set up about the same time as the great pyramid, which was, according to our generally received chronology, only some two or three generations after Noah. The skill with which the natural rock was sculptured into the shape of the human face, still excites the admiration of sculptors, and their wonder is no less excited by the adroitness with which masonry was used to supplement the rock in shaping the body of the image. It is still uncertain whether the face was an ideal one, or represented the features of the king. The fact, however, that an altar was found standing before it, when the sand which had covered it for generations was removed, indicated that it had been worshipped. Like the smaller Sphinxes in the avenue at Memphis, the great Sphinx has a human head on a lion's body and probably at one time there were wings on its sides. It must have been in all its glory when Moses led the children of Israel out of Egypt, for a tablet on the wall of a ruined temple at its feet, states that the temple was erected and dedicated to the Sphinx by Rameses II., the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites.

The Ascent of the Pyramid,

depicted in panel 4 of the illustration on the first page, is a work of some difficulty for which the assistance of guides is required. These men not only show the way, but actually hoist the climber in places of unusual steepness. Not long since, an Englishman who attempted the ascent unassisted, succeeded in getting to the top, but missed his footing in descending and was dashed to pieces. Three guides are detailed to each member of the party. Two of these go ahead and pull him up, while the third helps to raise him from behind. They are in the pay of a sheik, who undertakes to have the party taken up and down safely, and particularly cautions them against giving any gratuity to the guides. During the ascent these latter exert themselves to make a favorable impression on the visitors. They have acquired sufficient English words to make themselves understood, and they chatter away in cheerful, affable manner. Once on the top they produce curiosities which they claim were found in the sarcophagi, or are little idols from the tombs, or, if the visitor looks very ignorant, stones, which they declare are sapphires. These they want to sell, and they put on a very fierce manner in urging a sale. Visitors looking at the fierce visages of the men, and then down at the rocky precipice before them, and realizing how easily such men might push them over, are apt to buy anything and pay any price asked. The men understand this, and their ferocity and bluster are merely elements of their trade.

At the top of the pyramid the visitor does find it rising to a point, as it appeared to from the plain below, and as it did when the pyramid was built, but there is a perfectly level surface, on which about two hundred persons might stand. Before the descent is commenced one end of a long strip of muslin is fastened around the waist of each visitor and the other end is retained by the guides. This is a necessary precaution, for if one stumbled and fell would rebound from step to step until he mangled at the bottom. The ascent and descent occupy about twenty minutes each; but when Dr. Talmage and his friends were there, they were astonished by one of the guides, a man sixty years, who asked them to notice the time in which he could go up and down again alone. He went up like a cat, and having stood a moment on the top waving his hands in triumph he came down with equal agility, and stood safely again among them, in ten minutes from the time he began the ascent. A stone hut is erected at the foot of the pyramid, in which the visitor finds coffee provided. There is to be a hotel built there shortly, which, it is expected, will be largely patronized by invalids, especially those suffering from pulmonary diseases, to whom the atmosphere so warm and dry as that at the base of the pyramid is very beneficial.

There are some seventy pyramids in all, the most famous are the three of Gizeh, in the Libyan Desert, at Memphis, on the west bank of the Nile. Their purpose long remained a mystery, but it is now conclusively proved that they were built as places of burial for the monarchs of Egypt, from the fourth to the twelfth dynasty, about four thousand years ago. The process of construction was to dig down to the solid rock and excavate the chamber in which the king intended that his mummy should lie. From this chamber a narrow, slanting passage was cut to the surface, the entrance to which should be outside and beyond the base of the pyramid. Above this chamber towered a stupendous solid mass of the pyramid itself, this grew and increased in area and height as the king, who was building it for a colossal tomb for his body, lived on. The shape of the pyramid, which was square at the base, with four sides exactly facing the four points of the compass and tapering in width and inward point at the top, lent itself naturally to gradual growth. Slabs appear to have been placed vertically against each tier of steps, a new tier at the top thus became necessary to preserve the outline. At the time of its completion the base of the great pyramid covered thirteen acres, and was 480 feet high, or seventy feet lower than the obelisk at Washington. It is now much reduced in size, a large number of the facing-stones having been removed and used in the building of Cairo. The work occupied thirty years in construction and 100,000 men were employed upon it. In a country in which public works of so colossal character were undertaken, the statement that the whole Hebrew nation was employed in brickmaking and kindred pursuits does not seem so incredible as it has been represented.

A peculiar feature of the great pyramid is the construction of two chambers in the heart of the pyramid which were apparently made after the structure was built. One of them is cut above and to the west of the other, and they are connected by a spacious gallery and a slanting passage, while another slanting passage leads from them to the exterior of the pyramid. It is on the measurement of these chambers, the gallery, and the passages, that Prof. Petrie Smith based his theory of the symbolic and prophetic significance of the pyramid.

The Veiled Lady

in the medallion, in the centre of the illustration, is the portrait of an Egyptian lady of high rank. It also is taken from a photograph, and shows how the veils (mentioned in our previous article on May 28th), are now worn. The modern custom retains the veil, but compromises in the manner in which it is worn. The head and top of the hair is covered by one portion d the mouth by another. The eyes, which he chief beauty in an Oriental woman's face now uncovered, and the delicate lace which the veil, allows much of the contour of face to be seen. It could not have been a veil as this, that Rebekah used when ing her future husband, in the field she k a veil and covered herself." (Gen. 24: The customs in Mohammedan countries, ver, are still based on the assumption of feriority in woman. They do not join the in worship, and they are left, in the major- f cases, absolutely uneducated. Christian- as that claim on feminine fealty that it her her true place in the home, in the y, and in society, which in Oriental lands, nished her.

The Statue of Sesostris

rich a picture occupies panel number five of illustration, is the sculptured image of Ram- II., the great monarch of ancient Egypt, n the Greeks called Sesostris. His body recently been discovered, preserved by the lerful skill with which the Egyptians emed their dead, and is now in the museum koulak, near Cairo. This was the mon- under whom Egypt attained the zenith er power. "The great builder," as he is d, in whose reign the greatest of the na- edifices were erected. His precocious de- ment led his father, Seti I., to associate him e he was only twelve years old with himsel e government. He reigned jointly with his r until his father's death twenty years later. then reigned alone for forty-seven years. l, he governed Egypt during the long period ty-seven years. It seems to be generally ed that this Rameses II., or Sesostris, was ather of the princess who adopted Moses, therefore the Pharaoh of the oppression, ough to slay Moses (Exod. 2: 15), after he killed the Egyptian. He died while Moses in exile in Midian, and the expression used e inspired chronicler in recording his death ys a delicate hint of the length of his reign. ame to pass," he says (Exod. 2: 23), in pro- of time, that the King of Egypt died. The Menephtah, owing to the length of his r's reign, was an old man when he ascended throne, probably over sixty. He was the aoh who would not let the people go, the lating Pharaoh, who, when he finally drove out, sent an army after them to bring them . There are no ancient statues in Egypt so erous as those of the great Rameses. Many em were probably sculptured during his reign and by his order, while others were e after his death by his subjects who treas- his memory and worshipped him as a God. ace appears on the ancient monuments, and that his body has been found, we are able e how skilfully and faithfully the Egyptian tors did their work.

REV. ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD, D. D. Elected Bishop of the M. E. Church, South.

See Portrait on Page 380.

US is not the first time that Dr. Haygood een called to the bishopric. Sixteen years e had become so well-known in the Church, his eminent abilities, profound learning, genial disposition had inspired such con- ce among his ministerial brethren that he elected bishop, though at that time he was thirty-five years of age. But Dr. Haygood then engaged in a work in which he was ly interested and which he wished to con- to superintend until a crisis was safely ed and he could leave the work to other s with the confidence that it would go on loping and improving. He therefore ded the honor his brethren conferred upon believing that he could render more valu- service to the Church in the more humble ion he then occupied. Now the offer has renewed, and in the changed circum- ces of this later time, Dr. Haygood has no nction in accepting it.

Haygood is in his fifty-first year, having born in Georgia, in November, 1839. He only twenty years old when he took his place in the Conference as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He early took a deep interest in educational matters and was ever ready to lend a hand in assisting young men to acquire the knowledge and power which would fit them to become efficient ministers of Christ. In 1876 he reached the highest position in this department that was within the reach of a Southern Methodist minister, by becoming president of Emory College, Macon, Ga. During the eight years that he held this office he gave to its duties all the love and enthusiasm and hard work of a nature in which those qualities seem inexhaustible. Then another laborious, but not less congenial task was committed to his hands in the general administration of the fund of a million dollars, which John F. Slater, of Connecticut, bequeathed to aid in the work of educating the colored race. This fund has been managed under his administration with wonderful skill, and with a clear and compre- hensive knowledge of the real needs of the people whose best interests it was designed to promote.

Dr. Haygood has the true American idea of the purpose and use of education, and never fails, when he has opportunity, to impress his principle on those who are seeking to raise themselves in the social scale. "If book-learning," he insists, "does not increase one's earning capacity, it is a business failure; if it decreases it, it is an injury as well as a failure; if it increases wants and decreases capacity to supply them, it is simply ruin—ruin of all sorts." He is profoundly convinced of the hopefulness of his work. "It is," he says, "in the colored race of this country to become self-sustaining," and probably no man in the country has labored more earnestly than he to make them so. Like his brother bishop, Dr. Fitzgerald, Dr. Haygood is a zealous opponent of sectional prejudice.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Singular Absence of Mind on the Part of an editor, in a New England town, was frankly confessed recently, in the columns of his journal. He says that he had promised his wife to purchase some article for the household, and on leaving his office about seven o'clock in the evening, he went to his nephew's store to get it. To his amazement he found the store closed. Looking around, he saw that all the grocery stores were also closed. Inquiring the reason from an acquaintance, who was passing, he learned that the store-keepers had agreed among themselves to close at six o'clock during the summer months. Then it dawned upon his memory that he had not only published an announcement of the fact in his own journal, but had himself advocated the movement in an editorial at its initiation, and had subsequently, in a paragraph, notified buyers of the day when it would go into operation. There is reason to fear that a similar absence of mind afflicts some persons, who, though unconverted are engaged in occasional Christian work. It will be unspeakably sad if it is found, at the last, that any Sunday-school teacher who has warned others of the danger of procrastination has been cut off in his sins. (1 Cor. 9: 27.)

An Heiress was Found in the Slums of Leadville, Col., a few days ago. The Republican of Denver, Col., states that a lawyer of that city was recently requested to institute a search for a woman who had lived there some years ago. He had a minute description of her and began his search. He found that when in Denver she had been in very unhappy circumstances. Her husband was a drunkard and a gambler and had made her home miserable. He had plenty of money but soon spent it, and afterward made his living by very disreputable means. The woman remained faithful to him and patiently bore his insults and ill-treatment. He fell ill and she worked for his support and nursed him with the most exemplary kindness, which he repaid with brutality. Finally he died and the widow earned enough to bury him decently. Then work failed her and she went to Leadville to look for employment there. She managed to earn just enough to support her, but the sum was so small that she had to live in a tenement house in the most squalid part of the town; vice and misery were all around her, but she lived an honest life and kept herself aloof from the evil. There the lawyer found her and informed her that he was commissioned to pay her $150,000. Nearly fifteen years ago she had incensed her father, a wealthy merchant in Ohio, by her marriage, and he drove her from his door vowing never to see her again. But he repented before he died and tried to find her. He failed, but he left her all his property. During those long years of misery she had never written to him or asked his help, though she had learned by bitter experience that he had been right in opposing her marriage. She did not know that he was willing to receive her, or she would have gone back to him. It is so with many of those who have wandered from God. They know that they have done wrong, and their misery is a just punishment of their sin, but they do not return because they do not know that God still loves them and is yearning to forgive them. (Isa. 55: 7.)

The Captains of Ocean Steamships Which have recently collided with icebergs or have narrowly escaped collision, are blamed for their temerity by the officials of the Government. These latter state that all the collisions which have occurred during the last two months could have been avoided by observing the course laid out by the United States Hydrographic Office. This office has been each month sending out warnings of the amount of ice in the North Atlantic, caused by peculiar climatic conditions in the Arctic. The drift of the vast ice-fields and monster bergs was directly in the line of ocean steamships, and special bulletins have from time to time appeared, indicating the position of the ice and its probable location in the immediate future. During the month of May alone, there were six notable encounters with ice, five of which were by passenger steamships. The captains incurred awful responsibility in taking the course beset by dangers, after being explicitly warned of it. The disposition to disregard warnings is not, however, confined to mariners. In the voyage of life are innumerable dangers, against which the voyager is warned in the Word of God. The appalling number of moral and spiritual wrecks, prove how few are deterred from taking the dangerous course. (Prov. 29: 1.)

A Dog's Services were Pleaded in a New York court on May 27th, as a defence for contempt of court. A gentleman living on Ninth street was charged with disobeying an order from the court, requiring him to kill his dog. A few days previously some boys were playing outside his door with a ball, which rolled into his passage-way. They rushed in after it, shouting uproariously. His dog did not understand the noise, and running into the hall, bit one of the children. The child's parents asked the Court to order the dog killed, and the Court did so. But the dog still lived, and so the owner was summoned to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court. He said that he could not bear to kill the dog, for he owed his life to the animal's intelligence and fidelity. About a year ago his bed caught fire while he was asleep, and the dog had jumped on the bed and barked, and pulled at his sleeve until he awoke. In a little while it would have been too late. The judge, having heard his story, understood his reluctance to slay his preserver, but said the dog must either be killed, or the owner must pay a heavy fine. The man said he was willing to pay, or even go to prison, rather than kill the dog, and the judge finally let him off with a fine of ten dollars, which he cheerfully paid. Most men would have acted in the same way, for even a dog has claims on the gratitude of one to whom it has rendered such a service. It is much to be wished that the same spirit actuated Christians in their spiritual concerns. There is not always the readiness to make sacrifices for Him who has saved them from eternal death, that He has a right to expect. (Rom. 12: 1.)

AFTER THE SECOND ADVENT.

By Rev. W. Haslam, M. A.

Restitution Promised—A Common Error—Mistakes About Isolated Passages—Physical Changes in Palestine—In Jerusalem Itself—A Site Raised for the Temple—A Plateau Nine Miles Square—The Whole Earth Affected—Restoration Universal—To Be Effected Suddenly—How It Appeared to Isaiah.

THE word Restitution occurs but once in the New Testament; but Regeneration, or that which it implies, God has promised by the mouth of His holy prophets since the world began. Moreover, the Apostle Peter tells us that "the heaven must receive" Christ "until the times of restitution of all things." (See Acts 3: 21.)

Here then we have a long-intended and long predicted event set before us; and we are plainly told when to expect its fulfilment. It is to be at the Coming of the Lord to the earth.

The Apostle Paul also gives us his testimony on this subject. He says that "the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God," "because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. 8: 19, 21.)

Yet, notwithstanding all these plain assertions in the Word of God, by some strange aberration or power of deception, it has been believed and taught that when Christ comes in His glory the end of all things is to take place! This teaching has been most devoutly received for centuries, and by multitudes it is so still.

Scripture plainly declares that the Lord is coming to take His people to Himself; and that immediately subsequent to this He is coming with them.

To Remove Sin and the Curse

from the earth, and to bring in everlasting righteousness. There are, to be sure, some passages of Scripture which, when distorted and torn away from their context, may seem to support the popular tradition. But what error, may I ask, is there that cannot be confirmed by such misuse or misapplication of the Word of God?

For instance, we read, "There was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind: and the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." (Rev. 6: 12-14.) These words, which refer to the day of the Lord's Coming, and to the great physical changes which are to take place, may easily be taken as signs of the end of the world by those persons who entertain such an expectation.

Zechariah tells us that the Lord's "feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley: and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south. And ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains; for the valley of the mountains shall reach unto Azal: yea, ye shall flee, like as ye fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, kind of Judah: and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee." (Zech. 14: 4, 5.)

In these remarkable words we have note of a change which is to be in the neighborhood of Jerusalem.

A Valley is to Be Formed

From the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea. In consequence, a channel shall be opened across Palestine, through which the waters of the Atlantic by the Mediterranean Sea will pass through and fill the desert land beyond. There a highway shall be made to the east and to the west. This physical change evidently refers to some intended improvement not to destruction. It will render Jerusalem more accessible to all the nations of the world.

Then, as to the site of Jerusalem itself; we are told by the same prophet that "the land shall be turned as a plain from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem; and it shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner-gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's winepresses. And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited." (Zech. 14: 10, 11.)

Here again the prophet speaks not of destruction, but the elevation of the land upon which the city of Jerusalem is to be built. We may suppose that the extent of land so lifted up will be sufficient for the foundation of the temple which Ezekiel tells us the Lord will build. (See Ezek. 40. This Temple is to be nine miles square, and therefore will require an ample plateau for itself, and for the city of the King. The words of Isaiah may be literally taken when he says that "the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow into it" (Isa. 2: 2).

I have only mentioned some of the physical changes which are to take place in Palestine in connection with the restoration of all things. But as the curse extended to the whole world, so may we may expect will

The Coming Regeneration.

Great changes came upon the earth on account of sin at the time of the curse; and now that the Lord is coming to put away the curse and its consequences, we may well understand that even greater changes will take place. These changes will restore the earth, not to what it was, but to something far better.

The heaven and the earth, the air and the sea, will be more or less affected by the renovating power of the Lord. It is reasonable to suppose that the redeemed and restored earth, which is to be the Lord's kingdom, will be better than the created earth which was intrusted to Adam.

The heathen nations have a traditional expectation about this restitution which they have jealously kept. It is said among their writers and poets that this world is not what it was, neither is it now what it is to be hereafter. They sing of a golden age which once existed and has passed away. They hold their tradition in connection with the story of a garden or paradise which is lost, and of a Deliverer who is coming to restore it. This is their expectation; and it is ours also, if we read Scripture aright!

The Prophet Isaiah gives us a beautiful picture of the removal of the curse from nature, and the happy consequences which shall ensue when "God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense." (See Isa. 35.) His description of what is to be gives us a striking contrast to the present state of things; for now all nature seems to resent the curse brought upon it. Man has to watch against and resist the hatred of the serpent, and to defend himself from the violence of beasts of prey. He has to provide against the dangers of whirlwind and storm, the burning heat of the arid desert and the miasma of the swamp. He has to overcome the hardness of the stubborn soil which commands man to labor; and by dint of perseverance he has to win the treasures of metals and minerals which are hidden away from him in the earth. All these hindrances, and many more, are to be removed. Animosities and jealousies of men against one another—wars and fightings among nations—religious controversies among worshippers—these also shall vanish. In their place a peace will ensue and remain, which the world is not able to give now, and will not be able to take away then.

This Restitution or Regeneration is not brought about, it will be seen, by gradual and progressive improvement; it

Will Be Effected Suddenly

by the Word of the Lord. The idea of gradual improvement is one which overlooks the great fact of the Fall, and the completeness of that death, or gulf of separation, which was the consequence of it. Man is altogether past mending; and so is the world. It is necessary, therefore, before men can desire or seek salvation to show them, by the operation of the Spirit their lost and ruined condition. The regeneration of the world will be accomplished in the same way as the regeneration of the sinner that is, by the operation of God himself. I created the world by Christ, and by Him also I will re-create it.

Adam had only a limited portion of the earth for his place; but the Lord, the Second Adam, shall have the world at large for His Eden. His dominion is to be an everlasting dominion, one that will be beyond the reach of temptation or fall, or curse.

Such is the "restitution of all things," spoken of by the mouth of God's holy prophets from the beginning of the world. We may see in the passages which treat of the Millennium or reign of Christ upon earth, how the glory of the Lord is revealed to all flesh.

COMPOSURE IN A CYCLONE.

THE peace that comes of faith is strong enough to support the Christian under the most distressing circumstances. An illustration of this related in Dr. Gordon's Watchword, is furnished by the experience of a godly man who was brought face to face with death in a horrid form during the recent cyclone at Clinton, N. Y. The wooden house in which he lived was torn splinters, and the floor, with its heavy timber, uplifted and thrown forward upon the family. The man tells this story of the terrible hour:

"When consciousness returned after the stunning blow, I found myself lying upon my back, pressed down by a terrible weight. Within a few feet of me a fire was burning. I knew that I was face to face with death, but I felt no fear. My mind was perfectly calm, and the words of the prophet came to me: 'Oh death, I will be thy plague; Oh grave, I will be thy destroyer.' The Christ appeared to me as the fulfilment of the prophecy; and at once the words of the apostle sounded in my ears: 'Oh death, where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory?'

Such exaltation of soul took possession of me that I seemed to be no longer in the body. I closed my eyes, assured that if the weight did not crush out my life, the fire would soon reach me and I should be burned to death. When I opened my eyes the fire was gone, and the hands of friends were rescuing me from my perilous position. So death passed by and left me a little longer here, but I know now that even when he may, he has no power to fright or harm me. I shall be more than conqueror through Him that loved me."

GHASTLY FUNERAL RITES.

THE colored African Bishop, Dr. Crowther, in a recent letter to the Church Missionary Society describes the circumstances attending a funeral which he witnessed during his tour in the district near the sphere of his labor. "About four days before our arrival at Ohaebele, an old, rich woman was dead and buried. When the grave was dug, two female slaves were taken, whose limbs were smashed with clubs. Being unable to stir, they were let down into the grave, yet alive, on mat or bed on which the corpse of the mistress was laid, and screened from sight for a time. Two other female slaves were laid hold on and dressed with best clothes and coral beads. This being done, they were led and paraded about the town to show the public the servants of the rich mistress whom they would attend in the world of spirits. This was done for two days, when the unfortunate victims were taken to the edge of the grave, and their limbs were also smashed with clubs, and their bodies laid on the corpse of their mistress, and covered up with earth while yet alive. We can only imagine what would be the feelings of these unfortunate victims. Some of the Bonny converts attempted to rescue these last two females by a large offer of ransom, to buy bullocks for the occasion, but it was refused them. Can there be any doubt as to the urgent necessity of sending Christian teachers among this poor ignorant people, who are slaves to Satan, and yet glory in their shame? After these atrocious deeds were performed, volleys of trade cannons were fired for days, in honor of the dead. I counted ten of these cannon in the street opposite the house of the dead, about four or six pounders each."

TRUST IN OUR HEAVENLY FATHER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for June 22; Luke 12:22-34; Golden Text Luke 12:30.

Mark of the Children of the Kingdom—Two Specimen Invalids—Two Institutions—The Care for Clothing—A Fruitful Source of Anxiety—A Lesson from the Birds—Anxiety a Clear Loss—God's Provision for Real Troubles—No Support for Anticipated Trouble—Elisha's Directions to Naaman—How to Seek the Kingdom—Almsgiving Enjoined—What the Real Heavenly Treasure Is.

AFTER speaking to the multitude the parable of the rich fool, Jesus turned again to His disciples, and continued His teaching to them. Therefore I say unto you, be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." And He gives as his reason, "For all these things do the nations of the world seek after; but your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." Trust in our heavenly Father about the daily recurring needs of our bodies, is to be one of the distinguishing marks which shall separate the true disciples from the nations, the children of God from the world: does such a difference exist?"

"Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat." (R.V.) There are standing side by side. Both are suffering from the same disease, an acute form of dyspepsia. Up to the present time, both have suffered severely when taking almost any kind of food. Both are Christians, but the one has placed her case in the hands of the doctors, the other is trusting the Lord alone for her body. The one wakes in the morning with the weary thought, "What can I eat this day which will not hurt me?" Breakfast time comes, and with it the apprehension, which only an invalid can understand, of the coming suffering which eating will occasion; she eats in fear, and under the keen recollection of the sufferings of yesterday, and her very fears induce the pain she is so dreading. The other, with the morning light, has opened the word of God, and her eye has fallen on the words, "Be not anxious for your life what ye shall eat. . . . neither be ye of doubtful mind. . . . your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." With the words, a consciousness of God speaking, comes into her heart; she is awed, her whole being bows before her God, and all her fear of suffering from taking food vanishes. Breakfast comes, and she sees it "sanctified by the Word of God and prayer." A new power comes with the blessing which is asked upon it, it is a real and an answered prayer. She eats with a praising, and not with a fearful heart, and her great joy, the old suffering does not follow. Her Father has known her need, the lesson of trust which the sickness drove her to learn has been learned, and she is healed.

Two Invalids

There are two religious institutions in the same street; the one is kept up by solicited subscriptions and collections, the other is dependent on the Lord alone in answer to believing prayer. A time of commercial crisis arises. "What shall we do?" asks the secretary of the institution which depends on man, or on God through man. "We must make a strong appeal; we must get lists of givers, and spend all our remaining cash on printing and postage. Of course, this will throw us in debt, but we may expect to receive at least four times as much as we spend, and then we can pay our debts. It is true, but the receipts do not cover the debts incurred, and the institution gets more deeply in debt. The leaders of the other institution, on a day before the Lord in fasting and prayer, had said, "Lord, show thy servants what thou wilt to say to them through this failure of funds. Thou wouldst have any of the work given up, thou hast but to say so; all is thine." No shadow of anxiety crosses their hearts; they know they are in a Father's hand. The last shilling goes for bread, not for printing and postage, and just as soon as the tried faith sees no visible resource left, the Lord comes in, and abundantly supplies the need. It is the vocation of children to honor their Father by trusting Him. The children's need is a justifiable claim on a Father's resources. We have to be quite clear that the relationship is a truly understood one on both sides, that no doubt and no misgiving exists, and then we can as truly challenge our Heavenly Father to do a Father's part to us as we can expect Him to call on us to do a child's part toward Him.

"Be not anxious for your life. . . .
What Ye Shall Put On."

Not food only, but clothing, is part of the supply which a child may confidently expect from a true father. And clothing as well as food occupies the attention of "the nations of the world." Here, again, the poor and the rich, the sick and the healthy, the worldling and the Christian, have their preoccupations and their anxieties. "The life is more than the food, and the body than the raiment." And yet, with many, the raiment is everything, not as a means of warmth or of decent covering, but as an expression of a certain position which the wearer wishes people to understand he or she occupies; or, again, it may be as an expression of the taste; or, again, as a vulgar exhibition of the wealth possessed. And this preoccupation with the extreme outside of our being is often shared even by Christians. "A gentleman can afford to wear a shabby hat; his position does not depend upon his clothes," was said one day. But how much more could it be said, "A Christian is known by something better than his clothes, and the utmost plainness of attire will not hide the glory of God within him."

Our blessed Lord calls us to consider His care for the lower creation, that we may learn His Fatherly care for us. "Consider the ravens, that they sow not, neither reap; which have no store-chamber nor barn; and God feedeth them: of how much more value are ye than the birds!" (R. V.) What are the birds to God? Simply creatures created for the use of man. But what is man? A creature created for the use, for the indwelling, for the companionship of God. Shall He care for the lesser and neglect the greater of His creatures? Does the name Father signify nothing with God, or does it mean that He takes the responsibility which it entails?

Anxiety Disables for Real Work.

It preys upon the nerves, and predisposes to sickness. And, after all, it is not a real, but an imaginary suffering. It is not, "I am hungry now," but, "I fear I shall be hungry to-morrow." It is not, "I am suffering pain now," but "I fear, if I eat this, I shall suffer for it afterward." Is God not able to change the evil thus anticipated before the time comes? Anxiety and impatience go together. If we had learned how the Lord waits that He may be gracious unto us (Isa. 30:18), waits till we are ripe for blessing, waits until He can give without injuring us, we should fear to be in a hurry. He will "be exalted that He may have mercy upon us." Yes; in the very trial of our faith, He cannot move until we are quiet and confident (ver. 15), and so exalt Him as being equal to the task. "For the Lord is a God of judgment; blessed are all they that wait for Him."

God always provides beforehand for real troubles, but He makes no provision for anticipated troubles, because He has taught us to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," and has commanded us, "Be not therefore anxious for the morrow, for the morrow will be anxious for itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." (Matt. 6:34, R. V.) When Naaman, the Syrian, had been marvellously healed of his leprosy in the river Jordan, which he had so despised, and came again to the prophet Elisha with the declaration, "Now I know that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel. . . . Thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt offering nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the Lord" (II. Kings 5:15-27). Satan began to fill him with imaginary apprehensions. His lord had been in the habit of leaning on his hand when he went into the house of his god Rimmon to worship; what should he do now? Should he give up his office and make a stand for God, or should he bow down in the house of Rimmon, without bowing in his heart to the false god, and so retain his office? He wanted to make his course clear. But Elisha makes no provisions for eventualities which may, perhaps, never occur. It was no way certain that the king would live till his return. If he did, who could tell whether the sight of the healed Naaman might not lead him to know the true God? Was Naaman to take for granted that he alone of all the people of Syria, would recognize the hand of the true God? Elisha only said to him, "Go in peace." The God whom he had found under the waters of Jordan would return with him; he would have a better guide than Elisha, whom he must trust by the day.

Distrust is Loss.

And thus it is with us too. Distrust for to-morrow robs us of peace for to-day, and the same God who has held our souls in life for to-day is certainly to be found in to-morrow, also, whereas, our own anticipations may or may not be correct. All anxiety comes when the eye is off God. If He who fed a people in the wilderness with bread from heaven leads us by His hand into to-morrow, we cannot be badly provided for. It is no risk to trust God. But trust in God and begging from man are the exact opposites, and any man who pretends to trust God, and then in a prayer-meeting makes known his need to man, is really acting a lie, it is only a hypocritical way of begging—and he would be more honest if he begged straight out.

"Howbeit, seek ye His kingdom, and these things shall be added unto you." It is strange that we should learn so slowly to trust our Father! Seek His kingdom, and He will take care of you; trust Him with your concerns, and be occupied with Him. But in trial, sickness, penury, how can we seek His kingdom? Is not the very pressure upon us such that we cannot do anything for Him? Thank God we do not need to go out of the house to seek His kingdom. Is He King in this very trial? Are we acknowledging Him saying, "Yes, Lord," letting Him into it, believing that "All things work together for good," looking, "not at the things which are seen" (II. Cor. 4:13), and which press upon us, not as the Father's hand which is "not seen," and which He guarantees us? Let us seek His kingdom in the present hour, in our present circumstances, in our present perplexities, and bow our heads to the stroke; this is the first necessity, then He, on His part, will be faithful, "and all these things shall be added unto us"—they are but the second necessity.

"Sell that ye have, and give alms." God would have His children hold loosely whatever they have on earth—not riches only, but position, talent, experience, influence—all which we esteem of value, "and give alms."

Be A Giver

rather than a proprietor. "Make for yourselves purses which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not." The rich have need to be freed from anxiety as much as the poor. If the poor and the sick are not to be anxious as to what they eat, the rich have to see to it that they hold no riches which are not of eternal duration. Jesus was speaking to disciples that were most of them very poor. What is the "treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief draweth near, neither moth destroyeth?" Christ Himself—In Him "are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." (Col. 2:3.) Everything outside of Him is a thing to be rid of. Any riches which make us independent of our Lord; any power, wisdom, knowledge, which makes us independent of Him, is something we are better without. Where our treasure is, there will our heart be also. If He is our treasure, our hearts will be set on Him, and all possessions, beside Him, will be valueless.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

INSIPID RELIGION.

MUCH of the Christian character of the day lacks in swarthy and power. It is gentle enough, and active enough, and well-meaning enough, but it is wanting in moral muscle. It can sweetly sing at a prayer-meeting, and smile graciously when it is the right time to smile, and makes an excellent nurse to pour out with a steady hand a few drops of peppermint for a child that feels disturbances under the waist-band, but has no qualification for the robust Christian work that is demanded. One reason for this is the ineffable softness of much of what is called Christian literature. The attempt is to bring us up on tracts made up of thin exhortations and goodish maxims. A nerveless treatise on commerce or science in that style would be crumpled up by the first merchant and thrown into his waste-basket. Religious twaddle is of no more use than worldly twaddle. If a man has nothing to say, he had better keep his pen wiped and his tongue still. There needs an infusion of strong Anglo-Saxon into religious literature, and a brawnier manliness and more impatience with insipidity, though it be prayerful and sanctimonious. He who stands with irksome repetitions asking people to come to the Saviour, while he gives no strong, common sense reason, why they should come, drives back the souls of men. If, with all the thrilling realities of eternity at hand, a man has nothing to write which can gather up and master the thoughts and feelings of men, his writing and speaking are a slander on the religion which he wishes to eulogize. Morbidity in religion might be partially cured by more outdoor exercise. There are some duties we can perform better on our feet than on our knees. If we can carry the grace of God with us down into every-day practical Christian work, we will get more spiritual strength in five minutes than by ten hours of kneeling. If Daniel had not served God, save when three times a day he worshipped toward the temple, the lions would have surely eaten him up. The school of Christ is as much out-of-doors as in-doors. Hard, rough work for God, will develop an athletic soul. Religion will not conquer either the admiration or the affections of men by effeminacy, but by strength. Because the heart is soft is no reason why the head should be soft. The spirit of genuine religion is a spirit of great power. When Christ rides in apocalyptic vision, it is not on a weak and stupid beast, but on a horse—emblem of majesty and strength: "And He went forth conquering and to conquer."

MINISTERS AS LISTENERS.

ONE of our chief joys in Summer vacation is hearing others preach. What a grand thing it is to go to church and hear. Some of us who regularly preach realize it when we are off resting. How strange not to know which hymn it will be until it is given out. What a novelty to be prayed for by some one standing while you sit. What a glorious opportunity of taking the bread of life which you had no hand in mixing or baking. We pity the pastors who never have a chance to hear. If we address others forty-four Sabbaths in the year, have we not a right during six or eight Sabbaths to listen? What we ministers most need is to be preached to. We spend the most of the year leveling the Gospel artillery at others, it is a good thing in Summer to have ourselves shot at. We occupy so much time in compounding medicines for other sick souls, we do not give any one an opportunity to prescribe for us. We cannot think of anything more healthful for our over-worked clergy than to employ some of their Summer vacation in persistent silence, receptacles of the Gospel instead of its dispensers.

UNMARRIED.

A STATISTICIAN has given us authority for stating that there are in one State of the American Union, one hundred and forty thousand unmarried ladies. So in all parts of the land there are people marching single file who ought to be keeping step with some one on the right or left. What is the matter? It is one of the curses of the day that there are so many unmarried people between twenty-five and fifty years of age. There are those who, no doubt, were ordained from all eternity to bachelorhood or solitary femininity. But this is not the condition intended for most people. The cause of this invasion of the divine rule is, first, because men are too proud to live in humble circumstances. They want a magnificent fifty or hundred thousand dollar cage before they appropriate a canary. Now a genuine bird will sing just as well in a plain as in a gilded enclosure. Many of our men expend in cigars, and wines, and drives, and theatres, and operas, as much money as would support a good wife, and when they get ready for domesticity take their dissipations along with them into the holy partnership. The second reason for the one hundred and forty thousand unmarried girls in one State is the unparalleled extravagance of woman's wardrobe. A young man sees one of these princesses of fashion walk through a ferry boat or glide down the street, and says to himself: "If I had to navigate a bark with such rigging as that, I would get on the shoals in no time! I wonder how much all that apparel cost, and that diamond-cluster breaking through the kid glove? Dear me? What would become of my salary if I had to support such an outlay as that? From bankruptcy, suicide, and marriage deliver us!" Excessive display in dress may make more sensation at the levee or the ball-room, but prudent and successful young men will say: "Very good to dance with, but excuse me from a serious consideration in that direction!" A busy bee will not want to be affianced to a butterfly. We fear that before things are righted the one hundred and forty thousand unmarried ladies of one State will become two hundred and forty thousand. "John Anderson my Jo," had better choose some one who at the close of life's ascent can sing, "We clamb the hill thegither." Better start married life with two rooms and a trunk, and end in a mansion, than start in a mansion and end in a hovel. Better go climbing up than tumbling down.

CHEERFUL WORK.

DO NOT fret about results. All Christendon engaged in the redemption of one man would make a failure. God only is sufficient. Our work is to bring the soul under the proper influences. We are responsible for means and not for results. Fretfulness is not augmentation but depletion. The successful Christian workers are without exception cheerful. They do the best they can, and then leave the matter with God. We excuse an occasional fit of the "blues," but when the disease becomes chronic the man has all he can do to take care of himself and has no time for the improvement of others. If you have salt rheum, and a man offer you a box of salve that he says will certainly cure you and you observe that he has on his hand the same disease unhealed, you say: "No, I thank you: if your medicine were worth anything you could cure and would cure your own hands." So there is no use in a morbid man of gloomy heart attempting to raise others out of spiritual misfortunes, because his shadowed soul is a slander on his medicine. A man must have both his feet solidly planted on the rock before he can pull sinking men out of the floods.

CLEANLINESS.

WE approach a delicate subject. We must be cautious for fear we make some of our readers mad. The world needs more careful ablution. Taking our nose for a witness in the case, we judge that many people do not wash themselves often enough. In city houses, with bath-rooms and water-pipes running every whither, there is no shade of excuse for lack of cleanliness. Indeed, there is no excuse anywhere for neglect of ablution. You answer that you wash your face and hands every morning. What of that? Your hands and face could get along without immersion easier than the rest of your body, for the dirt would rub off by contact with fresh air and the implements of your occupation. You need frequent application of water from the top of your head to the end of the long toe. Once a week will not do. God washes the flowers every night with dew, and you are certainly no purer than the jasmines and verbenas. Three-fourths of the world does not wash often enough, either for health or decency, and could apply in a physical sense what Paul said in a spiritual: "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of sin and death?" If only one-half of the world had been water the divine meaning might have been doubtful, but with three-fourths of the world water, the doctrine of frequent purification ought to be every way adopted and acted upon. The tarrying of some people in your room for half an hour necessitates fumigation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Realization of Some of the Recommendations of the Pan-American Congress is provided for by a proposal made in the Senate on June 3 by Mr. Blair who moved for an appropriation of $1,750 for salaries, office and miscellaneous expenses and printing of the conference. He urged that the President be authorized to invite the governments of the other American republics and the Hawaiian Kingdom to appoint commissioners to meet in Washington on the first Wednesday of June 1891, to consider the establishment of international committees, and that he be also authorized to appoint three members of the Inter-Continental Railway Commission, and that the customs union recommended by the Conference be established, and a suitable building for the accommodation of the Latin-American memorial library be built or purchased and be dedicated on the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus.

The Protest of a Large Number of Merchants and importers against the Tariff Bill, which the House has passed, and the Senate is now trying to amend, proves that it will have serious effects on the trade of the country. Whether the benefits it will confer on manufacturers will be sufficient to compensate for the loss to traders is the main question involved. Senator Plumb, who has made a thorough study of the bill, says that "it will raise the price of nearly everything used by the mass of the people." If that is true, a political effect cannot fail to be disastrous to the Republican party. It is the masses who give the votes, and they will resent the increase in the cost of living, and will not be consoled by the assurance that the manufacturers are benefited by the arrangement. The merchants contend that the Bill, if it becomes law, will cripple the foreign commerce of the country, cause other nations will not buy from us if they cannot sell their goods in exchange. Senator Hiseock predicts that the nations will continue to buy, and pay in money, instead of in goods, but the experience of the merchants is opposed to that belief.

The Compromise Adopted by Congress on the liquor question last week, is the result of protests from officers in the army. After the conference between the committee of the two Houses of Congress, a report was presented proposing as a substitute for the order prohibiting the sale of intoxicants in the canteens, an order that in any State or Territory having prohibitory laws the canteen should not supply intoxicating liquor. When the report was under discussion in the Senate, Mr. Allison said that the committee had heard evidence to the effect that the system of selling liquor in the canteens was in the interest of good discipline, morality, reason and temperance." The Senate apparently credited this remarkable statement, for it adopted the report by a vote of 35 to 8. This is probably the first time that it has ever been suggested that the sale of liquor under any circumstances was in the interest of religion, morality and temperance. It usually operates the other way. If the rule is really reversed when the liquor is sold by the Government instead of by private persons, it would be interesting to learn the reason of it. The eight Senators who had manliness and courage to vote against the report, were five Republicans—Hale, Dixon, Teller, and Blair, and three Democrats—Olquitt, George and Turpie.

The Complete Annihilation of a Town in Nebraska by a cyclone occurred on June 2nd. On that night the sudden cessation of telegraphic communication between Lincoln and Bradshaw, a town of some five hundred inhabitants, situated about sixty miles west of Lincoln, indicated that some disaster had taken place. A party of men were sent up the line to ascertain the cause. They returned the next day with news that the town was utterly destroyed. Every house was in ruins, and in the case of a few houses on the outskirts, the walls of which were still standing, the roofs were gone and the windows and door blown out. The railway station was crushed, and every car standing in it, except one, was wrecked. That car, which was loaded with live stock, was blown along the line without leaving the tracks, to York, a distance of nine miles. Sixteen persons had been killed and all the living were homeless. Gov. Thayer immediately sent a detachment of the State militia to the scene of the disaster to help in the work of extricating any persons who might be still living under the ruins and also a supply of tents to shelter the homeless people. The survivors say that the disaster came with scarcely any warning. They heard a loud roar, and in a minute, the cyclone was upon them, and the whole town collapsed before it. The Governor has issued an appeal for help, which is meeting with a prompt and liberal response.

The Emperor of Germany Appears to have become his own Secretary of State as well as his own Chancellor. He was displeased at the delays in the negotiations with England regarding East Africa, and took entire control of the communications on the subject. He sent for the British Ambassador, and has had several interviews with him. Dr. Krauel, the head of the Colonial Department, assisted the Emperor toward the conception of proposals, which are expected to prove acceptable to Lord Salisbury. Broadly outlined, these proposals are that the German sphere of influence shall extend to the limits of the Congo State from the northern extremity of Tanganyika to the Albert Nyanza; that Uganda and British Unyoro shall be neutral ground, and that the navigation of the lakes shall be free. These are the proposals which aroused Mr. Stanley's indignation, but they will probably be accepted by England.

A Word of Reproof and Warning to Prince Bismarck was uttered last week by the Emperor of Germany. A cable despatch announces that the Emperor has notified the fallen statesman that if he does not cease his utterances in the press the result will be serious. A press correspondent reports also that a number of officials at minor German courts are threatened with dismissal for intriguing, at the instigation of Count Herbert Bismarck, to obstruct the Emperor's policy. These reports indicate that the Emperor means to carry out his own policy and not to tolerate the criticisms and censures of his former mentor. An intimation, however, is made by a journal friendly to Bismarck, that if he is not allowed to use the press for criticism, he may use his power as a member of the Reichstag for the purpose. It says that he will there always freely express his views regardless of the Government. He will especially try to show that the State police in Alsace-Lorraine cannot fulfil their objects, owing to the renewal of the settlement treaty with Switzerland, which Prince Bismarck terminated in 1889.

The President of the French Republic Ordered the release of the young Duke of Orleans from prison on June 3. A commissary was at once sent to Clairvaux, to the jail in which the prince was confined, and he was set at liberty. The President's order, however, stipulated that he should quit French territory, and the commissary was instructed to conduct him over the frontier. The prince was taken in the custody of the commissary and two warders, to the Swiss frontier and there left. He stayed at Basle one night and then took his departure for Brussels, whence he returned to England. His offence was entering France in defiance of the law, which excludes from the country members of the families who have pretensions to the throne. He returned openly on his attaining his majority, to offer himself for military service. He was promptly arrested and sentenced to two years imprisonment. He has served 117 days of his sentence. The fact that the President could imprison in a common jail the heir of the royal family, without causing any popular demonstration indicates the strength and solidity of the Republic.

The British Government Takes an Optimist view of the fishery difficulty in Newfoundland. In answer to questions in the House of Commons on Thursday, the member who represents the State Department in the House, said that there had been no landing of a French armed force at St. George's Bay or elsewhere on the island. The commander of the French warship had requested the removal of certain nets in St. George's Bay. The request, he said, was justified. No threats had been used. The people of Newfoundland had not refused to pay taxes unless they were supported in their position by the government, although resolutions relative to the subject had been adopted. He appeared to think that the Newfoundland people were unreasonable in their opposition to the settlement the government had made with France without their consent. That the feeling of irritation still continues is, however, evident from the remarks of one of the Newfoundland delegates who said last week that the French outrages had been going on for years, and the people had lost patience. It was to the interest of both the French and English to conceal the facts. Newfoundland had thus to fight both. The people, he said, are now fully aroused and the facts will now be made known to the world. The French shore, which is the cause of all this difficulty, extends along the most fertile and richest mineral land of the island. The nets that were destroyed by the French sailors must have been in some places within one hundred yards of the shore.

BRIEF NOTES.

Twenty-four students have this year graduated from the General Theological School (Episcopal) in New York—one of the largest classes on record.

Rev. Sam Small, the famous evangelist, has been elected President of the Methodist University at Ogden, Utah, in which city he has been holding meetings.

Miss Mary Coddington of New York city, has given the City Mission $40,000 for the building and endowment of a boy's club-house for the poor boys of the city.

The efforts of the American Sunday-school Union to organize new Sunday-schools, have led during the past two years to the founding of nearly two hundred churches.

Evangelists Folger and Jackson have held revival meetings during the past three weeks at Newburyport, Mass. More than a hundred persons have made a profession of faith and there are many inquirers.

Rev. Sam Jones has had enormous audiences at Nashville, Tenn. At some of the Sunday night services it is believed that fully 10,000 were present. There were nearly 5,000 at his afternoon service for men only.

The meetings at Dallas, Tex., conducted by Mr. Dixon C. Williams and Prof. D. B. Towner, have resulted in many notable conversions. They were held in the rink, and at the last services over 4,000 persons were present.

The United Presbyterians in General Assembly at Buffalo last week, decided to make war on the use of tobacco. Not only ministers and students, but Church members who use tobacco are to be counted unworthy.

Three tents are to be used for religious services in Chicago during this Summer. They are to be set up in the west, north, and south sides. The evangelists in charge will be C. L. Kirk, Ferdinand Schiverea and Harry Smead.

The fourteenth annual meeting for Bible Study will be held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, July 10-17. Special arrangements have been made for rates, both hotel and transportation. The secretary is W. F. Erdman, Asheville, N. C.

The American Baptist Educational Society announces that the sum of $400,000 dollars has been raised, which was necessary to secure the $600,000 promised by Mr. J. D. Rockefeller, of Cleveland, for the proposed Baptist University in Chicago, Ill.

A proposition has been made for the erection on the grounds of the World's Fair, Chicago, of a great tabernacle, wherein 20,000 people might assemble, to be used as a great temple for the religiously inclined of all faiths; the services to be carried on at various hours by the various Christian denominations.

The International Missionary Union is holding its seventh annual meeting at Clifton Springs, N. Y., this week. The papers and discussions are to embrace themes of general interest to missionaries. There will also be addresses of more general public concern. Entertainment is provided for all foreign missionaries.

Major Cole and Mr. F. S. Jewett have closed their meetings at Camden, Ark. The pastors of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches in the town have received into their churches ninety-five new members, who attribute their conversion to God's blessing on the services.

Mr. C. H. Yatman commenced a series of revival meetings at Sturgis, Mich., three weeks ago, which have been much blessed. A noted politician, who was one of the converts at Mr. Yatman's meetings, in Lima, has just been elected Mayor by the united efforts of the churches and the Y. M. C. A. He promises to reform the methods of city government, which need it.

SAVED FROM SHAME.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the Scripture saith, whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." Rom. 10 : 11.

The Essential Message—I. An Old-Fashioned Style of Proof—The Scripture Saith—Used by Christ—By the Apostles—Paul's Paraphrase—II. A Simple Statement—What Believing Is—Resting on a Person—III. The Promise—Not Ashamed by Discovering His Mistake—Nor Ashamed to Own His Faith—Nor Ashamed of Its Effect on Others—A Dead Cardinal Needing Repose—IV. A Wide Door of Hope.

WHEN a city is to be stored for a siege, it will be well for those who attend to the commissariat to lay in a proportion of everything that is necessary for human comfort, and even a measure of certain luxuries; but it will be of first importance to bring in great quantities of corn. The necessities of life must be the chief provision. These we place in store-houses by tons, whereas in other articles pounds may suffice: if there be a failure of bread, what will the people do? For this reason, I feel I must preach over and over again the plain gospel of salvation by grace through faith in Christ Jesus. While I would withhold nothing that may minister to edification, to comfort, to growth, or to the perfecting of the saints; yet, first and foremost in abundance, even to overflowing, I must gather for you the bread of life, and set forth Christ crucified as the sinner's only hope.

I. I shall begin my sermon this morning by reminding you that, here is

An Old Fashioned Way of Proof.

"The Scripture saith." In this enlightened age little is made of Scripture; the tendency is to undermine men's faith in the Bible, and persuade them to rest on something else. It is not so with us, as it certainly was not so with Paul. He enforced and substantiated his teaching by declaring, "The Scripture saith."

In this he follows the manner of Christ Jesus our Lord. Though quite able to speak of Himself, our Lord continually referred to Holy Scripture. His first public sermon was founded upon the Book of the prophet Isaiah. All along to the very end He was always quoting the Old Testament. So did His apostles. One is struck with their continual reference to Moses and the prophets. While they set the truth in a fresh light, they fell back continually upon the old revelation. "As saith the Scripture," "According to the Scriptures"—these are phrases constantly repeated. Paul declared that he spent his life "witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come."

Evidently they regarded the statements of Scripture as conclusive. They took counsel of the Scriptures, and so they ended the matter. "It is written" was to them and indisputable. "Thus saith the Lord," was the final word; enough for their mind and heart, enough for their conscience and understanding. To go behind Scripture did not occur to the first teachers of our faith: they heard the Oracle of divine testimony, and bowed their heads in reverence. So it ought to be with us: we have erred from the faith, and we shall pierce ourselves through with many sorrows, unless we feel that if the Scripture saith it, it is even so. "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and therefore they spake not erroneously, nor even dubiously.

Proof Positive

Paul, in saying here, "For the Scripture saith," is referring, I think, to the general sense of Scripture, rather than to any one passage. There are several texts from which it may be gathered that believers shall not be put to shame; such as, "They looked unto him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed." But if the apostle is referring to any one passage of the Old Testament, he is not quoting it verbatim, but he is expounding it, and giving its general sense. Paul quotes, if he quotes at all, from the Septuagint translation rather than from the Hebrew, thus sanctioning a translation. Let us read the words in Isaiah 28, 16,

"Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste." You see at once the difference between the text as Paul gives it to us, and the original Hebrew, in the words but not in the sense.

Observe, first, that under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, Paul reads the passage

In its Largest Sense.

The original text is, "He that believeth;" but Paul makes it, "Whosoever believeth." That is the true meaning. "He that believeth," means any "he" that believeth; and to make this fact clear, Paul says, "Whosoever believeth."

Next, note that Paul reads the verse with the context. In the Hebrew it is, "He that believeth;" but Paul reads it, "Whosoever believeth on Him." Did he do right to supply the "on Him?" Certainly, since he thus gives the sense of the quotation as it stands in the prophet. I said before that Paul is not quoting verbatim et literatim, he aims at giving the sense of the passage; and, therefore, paraphrases it so as to remind you of its connection.

Once more, the apostle gives us the true and plain meaning of the text. He leaves the figure which was suitable for Isaiah, but might have been misunderstood by the Romans, and he gives the sense intended by Isaiah in plainer language. The prophet said, "He that believeth shall not make haste." That "making haste," means being fluttered and alarmed, and so being led to run from the foundation. Such a person fled in haste because he was ashamed of his hope. Paul puts aside the drapery of the metaphor to let the uncovered sense stand out boldly. He expounds the Scripture under infallible guidance, and gives its meaning to us in this form, "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed."

II. And now, secondly, we have before us

A Simple Statement

of the way of salvation: "The Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." The way of salvation is to believe on Christ, whom God has laid in Zion for a foundation. What is believing on Him? It is trusting in Him. The language is not "Believe Him,"—such belief is a part of the faith, but not the whole. We believe everything which the Lord Jesus has taught, but we must go a step further, and trust Him. The faith that saves is not believing certain truths, nor even believing that Jesus is a Saviour; but it is resting on Him, depending on Him, lying with all your weight on Christ as the foundation of your hope. Believe that He can save you; believe that He will save you; at any rate leave the whole matter of your salvation with Him in unquestioning confidence. Depend upon Him without fear as to your present and eternal salvation. This is the faith which saves the soul.

Notice, next, that this faith is believing on a Person: "He that believeth on"—it? No! On "HIM." Our faith is not based on a doctrine, or a ceremony, or an experience; but on "HIM!" Our Lord Jesus Christ is God; He is also man; He is the appointed and anointed Saviour. In His death He is the propitiation for sin; in His resurrection, He is the justification of His people; and in His intercession, He is the eternal guarantee of their preservation. Believe "on Him." Our faith fixes herself upon the Person of the Lord Jesus as seen in His sufferings, His offices, and His achievements. "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed."

The text refers to

The Truth of the Trusting.

The apostle does not say, "Whosoever believeth on Him with full assurance, or with a high degree of confidence, shall not be ashamed." No; it is not the measure of our faith, but the sincerity of our faith which is the great question. If we believe on Him at all, we shall not be ashamed. Our faith may be very trembling, and this will cause us sorrow; but a trembling faith will save. Observe, again, that all depends upon the presence of this trusting, and not upon the age of it. "He that believeth on Him:" this relates to the immediate present. Perhaps the truster has only believed on Jesus during the last five minutes. Very well, he does believe on Him, and he shall not be ashamed. Some of us are glad to remember that we were built on the sure foundation more than forty years ago. But the length of years during which we have believed does not enter into the essence of the matter: believers are saved whether their faith has lasted through half a century or half an hour.

Now if any soul here perishes, it will not be my fault. However feebly I may preach this morning, I shall go home satisfied that I have set before you enough for your salvation, if you be willing and obedient. I have most plainly set before you the way of salvation. What more can I do? I can bring the horse to water, but I cannot make him drink; I can set the water of life before you, but I can do no more if you turn away from it. If you accept of the Lord Jesus and believe on Him, you shall not be ashamed; but if you put Him far from you, you will die in your sins, and your blood will be upon your own heads.

III. So I pass on to the third point:

The Glorious Promise

to those who obey the Gospel. "The Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed," and this means that he shall not be ashamed at any time by discovering that he has been deluded. Men are ashamed when their hopes fail. If a man has an expectation of eternal life, and on a sudden he sees his hope dashed to shivers, is he not ashamed? If on his dying bed his confidence should turn out to be based on a falsehood, how ashamed he will be! If any of you are trusting in your gold, it will turn out to be a poor confidence when you are called upon to leave all earthly things. I have heard of one who, on his death-bed, laid bags of money to his heart; but he was forced to lay them away, and cry, "These will not do! These will not do!" It will be a sorry business if we have been trusting in our good temper, our charity, our patriotism, our courage, or our honesty, and when we come to die shall be made to feel that these cannot satisfy the claims of divine justice, or give us a passport to the skies. You will never have this vexation of spirit if you take Christ Jesus to be your confidence.

Furthermore, dear friends, he that believes on Christ shall not be ashamed to own his faith. This is a sharp saying, and it cuts as a razor. I wish it would make a great gash in cowardly spirits. "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." Some think they believe on Christ, and yet they are ashamed to own their faith in the Lord's appointed way; or, indeed in any way. If they are in ungodly company they do with their faith as they do with their dog when a friend comes in: they say, "Lie down, sir." Because it is inconvenient to be known to be a believer, they treat the Lord Christ as they would treat a dog. Some of you have never made a confession of your Lord: what will become of you?

I am not ashamed of my hope; I love to state it, to glory in it, and to Make it Widely Known.

I heard of a "modern-thought" minister of some repute, that a person asked him, "Sir, what is your theory of the atonement?" He replied, "My dear sir, I have never told that to any living person, although I have been a preacher for years, and I am not going to commit myself now." He seemed to think that this was rather a wise thing. My course runs in the opposite direction: I believe in the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, and I am not ashamed of the old-fashioned doctrine. "He loved me, and gave Himself for me;" why should I be ashamed to own it?

We shall not be ashamed because our faith is proved to be unreasonable. When a man is convicted of believing an absurdity, he is ashamed. But there is nothing unreasonable in the truth that "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

There is a sweet reasonableness in the provision of a Substitute for guilty men, and a still sweeter reasonableness in the salvation of those who believe in the Lamb of God. In fact, the Gospel system is so blessedly reasonable, that when it comes home to the enlightened understanding it carries the mind by storm. I have seen love at first sight with many a man who, for the first time, has heard how God is "just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." It has seemed so Godlike a method, that the man has accepted it at once: it

Bore its Proof on its Face.

We are not ashamed of the gospel of salvation by faith in Christ because it proves inoperative upon our lives. I remember the witty Sidney Smith, who by mistake figured as a clergyman, managed to come into collision with the Methodists, and he charged them with so much preaching faith that good works were at a discount. Surely he never heard Mr. Wesley. I venture to say that the Methodists produced more good works than Mr. Smith's preaching ever did. If any say to us, "This faith of yours takes you off from trusting in works;" we answer, "It does; but it does not take us off from practicing them." Faith is the mother of holiness and the nurse of virtue. The lives of the Puritans who taught the gospel of faith in Christ were infinitely preferable to the lives of those Cavaliers who believed in human merit. Indifferent to morality? We never knew what holiness was until we believed in Jesus.

We are never ashamed of it, again, as to its operation upon others. When I look back through my life, having preached nothing in his place but faith in Christ as the way of salvation, I can, without any effort of memory, remember many drunkards made sober, harlots made chaste, lovers of pleasure made lovers of God. Many have been reclaimed from among the poorest and most degraded, and some from the rich and vicious. We have seen what faith in God has done by lifting them from the level of selfishness to

The Heights of Grace.

If we had to go into the worst slum of London we would not wish for anything better to preach than Christ crucified; and if we had to visit the ayest hells of the West End, we would not wish for any theme more powerful than the Cross of our Lord Jesus. "Believe and live" is still a harm most potent. We have no cause to be ashamed of what the truth of God has done in ages past, and is doing even at this day.

We might be ashamed, if we could be outshined in our prospects by some other system. What form of religion offers more to the believer than the system of grace and simple faith in Jesus? Nowhere in the world, that I know of, is there any other system of religion which promises sure salvation to its followers. The Roman Catholic system does not at all provide for present and everlasting salvation. What does it provide for? For your getting out of purgatory in due time, and no more. When I was in the Church of St. John Lateran, at Rome, I read a request for prayer for the repose of the soul of his Eminence, Cardinal Wiseman. Now Cardinal Wiseman was a great man, a prince of the Church, but yet he is somewhere in the other world, where he is not in a pose: so this request indicates. There must be a very poor outlook for an ordinary Catholic. For my part I would give up so cheerless a hope, and become a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, and go to heaven. "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed."

IV. I have done, when I say to you, lastly, at in my text we see a wide door of Hope for the Seeker.

Read that word, "whosoever," whosoever, whoever. I must keep on ringing that silver bell. Rings in the thirteenth verse—"Whosoever all call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." It rings in the text—"Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed." No secret decree has ever been made to shut out any soul that believeth on Him. God has not hidden in secret in a dark place of the earth, and said, "Such a man may believe in Christ, and yet he shall be lost." Do not be afraid of this; for it is impossible. No measure of sin in your past life can deprive you of this promise. "Whosoever believeth on Him," though he had been a murderer, or a thief, or a drunkard, or an adulterer, or a liar, or a blasphemer, shall find his faith removing his sins through the blood of Jesus, and renewing his heart by the Holy Spirit. "Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed."

"But I do not feel as I ought," says one. You shall feel aright if you will believe on Him. You shall not be shut out of the promise through any want of sensitiveness. It is not said, "Whosoever believeth on Him and is sensitive to a high degree shall be saved." No: "Whosoever believeth on Him." You ought to be sensitive, you ought to be tender, you ought to be grieved for sin, and you shall be if you believe on Him. "Alas," cries one, "I have a strong besetting sin, I have a hot temper, or fierce lusts, or a desperate thirst for drink." Yes, I know; but if you believe on Him you shall not be ashamed; for these shall be conquered and destroyed. You shall be helped to fight against them until you get a complete victory, and so you shall never be ashamed.

Backsliders Welcome.

"Ah," says one, "but I once made a profession, and I have gone back." Yes; but, "whosoever" does not shut out the wanderer. Backsliding is a great and bitter evil, but he that believeth is justified from every sin. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Come, then, with your heaped up sins and be unburdened. Come, though seven devils dwell within you: come to have them driven out, and yourself made white in the blood of the Lamb. Come, for you shall not be ashamed. Let no man stand back and say, "I dare not come." Remember, the word of the Saviour, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

Lastly, in that day when the earth and heaven shall melt, and nothing shall be seen but Christ upon the throne, judging all the earth, those who have not believed in Him will be ashamed. They will have no excuse to offer: they have none even now. They will then be ashamed that they did not take the counsel of their godly friends, and heed the pleadings of their minister. They will be ashamed to think how they put off thoughts of Christ, and lingered until they found themselves in hell. The face of the Lord Jesus will be terrible to unbelievers to the last degree. Assuredly, the flames of hell will be more tolerable than a sight of His face. The bitterest wail of Tophet is this—"Hide us from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne!" Ye sinners, seek His face, whose wrath ye cannot bear. God help you to seek it now. Before you leave this house may you seek it and find it. He saith, "Seek ye my face." May God the Holy Spirit lead you to obey the call. Amen.

MISSIONARY WORK IN MADAGASCAR.

THE story of the commencement of Christian work at Rasoaanjanahary in the Island of Madagascar is very interesting and remarkable. "It was," says the veteran missionary, Rev. T. Rowlands, "chiefly through the instrumentality of a girl who had the rank of a princess in the savage tribes called the Ibara who inhabit the west and south of our Betsileo district. During one of the many wars made on the outlying tribes by the old, cruel queen, Ranavalona I., she, this little princess, was with many others, taken captive, and was sold into slavery at the capital. While serving there, she became acquainted with some of the persecuted Christians, was influenced by them, and eventually became a Christian herself. After many years, her father and herself regained their freedom and returned to their home in the far south, about thirty miles south of our present station. Now, she was the only Christian there, the nearest Christian community being about sixty miles distant.

But such was her zeal that once every two months she used to travel on foot all that way to communion—three days' journey each way. She was the chief instrument, in God's hands, of winning the first souls for Christ there, and laying the foundation of the Christian Church which has now become the mother Church of a large and rapidly-increasing mission district.

One of our most thriving fields is the district of Betsileo. Just imagine an extensive plain nearly surrounded by immense granite rocks, rising nearly a thousand feet from the base, and presenting the most rugged and romantic appearance imaginable. On and among the hillocks, studded all over the plain, and also crowning the many larger hills in the distance, are the Betsileo villages, and in the centre is the garrison town of Ambohimandroso (consisting of some 5,000 inhabitants), which is the central mission station. At the principal station you will find two substantial brick chapels, and two active working churches of over 400 communicants, which are also practically self-supporting. There you will also find the training institute, dispensary and Sunday-school for adults and children, classes of various kinds for men and women, and all maintained efficiently. In sixty-one villages (or out-stations) you will find modest little mud or sun-dried brick chapels, which serve as school-rooms as well, in each village a native teacher, who also preaches on Sunday, ten honorary native pastors in charge of churches, and ten native trained evangelists in charge of groups of six or seven stations, more or less, and about 200 communicants scattered all over the villages, making a total of over 600 communicants in this district. There are in Madagascar to-day, roughly speaking, 45,000 communicants.

AFRICAN MEDICINES AND PHILOSOPHY.

SPEAKING at a missionary meeting in London, the Rev. W. T. Willoughby, a missionary just returned from Africa, thus described the beliefs prevalent more or less throughout that vast continent: "Sickness is very prevalent out there, and when a man is sick he goes to the native doctor. And here I ought to say that, as far as my acquaintance with the medicine men goes, I cannot think that they are by any means worse morally than their neighbors. I could not honestly call them rogues, nor could I honestly say that they were swindlers; there are rogues among them, there is no doubt, but the village medicine man, so far as I got to know him, believes honestly what he practices, though, alas! his practices are extremely absurd. He is himself the dupe of his own opinions, and he makes others the dupes of his own opinions too. When a man is sick he goes to a medicine man, and he seeks to discover, by means of a certain incantation, what the disease is from which his patient is suffering. He very soon finds that the patient is bewitched, and the difficulty then is to discover the man who has done the deed. This, perhaps, he will fail to do; possibly he will succeed, then certain incantations have to be performed again, and the sick man is expected to recover. He ought to recover if he does not. In return for this he pays the medicine man a certain sum.

"These medicine men know a great deal more about the religious ideas of the tribe than any others. I said to one of them one day, 'I want you to tell me something about what men do and where men go after they die.' 'Well,' said my friend, 'I will tell you as much as I know of it. When a man dies his spirit has to wander about this earth until somebody builds a little spirit hut (which is a model of the hut they live in) to the memory of the deceased. Then the spirit has permission to take himself away, and he goes up there.' 'Well, but,' I said, 'some men are bad and some men are good; are they not? Do the good men and the bad men all go to the same place?' 'Oh, no; they never care to go.' 'How is that? Can't the good spirits go where the bad ones are, or the bad ones go where the good ones are?' 'They can all go where they like.' 'But,' I said, 'the good ones go to the best place.' 'Oh, yes.' 'How is it, then, if the bad ones can go where they like, that they do not go to the best place, too?' 'I don't quite see your reason. Down in my village there are bad men and good men—they can all go where they like every one of them; but you come down to-morrow and look, and you will find all the bad men together and all the good men together; the good ones don't like being where the bad ones are, for they are not happy there; and the bad ones do not like being where the good ones are, for they are not happy there.' That is a little bit of the New Theology, it seems to me. But it is the very best specimen of native religious ideas that I met with."

Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald.

Bishop Atticus G. Haywood. (See page 373.)

REV. O. P. FITZGERALD, D. D.

(See Portrait.)

THE selection of two men to fill the vacant bishoprics in the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church, was a duty calling for the exercise of sound discretion and sincere devotion to the best interests of the Church. This duty the recent General Conference seems to have performed to the general satisfaction of the ministers and members of the churches. It is a happy thing for any community, religious or secular, when it places in the positions of honor and influence the best men at its command, and when the choice so made has the endorsement of those who know both the wants of the community and the character of the men chosen.

Dr. Fitzgerald, whose portrait we now give, is one of the men chosen by the General Conference for bishop. He is sixty-one years of age, having been born in North Carolina, in 1829. He first took his position as a recognized minister of the Church in 1854, when he became a member of the Georgia Conference. But his experience has not been limited to the South. He spent some time in a Western field, and in 1867, had become so well-known, and his talents and acquirements had gained so general a recognition that he was elected Superintendent of Public Instruction. It is, however, in the editorial chair that he has won his most brilliant triumphs. He was chosen editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, a representative organ of Southern Methodism. In that position he has displayed conspicuous ability, and has won the confidence of both ministers and laymen. His voice and pen have been used for the best interests of the Church, and he has throughout the painful dissension which has separated into two sections the Methodist Church of America, been an advocate of peace, and unity, and conciliation.

HORACE FAIRLEGH'S FAITH.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for June 22: "Your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." (Luke 12: 30.)

"You are very kind to take so much interest in me," said a bright, eager-looking young man, to a venerable fellow-traveller in a horse car, "but you could not bring me to your way of thinking. I am a newspaper man, and therefore proverbially a hard case."

"There is no reason why you should be, Mr. Fairleigh," said the white-haired man to whom he spoke. "You must see sad sights, sometimes, and must know how much help a man gets who trusts in God."

"I have noticed that such men get a reflex benefit. Their trust and faith helps them as it would if they believed in anything else. If a man believes in a charm, or in his luck, it is just the same. He has the comfort of his theory. God does not look after your interests, but if you believe He does, your faith tends to keep you cheerful and contented."

"Ah! I know that theory is common, Mr. Fairleigh, but it falls far short of the facts. The faith is good in itself, as you say. We have the help it brings surely, and that is worth having. But we have something better. You cannot meet a real Christian whose experience has not convinced him that God knows what things he has need of and supplies the need of those who trust Him."

"Well, I don't want to rob you of your faith. I could not hold it myself; but it must be very comforting for those who can hold it. It does them no harm anyway. But here I am at my destination. I have a busy day before me. We that have no faith in a God to take care of our future must work hard and make money to keep us in our old age. By the way, I notice that Christians as a rule do not give much evidence of their faith in that line. Some that I know are just as eager to get money and hoard it as if they had no faith in God providing for their old age. Good morning."

Young Fairleigh swung lightly from the horse car, without its stopping, as he had done hundreds of times. But the street had just been watered and the dust upon it was now a greasy mud. Fairleigh's foot slipped and he fell heavily on his side. He felt shaken and startled, and before he could recover himself and rise to his feet a rapidly driven buggy was upon him. The driver swerved quickly as he saw him, but one of the wheels passed over his ankle, causing him excruciating pain. A score of kindly passers-by were instantly at his side and carrying him into a drug-store. "Call an ambulance," said the druggist, "it is a bad fracture." In a few minutes the ambulance was on its way to the hospital with young Fairleigh inside. When he came out of the institution some weeks later, he had but one foot, and all his bright hopes, and all the pride and joy of his heart were gone.

He hobbled on his crutches to the office of the journal on which he had been employed. His place had been filled, but the proprietors were kind and sympathetic. He could never do his own work again, but they promised to give him work that he could do at home. It would not be the kind of work he liked, and it would not help him to rise in his profession, as he hoped to have done, and it would not be very remunerative. It was a downward step, and Fairleigh felt it bitterly.

"I must find some cheaper rooms," he said to the manager of the journal, "Do you know of any?"

"Yes, we have just passed around the hat to set Mrs. Winton up in keeping a boarding-house. She will rent you a room cheap and make you feel at home."

That was just what Mrs. Winton did. She bought a cheap hanging shelf for his books, and hung it near his chair where he could reach it without rising, and put his books on it. A day or two afterward she added a Bible to his little library, having noticed that there was not one among them. Fairleigh noticed the addition but he said nothing at the time. He knew she must be very poor, and he wondered that she should do so much for him when there was no prospect of profit.

"I am afraid you will not make your business very profitable, Mrs. Winton," he said one day if you are as liberal to all your boarders, as you are to me."

"I am not sure that profit should be always our first consideration," Mrs. Winton answered. "If I can make enough to live, I don't mind."

"How about sickness and old age? You should not forget that they are possible."

"Oh, I save all I can, but I do not fret about it. If I have an opportunity of doing a little kindness, at a cost within my power, I do it. I have enough faith in God to believe that He will provide for me if I ever get so that I cannot work."

"Well, it must be a very comforting kind of faith, and I ought not to protest. If you were more concerned about your saving you would not do so much for me."

"Mr. Fairleigh wished he had the faith of this Christian woman. The day was past when he felt as he did that day in the horse-car, that he could provide a competency for himself to support him in old age. He fretted now every day about that, for he could earn no more than he required for his necessities. How different his position and prospects from those of a few months ago! He wondered if he was wrong, after all, about that faith. Perhaps God really did guide human affairs, as these Christians believed. But if so, he could not expect the blessing, for he had always spoken so scornfully of the doctrine. And he had been a great sinner, besides. His dear, dead mother's prayers for him, had come to nothing. He would read the Bible and see what it was that so sustained such people as Mrs. Winton. Perhaps he could get it. Yet it seemed mean to neglect God in his days of strength and prosperity, and go to Him when he was crippled and poor. Yet God was magnanimous; he had always heard that. Perhaps He would receive him still. His head sank forward on his arms and for the first time in ten years, Horace Fairleigh prayed.

Mrs. Winton had occasion to return to the room soon afterward, and receiving no reply to her knock on the door, she entered. She was alarmed at her boarder's attitude. She thought he must have fainted. His face was very pale and his hand drooped as if it was lifeless. She spoke to him, but he did not move. Then she went to him and putting her hand on his shoulder called him by his name. Then he raised his head and she saw that he had been weeping.

"You are a Christian, Mrs. Winton," he said. "I would sooner have your help than a minister's. Tell me; do you think God will receive me now, after long years of neglect and scoffing?"

"Certainly if you go to Him in faith."

"I do not know that I have faith even now," Fairleigh said, sadly. "I am in need; that is all I know for certain. If I were not a poor cripple I should not have felt it. That must tell against me."

"Your Heavenly Father knows your need, and He is really a Father, so He will supply it. Perhaps He saw your need of just this affliction to bring you to Himself. He knows our need of trial as well as blessing."

"That is a strange thought, Mrs. Winton. I must think it over. Perhaps you are right. Prosperity would never have brought me to God. Why, how different things would look in that light."

"It is the true light. We know so little of ourselves that we do not know what we really need. God knows, and when we are sure of that, nothing worries us. We accept the changes in our lot whether they are joyful or painful, convinced that our 'Heavenly Father knoweth we have need of these things,'"

Horace Fairleigh Comforted.

The good seed was dropped in prepared ground—ground broken up by bitter trial, and Mrs. Winton left the bowed man, believing that the Holy Spirit would bless it to his benefit. And He did. The faith Fairleigh had once despised, became his main spiritual support, the greatest treasure of his life.

WILL IT LIFT.
THE STORY OF A FOG.
By the Rev. J. Jackson Wray.
(Continued from page 366.)

THE spectacle of the poor old man's peace and restful faith in his God and his confident trust in his Saviour was one not to be soon forgotten. Jimmie Sladd was transformed. His shabby old clothes and his bent form were forgotten, and his former mistress could only see in him a brother in Christ, one of those who are poor in pocket, but rich in faith. But the old man was mindful of the proprieties. Mrs. Graythorpe had asked him a question, and he was too respectful to leave it unanswered.

"You asked me what was the latest news," he said, after a pause. "There doesn't much news come Faringham way; but there's one bit 'at I'se glad to hear about, as I've good 'casion to be."

"Indeed, Jimmie, and what's that?" inquired Mercy. "Why," replied the old shepherd; "Mr. Allanson's coming back to Hilldrop inn again."

"And who is Mr. Allanson?" said Mrs. Graythorpe, who had heard Mrs. Higginbotham speak of him with much respect.

"Who is he?" said Jimmie, "the best an' kindest-hearted man in all the world. That's what he is. They say he's bowt the Hilldrop property; an' if it's true, it'll be the grandest thing for Hilldrop, an' for Faringham, an' for all the country round. Why, there he is!" said he, pointing with his stick to a stout, hale, cheery-faced man of middle age, who was seated on the box chatting to the coachman as the "Highflyer" drove past on its way to the Hilldrop Inn.

Mrs. Graythorpe had time to get a good look at him; heard his voice, too; for no sooner did he spy Jimmie Sladd than he called out, "What, Jimmie! God bless you, old friend!" Mrs. Graythorpe saw a face and heard a voice that were both familiar to her, and a great silence fell upon her.

Meanwhile the passenger on the coach was descending from his elevated position and going into the Hilldrop Arms made his way to his old room, the self-same parlor in which Jared Higginbotham caught an awful Tartar in the shape of a box of gold. He had now all but given up his search for the maiden he had fetching you a cup and saucer. I'm right glad to see you. What's the best news in these parts, eh?" Jimmie had laid his hat and stick carefully on a chair, had straightened out of his stiff shepherd's smock a few unnecessary creases, had smoothed his scant, grey hair by slipping his open hand first from the crown backward to his neck, and lastly from the crown forward to his eyebrows or near them, for Jimmie did not go in for a "parting to the right or left;" and then, taking his chair to the table, delivered himself as follows:

"Why sir, the fust thing, an' the best thing is, that you're come back again; and the next thing is that we're main glad to see you. We were beginnin' to be frightened 'at you'd g'ien us the go-by, an' that we shouldn't ha' you 'ere any more. It seems to me, sir, as though I'se sort o' livin' i' clover for a bit. There's owd friends here, and there's owd friends there, and they warm the heart of an owd man to see 'em, sir. They do, I'se sure."

"What old friends have you found now, Jimmie?" said Gilbert, who was always himself on the look-out for forms and faces that had to do with auld lang syne.

"Why, sir, there's my owd mistress and the young ladies that used to live at Hilldrop Grange many a year ago," he said, deliberately.

"Jimmie Sladd! What do you mean?"

Mr. Gilbert Craske had stood upon his feet with his teacup in one hand and a piece of buttered crumpet in the other. "Only this, sir," said Jimmie deprecatingly, "that Mrs. Graythorpe is sitting, this minute, with Mrs. Higginbotham in the bar."

Gilbert Craske carefully put down his tea and his toast. Then he sat down upon his chair, and for the space of one minute gave himself up to a brown study, with which Jimmie did not interfere.

"Help yourself to another cup of tea, Jimmie. I'll soon be back," said Gilbert, eventually, and then went downstairs in his slippers. Softly and slowly he proceeded to make his way towards the bar. This was a small recess fenced off from a large parlor by a partition of glass and frame-work, which reached over six feet high, but did not go up to the ceiling of the room. The sliding sash, which was generally open to customers, was closed, and Gilbert was fain to peep through the glass to get a look at the tenants within. What with the display of bottles, glasses, etc., plain and colored, and what with the shadow of the corner, in which Mrs. Graythorpe sat, he could not satisfy his eyes.

dragged out from among the cab-wheels in the London fog, and for the mother of the maiden, who should, indeed, have been mentioned first in this matter of search, and had come to Hilldrop in a not too equable or contented frame of mind. While the good man is discussing his crumpets and tea, Jimmie Sladd is admitted to his presence, a servant having first acquainted him that Jimmie was down-stairs "waiting to pay his respects."

"Send him up, Alice," said burly Gilbert. "There's nobody better worth seeing." I am afraid that if the comely widow had been discoverable there would have been a decided exception in her favor.

"Well, Jimmie, old friend. How are you? Draw your chair up to the table. The girl's Gilbert noiselessly took a chair and placed it in a convenient spot. Slowly and silently he stood upon it, and for a while contented himself by listening to the sound of voices. Then he ventured to look over. He was not by any means a tall man, and he had to crane his neck a little. But he was rewarded. Mrs. Higginbotham sat with her back to him just below. He knew it was her by the bright ribbons on her cap. Just opposite were the two young ladies. Yes; one of them was the heroine of the fog, and no mistake. At that moment a lady arose from her seat in the opposite corner to reach something from the mantelpiece. There was no mistake here, either. It was the widow with the silver hair, whose face he had seen in the doorway of that mystical No. 59! and Whose heart had first been intrusted to his keeping long, long ago, "beneath the milk-white thorn!"

Poor Gilbert forgot all the need of silence; forgot all about the discredit of eavesdropping or spying; his big heart beat fast within him, his eyes were dim with an unbidden show of feeling, as he said, in delighted surprise, "Well! This is a go!"

In a moment he bethought him, and jumping from off his chair, he sped as fast as he could to regain his room and rejoin his waiting friend, honest Jimmie Sladd. He had not managed matters, however, with sufficient promptitude to prevent Mrs. Graythorpe from getting a second look at the face which gave her food for thought as it passed her on the "Highflier" a little while before. What induced her, I wonder, to repair to her bedroom presently, and to spend quite a time before the mirror and at her toilet, and then to sit alone and ponder? And pray what business good reader, is that either of yours or mine?

That same evening, a November evening once again, the landlord of the "Hilldrop Arms" suddenly and unexpectedly returns from town, bringing with him a couple of young men, tourists as he explained, who desired to explore the unquestionable attractions of Hilldrop and Faringham and the regions round about. But the little inefficient fiction was of small avail. A mother's keen and loving eyes soon rent the veil, and Mrs. Higginbotham, in tearful gladness, held her long absent laddie to her heart.

Gil Craske's voice, clear, round, and full, the very counterpart of his father's brought Dad down from the upper floor in full assurance as to who its owner was. Had he been listening for some other voice, I wonder?

"Well, Gil, my lad!" said dear, simple-hearted, impulsive Gilbert, senior. "Welcome to old England! Welcome to your dotting dad," and then whispered, "there's somebody else here that I hope will give you a welcome by-and-by."

"Now," said Gil to Jared Higginbotham, "now's your time." Jared asked to speak with the senior Gilbert alone; and from the same room from which he had stolen it, he restored "the box" which had caused him such awful misery; and in words fit and few confessed his fault, and cast himself on the mercy of the man to whom he had done such grievous wrong.

Then Jared told him of that awful night in London, when he thought he had seen his ghost. Gilbert was compelled to laugh, not loud but deep. "Ah," said he, "I remember; I had a feverish sore throat. There was no water in my room, and I ventured down stairs in my night-shirt to get a supply from the filter that stands in the hall."

"But what about that cut in the throat, sir?" said Jared, unprepared for the suggestion that he had been deceived by his own conscience.

"Red flannel, my friend, red flannel!" said Gilbert. "As I turned the first landing, a gust of wind blew out my candle, and I remember saying, as I groped in the gloom, 'Here's a go!'" So that was the "Go!" that Jared heard, and that sent him with feet winged with terror to his own room! I have a shrewd notion that most ghost stories, as Bloomfield puts it, are "just as true."

Then speaking with all seriousness and kindness of heart, Gilbert said: "Landlord, from my heart I am glad and thankful that you have won in this contest with the devil. I could have borne the loss of money, but I could not bear to think that the thief might lose his soul. From my heart I forgive you, and as the Great Example said, so I would say and pray, "Go in peace, and sin no more."

It scarcely needs that I should say anything more. The old proverb, "All's well that ends well," lets out the whole secret. I have been most anxious to trace the course of poor Jared Higginbotham, and if possible to see him safe out of the dreadful pit which he had dugged for himself. Now that he has done his best to undo the mischief he had wrought; now that he has returned to the full all that his cupidity wrongfully took away; now that he has confessed fully and frankly to those he has injured, and has been fully and frankly forgiven, I am glad to lay down my pen and leave him with his face turned toward the paths of honesty, honor, integrity, and truth. He and his fine-spirited son, Frank, will soon put the previous wrong to rights, and I have the best reason for believing that Jared Higginbotham was led to seek and kind that inward strength which comes from Heaven by way of the Cross of Jesus, by which the feeblest can say "No" to the very strongest temptation and triumphantly stand.

Gilbert Craske found the old flame still alight in the breast of the comely widow, the sweet Alice Leaming of former days, and it was not long before she avowed the fact in answer to his frank request for her hand and heart. All Faringham was rejoiced to find that she was to be again the honored mistress of Hilldrop Grange, and agreed that Gilbert Craske had taken the right course to win, as the new proprietor of the Hilldrop estate, the esteem and confidence of all.

A new, bright, cheerful chapter was at once opened in the life of Mercy Graythorpe and her sister Millie. It soon became apparent that whatever it was that was "on the nerves" of Millie, it had taken to itself wings and flown away. She was soon the life and soul of the Grange, for, of course, Gilbert Craske would not hear of anything other than that the sisters should have their home again by the hearth of their early youth. On the other hand, Mercy, faithful, strong-hearted, noble Mercy, seemed to have got the something "on the nerves" instead of her sister Millie. She became silent, moody, and unrestful. She seemed as though she could not settle down in the old place, and spent very much of her time at the Hilldrop Arms, with Mrs. Higginbotham. She became that good landlady's right hand, and Mrs. H. declared she did not know what she should do without her.

The villagers soon began to link her name with that of Frank Higginbotham. They predicted a speedy union between them twain. There seemed nothing against it, they thought, only that she was a little too old for him, or rather that he was a little too young for her.

But lo, and behold, it was all a mistake, as village gossip generally is. It came out at last that Gilbert Craske, Jun., the manly and genial Gil, had been trying hard to win her—that her fine sense of what was right and fitting had rebelled against living under the same roof with him, feeling sure the world would say she was "setting her cap at him." But the young farmer from Australia overrode all obstacles. He felt that he had her heart in his keeping—that she could not hide—and so eventually she was both wooed and won, and became the happy wife of a happy husband, and, at Faringham Abbey, they dwell in a cheery home of their own.

Well, after this, Mrs. Higginbotham declared that she must have her god-daughter, Millie, to be her confidante and companion, as she could not spare them both. But strange to say, Millie would not go. Her visits were but few and brief. Mercy tried to persuade her to try to fill her place with the dear, true friend, who had been so kind, and through whom their present happy fortune had come to them. "Why don't you go oftener, Millie, darling?" said Mercy, the young matron. "Why did you go so often?" said Millie, blushing.

"Oh, well, that was because I had private reasons," replied Mercy.

Then Millie kissed her sister and ran away to hide her blushes as she said, "And don't you think I may have my private reasons too?"

"Ho, ho!" quoth Mercy to herself; "sits the wind in that quarter?"

Her sisterly love and anxiety soon found out that it did, and was not likely to veer to any other. So she set herself to the congenial task of "smoothing the way;" and at this present time the Faringham villagers have hit upon a piece of gossip that for once in a while is true—namely, that Frank Higginbotham, who has just purchased a large farm from some few miles distant, will, by-and-by take Millie Graythorpe there to help to manage it.

I have not time to discourse upon the delight Jimmie Sladd experienced when he discovered that Mr. Allanson was no other than that very Gilbert Craske who was his own god-son, and of whom he had said, "I've nussed him and bussed him many a time when he was in short frocks; he had the making of a man in him, had little Gil." Now, to use his own expression, Jimmie really was "in clover;" and so until his Divine Master calls the good old shepherd higher, he is certain to remain.

Jared Higginbotham and his worthy wife are one now in heart and sympathy; but Jared is very quiet and reserved. He does not say much, but he thinks a good deal; and his thoughts humble him and help to shape his conduct after the model of Him who forgives so freely and loves the forgiven one so much.

Here I take leave of those of whom I have thus written; and as I look first into the home of Gilbert Craske and his wife, and then at the hearth of young Gil and his precious Mercy, and then at the peaceful dwelling of Frank and his young bride, Millie, and think of the way God's Providence hath dealt with them, I feel that I cannot do better than quote Jimmie Sladd, "The good Lord's allus on the side o' them as means well and does well; an' when folks hev' Him on their side it doesn't greatly matter how many an' how much tak' sides again 'em. Them an' Him's more than a match for all that's contrary."

Still and ever the apostolic challenge rings out unanswered and triumphant: "If God be for us, who shall be against us?"

He who hath every day God for his friend,
Such an one surely may hope to the end.
Life hath no sorrow He cannot cure;
From Him we borrow strength to endure;
For every to-morrow His favor is sure.

THE END.

200,000

Estey Organs have been sold in the last fifty years.

An enormous number! No other Organ has been so popular. No other Organ has had such a sale.

We want to secure the best conception of 200,000 Organs. We ask some reader of this paper to give us an illustration of the number 200,000 which will show how great it is.

Here is one specimen illustration.

"Estimating the population of the United States at 60,000,000, you have sold one organ for every 300 inhabitants in this country to-day."

This is a good illustration. Perhaps you can do better. Will you not try?

ESTEY ORGAN CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

Branch Offices: 159 Tremont Street, Boston.
831 Broadway, New York.
18 North 7th Street, Philadelphia.
State and Jackson Streets, Chicago.
916 Olive Street, St. Louis.
Marietta and Broad Sts., Atlanta, Ga.

An interesting Book of Facts (containing 24 pages with 46 illustrations) entitled, How Large is 200,000, will be mailed free; one copy to one address.

BERCHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills, BERCHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces unsightly lumps or swellings; which causes painful running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or many other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors." It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the worst possible features of both. Being the most ancient, it is the most general of all diseases or affections, for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished, often when other medicines have failed, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. For all affections of the blood Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some of the cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by O. L. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

JOHNSON'S LINIMENT
ANODYNE ESTABLISHED 1810.

For Internal and External Use.

Stops Pain, Cramps, Inflammation in body or limb, like magic. Cures Croup, Asthma, Colds, Catarrh, Cholera Morbus, Diarrhoea, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Lameback, Stiff Joints and Strains. Full particulars free. Price 25 cts. post-paid. L. B. JOHNSON & CO., Boston, Mass.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY
ESTAB. 1850. INCOR. 1877
$150 to $1500
They Lead the World!
Sent for trial in your own home.
ABSOLUTELY PERFECT
Guaranteed Six Years.
DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!
Cat. Free.
MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N.Y.
ORGANS $35 to $500

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

on your Boots and Shoes.

Sold by all Dealers.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.
VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA
"Best & Goes Farthest."
Ask your Grocer for it, take no other. [63]

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE-ROLLERS
Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
AUTOGRAPH OF
OF
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

UNION INVESTMENT COMPANY
Capital, - - $1,000,000.
KANSAS CITY, MO.

7 per cent. investment interest semi-annual
The direct obligation of the Company secured by business property and recommended by prominent business men and bankers of Kansas City. Send for circulars with full particulars.

W. P. RICE, Pres. } Union Investment Co.
O. F. PAGE, Treas. }

A LADY WANTED in every Town to
WOMAN'S HAND BOOK
Just issued. Quick Sales. Big Pay
Home. Circ'lrs Free. E. B. TREAT, Pub., New York

AN AGNOSTIC'S STORY.

The prevalence of agnosticism in Russia increased of late years even more widely than in other lands. It is not outspoken infidelity. Its professors do not say, "There is no God"; they simply say, "We do not know whether there is a God or not." One of these Russian agnostics, N. Panin, a noted scholar, has become a believer, and gives this account of the change in his views: "I began to read the Bible carefully to find out what good there was in it. I knew there must be much that was valuable, or it would not have retained its influence through the centuries. Determined I would pass over the miracles and other difficulties, and treasure up the things of ethical value that I might find. I thought that in this effort God—if there was a God—would give me light. So I read the Bible trustfully, leaving the difficulties alone, till God should enlighten me. I strove to follow out its teachings as far as I could. I gained light day by day, and soon I found the Bible becoming its own interpreter. I also went trustfully to prayer. As I could not believe, I did for power to believe. If I were not strong enough to follow Him, I prayed for necessary strength, in all things coming to Christ for help. Continuing for some time, I soon learned my utter inability to live without God. Then I got to know how deep I was in sin. Sins of which I had not formerly been cognizant now troubled me and gave me no rest, showing how my very being was permeated with sin, and that I required what the Bible called regeneration, or I should never get out of my burden of sin, or be free from the sins which dwelt in my carnal nature. It became evident to me that I must give myself to Christ, if He would receive me. I so, and received Him as my Saviour, wonderful to tell, the moment I testified His saving power I became a new man." This is the testimony of a learned agnostic, and shows the wonderful power of the Word of God unto the salvation of souls when read in the right spirit.

PATRIARCHAL APOSTATE.

An eminent Jewish missionary in Berlin, with the constant reiteration of the fact that he was an apostate or messenger from the religion of his fathers, repeatedly answered the charge in a convincing manner. "Why do you persist in ostracizing me and refusing to listen to my arguments?" he asked of a company of Jews, turned their backs upon him in a public manner. One of them replied, "I say, very man hold his own opinion; but a man leaves the religion of his fathers, it is a disgrace to him—he is a meshumad." The challenge thus thrown out promptly accepted. "Well, gentlemen, we are all Jews here—except myself, I regard as a meshumad—very let me ask you what you think of Abraham?" "Oh, he was a man; a holy and perfect one." "What do you say?" And the statement was made. "How can you say that? Did I leave the religion of his father—where were his fathers in Ur of the Chaldees?" They tried to get out of it by saying they accepted a better, the true religion; the speaker reminded them that was not the question at issue. Abraham had forsaken the religion of his fathers, and hence, according to their own dictum, was to be stoned. They caught the point at once, and said they had never thought of it, and the issue was a conversation which lasted until ten o'clock, and a promise on the part of the Jews to come to the mission.

OFFERING GOD A BARGAIN.

Among the converts at an Evangelistic meeting was a young man, who made a profession of faith. He did not seem earnest about it, and the pastor of the church had some doubt about his sincerity. His doubts increased when he learned that the young man had become engaged to one of the young ladies in the choir. She was a devoted Christian, who would not be thought of marrying an unbeliever. The pastor, therefore, suspected that the young man had made a profession of religion in order to remove the obstacle to their union. But he is an intelligent young man, and understood, mentally, the way of salvation. The pastor hoped, therefore, that in some way the Holy Spirit would apply it to his heart. That result did come, but it came in a very painful way. The young people were married, and soon afterward removed out of the city into the country. There, to the grief of the Christian wife, her husband discontinued his attendance at church, and spent the day loafing or working in his garden. He also objected to her going to church, too, as it was a long distance away, and he preferred to have her stay home and cook a hot dinner. But she continued praying for him, and begged the prayers of her former pastor in his behalf. This is how God answered the prayers: They had a little baby boy, who was the joy of the father's heart. He was strong and bright, but one day he was stricken with illness. Both parents were very anxious about him, and one morning the father was told he had better not go to business that day, as there was no hope for little Willie. He went into the room where the child lay, and, with tears coursing down his cheeks, he threw himself on his knees and cried, "Oh, Lord, I will be out-in-out for Christ if Thou wilt only spare my boy!" But God does not make bargains with men. He requires them to give themselves unconditionally to Him. The child was taken. God took the lamb to cause the sheep to follow, and that father from that day began to serve God. It was a great wrench, but it was required to turn that man's heart to God. The Lord, before He put forth His power, endeavored to woo him with gentle pleadings, but these failing, sterner measures had to be adopted.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.
Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

THE STANLEY BOOK.

JUST ISSUED,
Stanley and His Relief of Emin Pasha.
By E. P. SCOTT, Author of "Lectures on Africa," Etc.
250 Pages, with Maps and 20 Full-Page Illustrations.
Paper, 25 cents; Half Russia, Marbled Edges, $1.00.
All classes of people are interested in the wonderful history and travels of this most wonderful man, and this book will have an immense sale. It will be mailed to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price. Agents wanted, to whom 50 per cent. commission will be paid. Send 25 cents for Prospectus Book, and go to work selling it. Address, J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, P. O. Box 2767, 57 Rose Street, New York.

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD.

The address made at Dr. Moody's College at Northfield, by HENRY DRUMMOND.
Leatherette, gilt top, 35 cents.

"Thoughtful and powerful, with a wealth of illustration."—Churchman.
"It is in Mr. Drummond's best vein."—Christian Union.
"A Brilliant Essay."

Sent by return mail on receipt of price. Every Christian man should read it.

JAMES POTT & CO., Publishers,
14 and 16 Astor Place, New York.

WINNOWN SONGS.

FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.
By IRA D. SANKEY.
Already adopted for use by the Chautauque Assembly, also N. Y., N. J., and other State S. S. Conventions. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If sent by mail, add 5 cents per copy.
Biglow & Main, The John Church Co., New York & Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts.

If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING" SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

RIDLEY'S

Grand Street,

NEW YORK.

MILLINERY.

Latest Popular Shapes, Ladies', Misses' and Children's Trimmed and Untrimmed Hats.

Largest Assortment, Lowest Prices.
Fine Roses, Poppies, Daisy and Rose Wreathes, Wings, Buds, Ostrich Tips, etc.

Trimming and Sash Ribbons, Silks, Velvets and Plushes.
Jersey Waists, Hosiery, Muslin and Cambric Underwear.

1,500 Embroidered Dress Robes,

5 yards material, 40-inch goods; warranted. Trimmings 4½ yards wide, 4½ yards narrow.

At $1.50 the Robe.

Real Value, $3.50.

Ladies' Suits, Wraps AND Travelling Garments.

Ladies' White Muslin Suits, Embroidery and Tucks, Jacket Fronts, $5.50; worth $8.00.
Mohair Dust Cloaks, Peasant Style, $3.50 and $4.90.
Ladies' Outing Coats and Blazer Jackets, Stripes and Plaid and Plain Colors, $1.95, $2.50, $3.90.
5,000 Misses' Wash Suits, in Gingham, Seersucker and Percale, 69c., 95c., $1.25, $1.75.

BLACK SILK MITS

PURE SILK.

10½ Inches Long, 15c., 25c., 37c. a pair.
10½ Inches Long, Inserted Thumbs, 45c., 48c. a pair.
12 Inches Long, Inserted Thumbs, 48c., 50c., 60c. a pair.
10 Inches Long, Extra Large Sizes, 45c., 50c., 75c. a pair.

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

Men's Flannel Outing Shirts, Well Made.
Good Fitting and full size, 35c., 49c. and 69c. each.
Fine Scotch Flannel Outing Shirts, Superior make and Finish, Combining all improvements, worth from $2.00 to 2.50, at $1.29 each.

TRUNKS.

Zinc covered Crystalized Oval Top, Iron Bound Trunks, with Compartment Tray, from $2.38 up.
Leather Covered 3 Hinge Saratoga Trunks, good lock, $3.00 up.
Duck Covered Flat or Oval Top Trunks, linen lined, Iron Bottom, 3 Hinge, Iron Bound, Brass Lock, at $3.45 and up.
Steamer Trunks from $2.50 and up. Valises, 39c. up.
Club Bags, $1.00 and up. Grain Leather Valises, $2.50 and up.

Baby Carriages, Velocipedes, Tricycles, Bicycles, &c.

Outdoor Games of All Kinds.
Fishing Rods and Tackle, Artificial Bait, &c.

Spring and Summer Magazine,
Sample Copy Free on Application.

ORDERS BY MAIL
FILLED WITH UNUSUAL CARE & PROMPTNESS

EDWARD RIDLEY & SONS,
309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand Street.
56 to 68 ALLEN STREET
59 to 65 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Company,

827 and 829 Broadway, New York,

HERMANN SCHAEFFER,
President;

ERNEST BRENNER,
Vice-President.

NONE

GENUINE

WITHOUT

THIS TRADE MARK.

Note our Trade Mark Closely!

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS!

We ask attention to our Complete Assortment of

SUMMER UNDERWEAR,

And Especially to our exquisite

All-Wool GAUZE

Underwear for the hot, summer season.

Send for explanatory, descriptive and illustrated Catalogue and price-list, free by mail.

Garments made to order, a Specialty.

Mail orders promptly attended to.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Company,

827 and 829 Broadway, New York.

BRANCH HOUSES:

119 NASSAU ST., Temple Court Building

504 FULTON ST., next to V.M.C.A. Bldg., Brooklyn, N.Y.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY.

DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

Patented 1879-1885, 1885-1886.
No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Circular Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine.
Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.

THE McDOWELL CO.
6 West 14th Street, New York City.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"

"Retrograde" Seamed Mitts.

THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Dealers.

BABY WARDROBE.

PATTERNS. Complete outfit of 25 new and improved patterns for infants' clothes. Also 25 patterns of short clothes. Either set of patterns, together with full directions for making, amount and kind of material required, by mail, 50c.; both sets, $1.00. Such reliable patterns including every necessary article are needed by every mother.
Mrs. J. BRIDE, P. O. Box 2088, New York.

"Ignorance is the mother of all evils."

Are you ignorant of the uses of

SAPOLIO?

Sapolio is a solid cake of Scouring Soap. Try it in your next house-cleaning.

IF YOU HAVE A BOY OR ARE

A Boy, it will pay you to send for one of our pamphlets on Education and Choice of Occupation, FREE, with catalogue of our publications. Address, stating age.

FOWLER & WELLS, 777 Broadway, N. Y.

MEN WANTED.

Great inducements. Outfit free. Address, J. AUSTIN SHAW, Nurseryman, Brooklyn, New York.

If you are interested in SEEDS, PLANTS or ROSES, write the Dingee & Conard Co., Westgrove, Pa.

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Palmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by T. C. Taylor, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

"HE KNOWETH ALL."

The twilight falls, the night is near,
I fold my work away,
And kneel to One who bends to hear
The story of the day.

The old, old story; yet I kneel
To tell it at Thy call;
And cares grow lighter as I feel
That Jesus knows them all.

Yes, all! the morning and the night,
The joy, the grief, the loss,
The roughened path, the sunbeams bright,
The hourly thorn and cross.

Thou knowest all—I lean my head,
My weary eyelids close,
Content and glad awhile to tread
This path, since Jesus knows.

And He has loved me all my heart
With answering love is stirred,
And every anguished pain and smart Finds healing in the Word.

So here I lay me down to rest,
As nightly shadows fall,
And lean confiding on His breast,
Who knows and pities all.

—Selected.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.
will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Dealers who claim that their preparations are "as good as Hood's Sarsaparilla," by doing so admit that Hood's is the standard and possesses peculiar merit which they try in vain to reach.

A CLERGYMAN UNDER AN OPERATION.

WHAT power there is in the Christian religion to support a believer in the time of trial is illustrated in a narrative from the pen of a chaplain to one of our great hospitals. He states that one night, after he had retired to rest, he was called up by the chief surgeon. "He informed me," says the chaplain, "that there had been a railway accident, and an old clergyman was in the hospital whose foot would have to be amputated, and as he was about seventy-two years of age, his case was critical—'Would I go and see him before the operation?' Of course I was soon by the sufferer's bedside, and a remarkable visit it was. Several surgeons were there examining the crushed limb. The sufferer took my hand pleasantly, and listened quietly to what I had to say. I spoke to him of the love and wisdom of God. I reminded him of the Saviour's tender words about the fall of a sparrow and the argument He drew from it—'Fear not, therefore, ye of more value than many sparrows.' To my astonishment the patient burst into praise. 'Of course it could not have happened without my Heavenly Father's permission. I know He is love. I know He is light. I know He does all things well.' Then he addressed himself to one of the surgeons. 'Doctor,' he said, 'do you understand these things? Are you on Christ's side?' It was a strange pulpit from which the patient was preaching, and a strange congregation, and when the limb was amputated he went on preaching to one and another in the ward. The night nurse said: 'I've never heard the like!' And I suppose she never had. It was four months before my friend could leave the hospital. During all that time he adorned the doctrine of God, our Saviour. He was a fine example of a Christian rising superior to temporal circumstances."

A SISTER'S EXAMPLE.

WHAT kindness and consistent conduct may do in a family is seen in the following incident, which is related by an evangelist who knew the case: "A young girl was converted one night, and the same evening she knelt in her bedroom to commit herself to the care of her Saviour. Her sister, who shared the room, regarded her with amazement, and sarcastically said, 'What new nonsense is this? Do you mean to say that you are what they call converted?' 'Yes,' was the straightforward reply, 'I am converted. To-day I gave my heart to Christ, and resolved that I should strive to follow His example.' 'Then you will not be going to the ball on Friday, nor the dance next week?' 'No.' 'Ah, well, we shall see how long it lasts, but in the meantime I will have nothing to do with you.' And for over three months she never spoke to her sister, though the other in every way showed a friendly and conciliatory spirit. At the end of that time the unconverted girl was laid on a bed of sickness, then the gentle spirit of her sister shone forth, as she strove to alleviate the invalid's pain and make her sick bed as easy as possible. The patient could not but compare the conduct of her sister with what hers would have been under like circumstances, which caused her to wonder if faith in Christ had anything to do with it. She spoke to her sister about her thoughts, and soon, under her gentle influence, was brought to give herself to Christ. Such was the power of example, and living the Christian life. 'Let your light so shine that it may be seen of men, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.'"

A PHILOSOPHER'S OPINION.

THE biographer of the great philosopher, Thomas Carlyle, relates that a lady of distinction, at whose house Carlyle was staying, was shocked by the plainness with which he rebuked her self-congratulation. In speaking of the Jews, and the prejudice of society against them, she said they deserved their fate for their wickedness in not receiving Jesus as their Saviour. She finished her diatribe against them by saying, "How different would have been His reception had He appeared in our own time! How delighted we should all be to throw our doors open to Him, and listen to His Divine precepts! Don't you think so, Mr. Carlyle?" The plain-spoken philosopher, thus appealed to, said in his broadest Scotch accent, "No, madam, I don't. I think, had He come with plenty of money and good recommendations, and fashionably dressed, and preached doctrines palatable to the higher orders, I might have had the honor to receive from your ladyship a card of invitation, on the back would be written, 'To meet our Saviour'; but if He had come denouncing those aristocrats, the Pharisees, and associating with the publicans and Radicals of the day, we should have treated Him now very much as the Jews did then, and cried out, 'Take Him to Newgate and hang Him!'"

HIRES'

25c HIRES' IMPROVED 25c
ROOT BEER!
IN LIQUID, NO BOTTLING OR TRADING EASILY MADE THIS PACKAGE MAKES FIVE GALLONS.

ROOT BEER.

The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME
TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world.
Delicious and Sparkling. TRY IT.

Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.

C. E. HIRES, PHILADELPHIA.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
CHANCE FOR ALL
To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 34 pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

RUPTURE CURED

with our Improved Elastic Truss worn with ease night and day, retains the rupture under the hardest exercise or severest strain. Send for pamphlet.
IMPROVED ELASTIC TRUSS CO.,
822 & 824 Broadway, Cor. 12th St., New York.

YOU CAN LAY BY $500 TO $1500

a year by working for us. You can't do it in any surer or simpler way no matter how you try. We furnish capital and pay liberally those who work either whole or part time. Stamp not required for answer. Jno. C. Winston & Co., PUBL., Philadelphia, Chicago, Kansas City.

Perfect Days in June

Need perfect Lays for June—and here they are!

IN SHEET MUSIC FORM.

ELAINE. A Love Song. Van de Water. 40c
MIZPAH. Song. Adam Geibel. 35c
SIGNAL BELLS AT SEA. Song. W. S. Hays. 40c
OLD HOME DOWN ON THE FARM. Dubois. 40c
VISIONS OF REST WALTZES. F. T. Baker. 60c
DANSE ECOSSAISE. F. T. Baker. 50c
EDELWEISS. Glade Waltz. T. E. Vanderbeck. 60c
BATTLE WON. Triumphant March. E. Holst. 50c

IN BOOK FORM.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. Very beautiful music. More than 40 sacred airs. Arranged by Leon Keach.
OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Arr. for Piano.
YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces.
CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION. 19 Piano Duets. Highly praised by good players.
PIANO CLASSICS. Volume 2. Marvellously good pieces, as are those of vol. 1.
SONG CLASSICS. Volume 2. Grand Music.

Any book or piece mailed for retail price, which, for any one of the superior books above mentioned is but $1.00.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.

C. H. DITSON & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

UNACQUAINTED WITH THE GEOGRAPHY OF THE COUNTRY WILL OBTAIN MUCH INFORMATION FROM A STUDY OF THIS MAP OF THE Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry.

Including Lines East and West of the Missouri River. The Direct Route to and from CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, DAVENPORT, DES MOINES, COUNCIL BLUFFS, WATERTOWN, SIOUX FALLS, MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL, ST. JOSEPH, ATCHISON, LEAVENWORTH, KANSAS CITY, TOPEKA, DENVER, COLORADO SPRINGS and PUEBLO. Free Reclining Chair Cars to and from CHICAGO, CALDWELL, HUTCHINSON and DODGE CITY, and Palace Sleeping Cars between CHICAGO, WICHITA and HUTCHINSON. Daily Trains to and from KINGFISHER, in the Indian Territory.

SOLID VESTIBULE EXPRESS TRAINS

of Through Coaches, Sleepers and Dining Cars daily between CHICAGO, DES MOINES, COUNCIL BLUFFS and OMAHA, and Free Reclining Chair Cars between CHICAGO and DENVER, COLORADO SPRINGS and PUEBLO, via St. Joseph, or Kansas City and Topeka. Excursions daily with Choice of Routes to and from Salt Lake, Portland, Los Angeles and San Francisco. The Direct Line to and from Pike's Peak, Manitou, Garden of the Gods, the Sanitariums, and Scenic Grandeur of Colorado.

Via The Albert Lea Route.

Solid Express Trains daily between Chicago and Minneapolis and St. Paul, with THROUGH Reclining Chair Cars (FREE) to and from those points and Kansas City. Through Chair Car and Sleeper between Peoria, Spirit Lake and Sioux Falls via Rock Island. The Favorite Line to Watertown, Sioux Falls, the Summer Resorts and Hunting and Fishing Grounds of the Northwest.

The Short Line via Seneca and Kankakee offers facilities to travel to and from Indianapolis, Cincinnati, and other Southern points.

For Tickets, Maps, Folders, or desired information, apply at any Coupon Ticket Office, or address,
E. ST. JOHN, JOHN SEBASTIAN,
Gen'l Manager. Gen'l Tkt. & Pass Agt.
CHICAGO, ILL.

WALTER L. DAY, 23 West 12th St., N. Y. City.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new;
for Schools, Stores, and Residences.

H. S. NORTROP,
18 Rose Street, New York.

SHORTHAND Private instruction by practical verbatim reporter. 20 years' experience. No failures. Situations guaranteed. Book and Circulars Free. FRANK HARRISON, Stenographer, 239 Broadway, N. Y., or 211 Broad St., Newark, N. J.

W. S. WYSE, DEAR SIR:—I was a sufferer from kidney disease for several years, and made every effort to obtain relief, but failed in every instance until I procured a bottle of Wyse's New Remedy. I took half of a bottle, which to my great delight relieved me of all the troublesome symptoms in very short space of time.
I am so much improved that I consider myself out of all danger, if not entirely cured of the disease.
JAMES S. BARRON,
329 West 23d Street, New York.

TESTIMONIALS.

From AMOS J. CUMMINGS, member Congress; Ex-Senator ALBERT D. GETT; Ex-Police Commissioner DE WITT C. WHEELER, and others. Sent free mail.

WYSE'S

NEW REMEDY

FOR

DISEASES OF THE KIDNEYS AND LIVER

WYSE'S NEW REMEDY

Has become celebrated for the successful treatment and cure of the following diseases:
Diabetes, Bright's Disease, Brickdust Deposits, Mucous Inflammation of the Kidneys and Bladder, Pain in the Back, Weak Kidneys, Retention of Urine, Gleet, Gravel and all diseases affecting the Urinary Organs.

WYSE NEW REMEDY COMPANY

PROPRIETORS,

157 W. 23d St., New York

For sale by all druggists. Sent by express on receipt of One Dollar. Mention this paper.

LOVELY WOMAN!
HOW CAN YOU TOLERATE Freckles, Pimples, Yellow or Muddy Skin, Moth, Wrinkles, Red Nose, or any other form of facial disfigurements when by using Dr. Ammett's French Arsenio Complexion Wafers, you can possess a beautiful form, brilliant eyes, and lovely complexion. Perfectly harmless and the only positive beautifier of the skin. Form. $1.00 per box by mail to any address.
Fulton Mfg. Co., 72 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

THE NEW MODEL,

OUR LATEST and BEST MOWER.

A Gem For The Little Folks

THE STORY OF JESUS

For Little Children
By MRS. G. E. MORTON
Fully Illustrated

12mo, 316 Pages
Cloth, Printed in $1.00, post-paid

"Told in simple words and a very handsome manner. How wonderful that the biography of the Son of God is better adapted than any other to the little children. Angels study it; devils dread it; babes love it. Blessed be the Story of Jesus!"
SPURGEON.

"The demand for a fourth edition of this pleasant and instructive work shows that it has already met considerable favor. Planned something on the lines as the 'Peep of Day.' Several illustrations of an attractive binding add to its value as a school prize or children's reward book."—The School Librarian.

"A difficult task well executed in simple, childish language, the 'old story' is told once more. The holiness of our Lord, and the great object life are kept in prominence, while his intercourse with all classes is described in a life-like way. We recommend the book, which is improved and well cut."—The Christian.

Sent post-paid to any address on receipt of
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 25. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PICTURE OF THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF THE LATE GEN. GORDON IN LONDON.
THE KISS OF WELCOME. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Sentinel's Mistake, etc.
THE GLORIOUS EXPECTATION. By Rev. George H. Pember.

THE PHARISEES REPROVED. By Mrs. Baxter.
GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Little Kindnesses—Carlyle's Remorse, etc.
A SUMMARY OF THE EVENTS OF THE WEEK.
DR. TALMAGE ON RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.
Chinese Converts Tested—An Ordination under a Lamp-post—The Gipsy's Imprisonment, etc.
PORTRAIT OF MISS DE BROEN, Founder of the Belleville, Paris, Mission.

THE BELIEVER'S CREDENTIALS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
PICTURE OF A GROUP OF CONVERTS OF THE HILL TRIBES IN INDIA.
THE STOLEN FLOWERS. A Story of the S. S. Golden Text (with Illustration).
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser, author of "The Only Way Out," "Epochs of a Life," etc., etc.

THE PRINCE OF WALES UNVEILING THE STATUE OF THE LATE GENERAL GORDON.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

THE KISS OF WELCOME.

"When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him." Luke 15: 20.

The Prodigal's Return—Probably Motherless—Unrecognized by the Neighbors—The Father Watching—His Quick Recognition—Who the Father Represents—A Daughter's Memento—I. The Father's Eyesight—The Distance of Men from God—How far God's Sight Reaches—II. The Father's Haste—The Returning Sinner's Need of Help—Always Met on the Road—III. The Father's Kiss—No Reproaches—The Unsearchable Love—Proved on Calvary—The Saviour's Dying Words—The Bars of the Sheep-fold Lowered.

ONE of the deepest wells that inspiration ever opened is this well of a parable which we can never exhaust. The parable, I suppose, was founded on facts. I have described to you the going away of this prodigal son from his father's house, and I have showed you what a hard time he had down in the wilderness, and what a very great mistake it was for him to leave so beautiful a home for such a miserable desert. But he did not always stay in the wilderness; he came back after a while. We do not read that his mother came to greet him. I suppose she was dead. She would have been the first to come out. The father would have given the second kiss to the returning prodigal; the mother the first. It may have been for the lack of her example and prayers that he became a prodigal. Sometimes the father does not know how to manage the children of the household. The chief work comes upon the mother. Indeed, no one ever gets over the calamity of losing a mother in early life. Still, this young man was not ungreeted when he came back.

However well apparelled we may be in the morning when we start out on a journey, before night, what with the dust and the jostling, we have lost all cleanliness of appearance. But this prodigal, when he started from the swine-trough, was ragged and wretched, and after he had gone through days of journeying and exposure, you can more easily imagine than describe. As the people see this prodigal coming on homeward, they wonder who he is. They say: "I wonder what prison he has broken out of. I wonder what lazaretto he has escaped from. I wonder with what plague he will smite the air." Although these people may have been well acquainted with the family, yet they do not imagine that this is the very young man who went off only a little while ago with quick step, and ruddy cheek, and beautiful apparel. The young man, I think, walks very fast. He looks as though he were intent upon something very important. The people stop. They look at him. They wonder where he came from. They wonder where he is going to.

His Appearance,

You have heard of a son who went off to sea and never returned. All the people in the neighborhood thought the son would never return, but the parents came to no such conclusion. They would go by the hour, and day, and sit upon the beach, looking off upon the water, expecting to see the sail that would bring home the long-absent boy. And so I think this father of my text sat under the vine looking out toward the road on which his son had departed; but the father has changed very much since we saw him last. His hair has become white, his cheeks are furrowed.

His Heart is Broken.

What is all his full table to him when his son may be lacking bread? What is all the splendor of the wardrobe of that homestead when the son may not have a decent coat? What are all the sheep on that hillside to that father when his pet lamb is gone? Still he sits and watches, looking out on the road, and one day he beholds a foot-traveller. He sees him rise above the hill; first the head and after awhile the entire body; and as soon as he gets a fair glance of him he knows it is his recreant son. He forgets the crutch, and the cane, and the stiffness of the joints, and bounds away. I think the people all around were amazed. They said: "It is only a footpad. It is only some old tramp. Don't go out to meet him." The father knew better.

The change in the son's appearance could not hide the marks by which the father knew the boy. You know that persons of a great deal of independence of character are apt to indicate it in their walk. For that reason the sailor almost always has a peculiar step, not only because he stands much on shipboard amid the rocking of the sea, and he has to balance himself, but he has for the most part an independent character, which would show in his gait, even if he never went on the sea; and we know from what transpired afterward, and from what transpired before, that this prodigal son was of an independent and frank nature; and I suppose that the characteristics of his mind and heart were the characteristics of his walk. And so the father knew him. He puts out his withered arms toward him; he brings his wrinkled face against the pale cheek of his son; he kisses the wan lips; he thanks God that the long agony is over. "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him."

Oh, do you not recognize that Father? Who was it? It is God! I have no sympathy with that cast-iron theology which represents God as hard, severe, and vindictive.

God is a Father

—kind, loving, lenient, gentle, long-suffering, patient, and He flies to our immortal rescue. Oh, that we might realize it. A wealthy lady in one of the Eastern countries was going off for some time, and she asked her daughters for some memento to carry with her. One of the daughters brought a marble tablet, beautifully inscribed; and another daughter brought a beautiful wreath of flowers. The third daughter came and said: "Mother, I brought neither flowers nor tablet, but here is my heart. I have inscribed it all over with your name, and wherever you go, it will go with you." The mother recognized it as the best of all the mementoes. Oh, that our souls might go out toward our Father—that our hearts might be written all over with the evidences of His loving kindness, and that we might never again forsake Him.

In the first place, I notice in this text, the father's eyesight; in the second place, I notice, the father's haste; and, in the third place, I notice the father's kiss.

The Father's Eyesight.

To begin: the father's eyesight. "When he was a great way off his father saw him." You have noticed how old people sometimes put a book off on the other side of the light. They can see at a distance a great deal easier than they can close by. I do not know whether this father could see well that which was near by, but I do know he could see a great way off. "His father saw him." Perhaps he had been looking for the return of that boy especially that day. I do not know but that he had been in prayer, and that God had told him that that day the recreant boy would come home. "The father saw him a great way off."

I wonder if God's eyesight can descry us when we are coming back to Him? The text pictures our condition—

We Are a Great way Off.

That young man was not farther off from his father's house, sin is not farther off from holiness, hell is not farther off from heaven, than we have been by our sins away off from our God; aye, so far off that we could not hear His voice, though vehemently He has called us year after year. I do not know what bad habits you may have formed, or in what evil places you have been, or what false notions you may have entertained; but you are ready to acknowledge, if your heart has not been changed by the grace of God, that you are a great way off—aye, so far that you cannot get back of yourselves. You would like to come back. Aye, this moment you would start, if it were not for this sin, and that habit, and this disadvantage. But I am to tell you of the Father's eyesight. "He saw him a great way off." He has seen all your frailties, all your struggles, all your disadvantages.

He has been longing for your coming. He has not been looking at you with a critic's eye or a bailiff's eye, but with a Father's eye; and if a parent ever pitied a child, God pities you. You say: "Oh, I had so many evil surroundings when I started life." Your Father sees it. You say: "I have so many bad surroundings now, and it is very difficult for me to break away from evil associations." Your Father sees it, and if you should start heavenward—as I pray you may—your Father would not sit idly down and allow you to struggle on up toward Him. Oh no! Seeing you a great way off, He would fly to the rescue. How long does it take a father to leap into the middle of the highway if his child be there, and a swift vehicle is coming, and may destroy him? Five hundred times longer than it takes our heavenly Father to spring to the deliverance of a lost child. "When he was a great way off his Father saw him."

And this brings me to notice

The Father's Haste.

The parable says he ran. No wonder! He did not know but that the young man would change his mind and go back. He did not know but that he would drop down from exhaustion. He did not know but that something fatal might overtake him before he got up to the doorsill: and so the father ran. The Bible, for the most part, speaks of God as walking. "In the fourth watch of the night," it says, "Jesus came unto them walking on the sea." "He walketh upon the wings of the wind." Our first parents heard the voice of the Lord, walking in the garden in the cool of the day; but when a sinner starts for God, the Father runs to meet him. Oh! if a man ever wants help, it is when he tries to become a Christian. The world says to him: "Back with you. Have more spirit. Don't be hampered with religion. Time enough yet. Wait until you get sick. Wait until you get old." Satan says: "Back with you; you are so bad that God will have nothing to do with you;" or, "You are good enough, and need no Redeemer. Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." Ten thousand voices say: "Back with you. God is a hard master. The Church is a collection of hypocrites. Back into your sins; back to your evil indulgences; back to your prayerless pillow. The silliest thing that a young man ever does is to come home after he has been wandering." Oh, how much help a man does want when he tries to become a Christian! Indeed, the prodigal home to his father's house unassisted. Unless some one comes to meet him he had better have stayed by the swine-troughs.

Cannot Find His Way

When the tide comes in, you might more easily with your broom sweep back the surges than you could drive back the ocean of your ungiven transgressions. What are we to do? Are we to fight the battle alone, and trudge on with no one to aid us, and no rock to shelter us, and no word of encouragement to cheer us? Glorify to God, we have in the text the announcement: "When he was yet a great way off, his father ran." When the sinner starts for God, God starts for the sinner. God does not come out with a slow and hesitating pace. The infinite spaces slip beneath His feet, and He takes worlds at a bound. "The father ran." Oh, wonderful meeting, when God and the sinner come together. "The father ran." You start for God and God starts for you, and you meet, and while the angels rejoice over the meeting, your long injured Father falls upon your neck with attestations of compassion and pardon. Your poor, wandering, sinful, polluted soul, at the loving, the eternal Father, have met.

The Father's Kiss.

I remark upon the father's kiss. "He fell on his neck," my text says, "and kissed him." It is not every father that would have done that. Some would have scolded him, and said: "He went off with beautiful clothes, but now you are all in tatters. You went off healthy, and come back sick and wasted with your dissipation." He did not say that. The son, all haggard, and ragged, and filthy, and wretched stood before his father. The father charged him with none of his wanderings. He just received him. He just kissed him. His wretchedness was a recommendation to that father's love. Oh, that father's kiss! How shall I describe the love of God?—the ardor with which He receives a sinner back again? Give me a plummet with which I may fathom this sea. Give me a ladder with which I can scale this height. Give me words with which I can describe this love. The apostle says in one place, "unsearchable;" in another, "past finding out." Height overtopping all height; depth plunging beneath all depth; breadth compassing all immensity. Oh, this love! God so loved the world.

He Loves You.

Don't you believe He loves you? Has He not done everything to make you think so? He has given you life, health, friends, home—the use of your hand, the sight of your eye, the hearing of your ear. He has strewn your path with mercies. He has fed you, clothed you, sheltered you, defended you, loved you, importuned you all your life long. Don't you believe He loves you? Why, if now you should start up from the wilderness of your sin, He would throw both arms around you. To make you believe that He loves you, He stooped to manger, and cross, and sepulchre. With all the passions of His holy nature roused, He stands before you to-day, and would coax you to happiness and heaven. Oh, this Father's kiss! There is so much meaning, and love, and compassion in it; so much pardon in it; so much heaven in it. I proclaim Him the Lord God, merciful, gracious, and long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth. Lest you would not believe Him, He goes up Golgotha, and while the rocks are rending, and the graves are opening, and the mobs are howling, and the sun is hiding, He dies for you. See Him! See Him on the Mount of Crucifixion, the sweat on His brow tinged with the blood exuding from His lacerated temples! See His eyes swimming in death! Hear the loud breathing of the Sufferer as He pants with

A World on His Heart!

Hark to the fall of the blood from brow, and hand, and foot, on the rocks beneath—drop! drop! drop! Look at the nails! How wide the wounds are! Wider do they gape as His body comes down upon them. Oh! this crucifixion agony! Tears melting into tears. Blood flowing into blood. Darkness dropping on darkness. Hands of men joined with hands of devils to tear apart the quivering heart of the Son of God!

Oh! Will he never speak again? Will that crimson face never light up again? He will speak again; while the blood is suffusing His brow, and reddening His cheek, and gathering on nostril and lip, and you think He is exhausted and cannot speak, He cries out until all the ages hear Him: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do!" Is there no emphasis in such a scene as that to make your dry eyes weep, and your hard heart break? Will you turn your back upon it, and say by your actions what the Jews said by their words: "His blood be on us, and on our children?"

What Does it All Mean

to us, my brother, my sister? Why, it means that for our lost race there was a Father's kiss. Love brought Him down. Love opened the gate. Love led to the sacrifice. Love shattered the grave. Love lifted Him up in resurrection. Sovereign love! Omnipotent love! Infinite love! Bleeding love! Everlasting love!

"Oh, for this love let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break;
And all harmonious human tongues
The Saviour's praises speak."

Now, will you accept that Father's kiss? The Holy Spirit comes to you with His arousing, melting, alarming, inviting, vivifying influence. Hearer, what creates in thee that unrest? It is the Holy Ghost. What influence now tells thee that it is time to fly, that to-morrow may be too late; that there is one door, one road, one cross, one sacrifice, one Jesus? It is the Holy Ghost.

My most urgent word is to those who, like the young man of my text, are a great way off, and they will start for home, and they will get home. They will yet preach the Gospel and on communion days carry around the consecrated bread, acceptable to everybody, because of their holy life, and their consecrated behavior. The Lord is going to save you. Your home has got to be rebuilt. Your physical health has got to be restored. Your worldly business has got to be reconstructed. The Church of God is going to rejoice over your discipleship. You are not Gospel hardened. You have not heard or read many sermons during the last few years. You do not weep, but the shower is not far off. You sigh, and you have noticed that there is always a sigh in the wind before the rain falls. There are those who would give anything if they could find relief in tears. They say:

Oh, My Wasted Life!

Oh, the bitter past! Oh, the graves over which I have stumbled! Whither shall I fly? Alas for the future! Everything is dark—so dark, so dark. God help me! God pity me!" Thank the Lord for that last utterance. You have begun to pray, and when a man begins to petition, that sets all heaven flying this way, and God steps in, and beats back the hounds of temptation to their kennel, and around about the poor wounded soul puts the covert of His pardoning mercy. Hark! I hear something fall. What was that? It is the bars of the fence around the sheep-fold. The shepherd lets them down, and the hunted sheep of the mountain bound in; some of them their fleece torn with the brambles, some of them their feet lame with the dogs; but bounding in. Thank God! Saved for time, and saved for eternity.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Little Kindnesses.*

ONE of the best sermons I ever heard was on sins of omission. The preacher said: "The majority of us abstain from murder; we neither forge nor do we shop-lift; and few of us have tried our hands at picking a pocket. For us the whole list of crimes and misdemeanors is fenced off and divided from our ordinary lives in the region of the impossible. With the exception of an occasional inclination to murder, which amidst the manifold provocations of daily life is apt to beset people of quick and unregulated passions, we can honestly declare that we have never been tempted." And yet we feel, most of us, that we are steeped in sin, and have fallen away from the standard of even a philosophical Christianity. Our lives are black with sins of omission, not the things we have done and ought not to have done, but the things we ought to have done and have not done.

"Frederica Bremer has touched this subject sweetly in one of her books. A comfortable motherly woman is driving home on Christmas-eve in a sledge, laden with cakes, and toys, and goodies for little people of her own; and at the turnpike the toll-keeper's children run out into the snow to look at her. She sees the humble interior in the fire-glow, and thinks she would like to give those little ones a few of her rosy apples and oranges, and cakes. But the sledge drives on before she puts the thought into action. The sledge drives on, and the kindly act is left undone; the opportunity is lost. Life is full of such opportunities, full of kindnesses we might have done, the people we might have helped, the tears we might have dried, the souls we might have saved, perhaps—putting the matter in its most serious aspect."

What a different thing home-life would be, if every member of every family were constantly doing little kindnesses to every other member! "Family jars" is a proverbial expression. To live with people, to be related to them, means very often to be made miserable by them. Some persons seem to imagine that their relations exist for the express purpose of being worried. And even in less extreme cases, even in cases where there is no very poignant misery in the family circle—just think what an enormous amount of happiness there might be, over and above what there actually is, if every member of the family always did his best to promote it. Some people are perfectly satisfied with themselves if they refrain from doing positive harm. They think themselves extremely amiable, if they are not aggressively unamiable. A man, for example, sometimes prides himself on being a good husband, because he does not beat his wife, does not very often snub her, and sometimes lets her have her own way. But as for trying to make her, and keep her, continuously happy—well, he has got something else to think about. And this constant neglect of little happinesses leads in the long-run to great misery.

Carlyle's Remorse.

Read Carlyle's diary. His wife was brilliant, devoted, a woman of women; he accepted all her homage, all her faithful service, even to scrubbing floors and hunting noxious insects; and he neglected her. He allowed her to be dependent on outside friendship for a drive or an ice; little pleasures which he could have given her so easily, and did not. The carriage which would have saved her months of agony—the result of a fall while trying to scramble into an omnibus—the husband provided too late. All his sins against her were sins of omission—the sins of a man absorbed in his own work, thinking more of Frederick and his dry-as-dust German biographers than of the faithful, long-suffering wife. Never did he do her conscious or deliberate wrong; and he seemingly let her follow the bent of her own mind in cleaning rooms and riding in omnibuses. The sin was in not insisting on better things: in not perceiving that this bright creature was wasting health, talent, life, for his sake; in not exercising an affectionate tyranny against those small economies, the scraping and paring that were no longer needful. And so, when she has gone from him, there goes up that bitter cry: "Oh! for five minutes more of her, to tell her with what love and admiration, as of the beautifullest of known human souls, I did intrinsically always regard her! . . . Thou who wouldst give, give quickly. In the grave thy loved one can receive no kindness. Be wise ye living, and remember that time passes and does not return."

Negligent Parents.

And not only in the relations between husband and wife, but also in those between parents and children, between masters and servants, how much happiness is lost by the omission of little kindnesses! You have heard, I daresay, a good many sermons on the duties of children to their parents—very comforting, no doubt, you found them. I am going to preach one some day, on the duties of parents to their children. The latter set of duties are at least as numerous and as important as the former. Some people think they have done quite enough when they have fed, and clothed, and educated their children. They are satisfied, that is to say, when they have performed the duties for the neglect of which they could be punished by law. But moral duties and legal duties never altogether coincide. The scope of the former is always much more comprehensive than that of the latter. You have not fulfilled your duty to your children unless you have tried to secure for them all possible comfort, and merriment, and joy. And this you cannot do unless you are actuated by a spirit of continual kindliness. Whether your children are to be pitied or envied will depend, not so much upon their receiving, or failing to receive, occasional presents and treats, as upon their receiving or failing to receive, small, but ever-recurring kindnesses.

"The Christian Herald" Binder. — Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

* From Church and Creed, a volume of sermons by Professor Momerie, a work of marked ability, dealing with theological and practical questions from the standpoint of the Broad Church, Pp. 258; Price, $1.50. Published by Thomas Whittaker & Bible House, New York.

THE STATUE OF GEN. GORDON.

ON the first page this week is a picture of the statue erected in England to the valiant Christian soldier whose romantic career and pathetic death won the admiration of the whole civilized world. The English people have in this memorial manifested their affectionate regard for the remarkable man whose sad fate they deplore. The reproach of his death does not rest with them, but with the government that was in power at the time. Gordon's touching appeals for succor aroused the whole people, but the government was deaf to them, until the indignation of the country stirred it up to send a relief expedition, lest it should lose place and power. It was too late then for the success of such an expedition as was sent. Slow and cumbrous methods were adopted, the expedition was burdened with heavy artillery, and the officers in command were wedded to old systems of warfare unsuited for operation against a foe of the Mahdi's character. Before the expedition could enter Khartoum, the Mahdi had taken the city, and Gordon was dead. All the people mourned for him from the Queen down to the humblest readers of the newspapers, and this statue is an expression of their sorrow and admiration.

The Memorial.

The statue has been erected by subscription which was raised so quickly and so liberally that the committee had in a short time more money at command than was needed for the work. The balance was expended in placing a monument in Westminster Abbey, marble busts at Chatham and Woolwich barracks, a stained-glass window in Rochester Cathedral, and a shield presented to Miss Gordon, sister of the lamented hero. The statue, which is the work of Onslow Ford, R. A., sculptor, represents General Gordon in the uniform of an Egyptian General, as Governor-General of the Soudan, riding a camel; the pedestal is inscribed simply "Gordon." From an artistic point of view alone, the statue is a triumph over difficulties. Mr. Ford, was "greatly daring" when he decided to represent the hero seated on a camel. The camel is an excellent but not a beautiful quadruped. Its vast size might have been expected, moreover, to have unduly dwarfed its rider by comparison, and to have rendered the work undignified. Mr. Ford's genius has overcome the difficulty, however, and the statue is both a faithful and picturesque representation of the Governor-General of the Soudan. It stands in the square of the Brompton Barracks, opposite the Royal Engineers' Institute.

The Heroic Life

which this statue is intended to memorialize was in all respects a worthy one. Charles George Gordon was the son of an officer in the English army. He was born on Jan. 28th 1833. He was sent to the Royal Academy at Woolwich for his education, it having been decided that he should have a military career. He acquitted himself with honor, and developed so remarkable an ability for sketching and the making of maps that he was appointed to the Royal engineers, and in 1852 received his commission. Two years later he was ordered to the Crimea with his regiment to take part in the siege of Sebastopol. He reported himself on Jan. 1, 1855, at headquarters, but, not being detailed for any duty for several weeks, he took notes of the sad state of the soldiers through the breaking down of the commissariat department, and recorded some of his observations in his Letters from the Crimea.

In due time he was ordered to the front to do

Duty in the Trenches.

His letters at this time exhibit his strong religious feelings and the submission to the Divine will that so characterised him. Believing that "a man's immortal till his work is done," and being ever ready for death if it should come suddenly, he knew no fear even when in the most exposed situations, as the following incident shows: One day, in going the round of the trenches, he heard a corporal and a sapper of engineers in violent altercation. He stopped to ask what was the matter, when he was told that the men were engaged placing some fresh gabions in the battery, and that the corporal had ordered the sapper to stand up on the parapet, where he was exposed to the enemy's fire, while the corporal, in the full shelter of the battery, handed the baskets up to him. Gordon at once jumped up to the parapet, ordering the corporal to join him, while the sapper handed them the gabions. When the work was done, and done under the fire of the watchful Russian gunners, Gordon turned to the corporal and said, "Never order a man to do anything that you are afraid to do yourself."

Although daily exposed in the trenches to the fire of the enemy, and frequently engaged in repulsing sorties, the only mishap that befel him was a slight contusion on the forehead from a stone struck up by a shell, by which he was kept only a few hours from duty. His conduct throughout the siege gained the notice and approval of his superiors, and the love of his comrades. He also received the decoration of the French Legion of Honour, a mark of distinction seldom conferred on so young an officer.

Chinese Gordon,

the name by which he was best known for many years, originated in the services he rendered to the Chinese government in 1863. Gordon was at that time in China with the British forces. The war between China and Great Britain was over, but the Chinese government was threatened with dissolution by the Taeping rebellion. It had sustained many reverses, and was almost in despair, when it was proposed to place a British officer in command of the native troops. Gordon was appointed and took command on March 25, 1863. His first step was to besiege the rebel stronghold, Taitsan, which he took by storm, and not long after took Quinsan, by which he cut the communications of the rebels on the main lines. Eight hundred prisoners were taken, who, on being spared, gladly joined his force. His energies were now devoted to the capture of Soochow, a town garrisoned with 40,000 rebels. During the repeated attacks on this place Gordon was always at the front unarmed, but carrying a small black cane which he used in directing the troops, and which got for itself the name of Gordon's magic wand of victory. He captured Soochow, and after that victory the rebellion was over.

In the Soudan

Gordon first took office in 1874. He was appointed Governor of the Equatorial Provinces of Egypt and accepted the appointment, mainly on account of the opportunities it gave him of suppressing the slave trade. From 1874 to 1879 he governed this vast region with satisfaction to the Cairo administration, and with credit to himself. When he left the Soudan the public peace was undisturbed, and the tranquillity of the Khedive's latest acquisition seemed assured. His health was broken and he longed to be at home for rest and study of the word of God in company with dear Christian friends. He accordingly resigned, and returned to England.

In 1884 the trouble of the Khedive of Egypt had reached an acute stage. He was advised to abandon the Soudan to the Mahdi, but both he and his advisers were well aware that the course might imperil the safety of Egypt itself. They were reluctant to abandon it, but were doubtful of their power to hold it, as the necessity for concentrating all the forces in Egypt was imperative. It was then that Gordon was thought of. The prestige of his name and his personal popularity in the Soudan might suffice to hold it with a small force. Gordon was consulted, and he was willing to go. He arrived on Feb. 18, 1884, and was received with effusive demonstrations of welcome, thousands of the people crowding round him to kiss his hands and feet. He had been but a very short time in the city, before he saw how completely the state of affairs in the Soudan was changed. The remembrance of his own former rule kept the peaceable population quiet; but he had also many active, determined, and treacherous enemies. He seems, rightly or wrongly, to have come to the conclusion that Khartoum ought, at all hazards, to be defended. By this time the Mahdi's troops had surrounded the city. The siege continued five months, and Gordon wrote urgent letters begging for help. He felt that he was deserted. The English government, however, had opposed the retention of the Soudan by Egypt, and was little disposed to send an expedition to relieve Khartoum. Finally yielding to the pressure of public opinion, a force was sent, under the command of Lord Wolseley, but it did not arrive until the city had fallen.

In Khartoum

The closing scenes of the fall of Khartoum and of the death of Gordon, are still involved in uncertainty. There can be no doubt however, that the soldiers were weakened by insufficient food, and the number of their enemies, and at last, listening to the baleful influence of Faragh Pasha they intrigued with the enemy. The black troops remained faithful, but there were only about 2,300: and with these it was impossible to maintain the defensive. About the 6th of January 1885 Gordon issued a proclamation to the famished inhabitants, giving such as desired, permission to join the Mahdi. Great numbers availed themselves of this privilege, and the population of the town was thereby reduced from 34,000 to 14,000. Every living animal from donkeys to rats was consumed, and at last a ration of gum was issued daily to the troops. The Mahdi's forces captured the fort of Omdurman about the 13th of January, and on the 23rd Gordon had a stormy interview with Faragh Pasha, who was in treacherous communication with the enemy. On the 25th the notables of the town urged him to surrender, but he determined to hold out to the last. At half-past three on the following morning, January 26th, 1885, the enemy made an attack on the Bourre Gate, and the troops being too exhausted by privations to make an effectual resistance, the town was taken.

Death of Gordon.

Accounts differ as to the exact circumstances of Gordon's death, but that most generally received is that he was killed at or near the palace, by a volley of musketry, when hurrying with two officers and twenty men towards the House of Herr Hansel, the Austrian Consul, who was also killed. Gordon was in front, leading the party, and fell, together with both officers and nine men. His body was seen by several witnesses at the gate of the palace, and, it is said, his head was struck off and sent to the Mahdi's camp at Omdurman, where it was recognized.

A few days afterwards the British relieving force arrived at Khartoum. Thus perished this noble man and sincere Christian, two days before his fifty-second birthday. The foundation of his religious character was his belief in the Bible as a revelation of the will of God. He was earnest and diligent in the study of it, and had the most intense and unwavering faith in its literal application to the affairs of daily life.

MISS DE BROEN.

(See Portrait on Page 396.)

A MISSION, truly remarkable in its origin, its sphere, and its success, is that conducted in the French Capital by the lady whose portrait we now give. Its headquarters are at Belleville, the section of Paris, in which the communists are most numerous, and in which the majority of the people are of the poorest class. No great city in the world probably contains a district so thoroughly steeped in poverty, of the desperate, wolfish kind, as does Paris in the Belleville Precinct. Hunger and hardship have transformed its people into a condition, little removed from savagery. Their poverty is so bitter and so hopeless that anarchy appeals to their nature with awful power. We know not what they have suffered, but we may imagine it when we reflect on the frightful work they did with fire and sword during the brief period of their supremacy in 1871. It is no trifling hardship that could change the genial French nature into a nature capable of such atrocities as those of the commune.

While the ruins of the Tuilleries were still smoking, and ruin and desolation were all around, a quiet, gentle lady appeared among the fierce men and woman, whose hands had wrought this havoc, and began talking to them of the love of Christ. They listened in wonderment to her story, and admired the courage that could bring one so unlike themselves into their dreaded section. Many of them were utterly heathen, knowing nothing of God and the Bible; still more numerous were those who knew in a perverted way, and hated both. Both classes were charmed by the newcomer's gentleness, and evident goodwill, and they listened. She took so deep an interest in them and made their misery so well known among her friends, that money was entrusted to her by benevolent Christian persons to relieve some of the most urgent cases, and then her battle was won.

This lady was Miss De Broen, whose name is now beloved throughout the Belleville section. She is of Dutch descent, but her grandfather, Baron De Broen, having acquired large estates in Russia, went to that country to live upon them in the last century. He suffered heavy losses by the invasion of Napoleon, and the name of the French, therefore, had unpleasant associations for the family. Miss De Broen is thus returning good for evil in devoting her life to the best interests of the French people. She had been converted early in life, and her father's second marriage having made her home uncongenial, she looked around for a sphere in which she could work for God. She travelled in Switzerland, and subsequently to London, visiting missions and talking with Christian people. After the Franco-German war she visited several districts of France, with a friend who was relieving the wounded, and the bereaved families of soldiers. In the course of her travel she went to Paris and saw the heroes of the Commune in their homes, and there began the work that has made her name famous.

Her house-to-house work went on for some time with so much encouragement that she ventured to hire a room in Belleville, where she could talk to a large number of women at one time. It was regularly filled, and through the kindness of friends interested in her work, she was able to provide an occasional meal here for some starving women and children. Then she opened a night-school in the building, for men and women, which was much appreciated. She also attached to the work a dispensary for sick children, which did more than anything to win the hearts of the parents. It was Christ's way. She seemed more anxious to relieve suffering than to make converts. But when one and another was expressing gratitude, and inquiring why the lady took all this trouble for their sakes, she spoke of "the love of Christ that constraineth." They thought whatever her religion might be, it must be good to bring forth such fruit.

The work continued to grow. Christian men and women, who visited Paris, went out to Belleville to see the strange work, were astonished to hear that even the ferocious, desperate Communists were being tamed under Christian influence. "Never shall I forget," says one, "the change in the faces of the people who had been in Miss De Broen's classes. I had seen them before she went among them, and they were sullen, fierce, vindictive. Now they are gentle and lovable." Funds were raised to help her, and an iron hall was erected, more commodious and convenient than the room she had previously occupied. There she has her dispensary, her soup-kitchen, her meetings every afternoon and evening, and her school and services on Sunday. Even the avowed infidels and the leaders of the anarchists have gone, and the notorious Louise Michel, presided at one of the meetings. When Miss De Broen began to speak of God there were cries of "Away with her," and Louis Michel pulled at the speaker's dress in alarm for her safety, but a rough, stalwart man rose, and exclaimed, "Let her alone; we know her. She does not merely preach; she lives what she says." After that there was no more disturbance, and, at the close, fierce men and women came around her, taking her hand and saying, "How happy you are in your faith;

we have none. The government does not care what becomes of us; we are miserable. Let us come again; we want to hear more of your doctrines." So this noble woman is gaining ground, and Belleville is learning the gospel from her lips and life.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Remarkable Fatality Occurred at Middletown, N. Y. on June 6. A boy wanted a gun to shoot crows, and having heard that an elderly lady, who lived near, had a gun, went to her and asked her to lend it to him. She did so, previously warning him it might be loaded. She said that it had belonged to her brother who had been dead more than twelve years and it had never been used since his death. The boy stepped out of doors and exploded two caps on the nipple without any effect. He then dropped the breech to the ground and applied his mouth to the muzzle, with the intent of blowing a current of air into the barrel as a test of any obstruction there. At this moment there was a discharge from the gun, which sent a big bullet crashing through his brain and killing him instantly. The destructive power of the charge had not been lost in all those years. It is so with the evil that men do. Its consequences may not be apparent at the time it is committed, but the time comes inevitably in the next life, if not in this, when its deadly nature is fully realized. (Eccles. 8:11.)

A Vow of Silence was Kept for Thirty Years by a lady in Georgia, who died on June 3. A local journal says that thirty years ago a man returned to his home from business in an irritable, nervous mood. His wife, unaware of his state of mind, began to tell him of some trivial annoyance, when he interrupted her and roughly bade her be silent. He added that the sound of her voice was hateful to him. His wife was usually patient under his abuse, but those words cut her to the quick and she answered solemnly that he should never hear her voice again. He never did, nor did anyone else. She went about her duties as usual, but she did not speak. When it was absolutely necessary to communicate with any one, she used a slate. In spite of her husband's penitence and his entreaties and the appeals of friends and relatives she kept her vow. When her husband was dying he begged her to speak but one word to show that she had forgiven him. She wrote on the slate, "I cannot; God forgive and help me, I cannot." She survived her husband several years, but still maintained her silence. Whether she felt it impossible to break her vow, or whether she had lost the power of speech by long disuse is not known. She died without uttering a word, having been silent for thirty years. Doubtless she regretted her vow as much as her husband did the hasty speech that led to it. Though few, if any persons, have suffered exactly as they did there are many whose lives have been maimed and spoiled by a few angry words spoken in disregard of the Apostolic injunction. (James 3:5,10)

A Tribute to the Memory of a Dead Author was paid recently by an American visitor to London. Having read in his younger days this author's description of scenes and localities in the British metropolis, and having a profound admiration for him, he took a pleasure in identifying the places described. One of these places was a restaurant famous for its pies. He stood for a few minutes looking at the old shabby building and recalling the scenes associated with it in his favorite books. A plaintive voice at his elbow disturbed his train of thought with the request, "Please sir, won't you buy me a veal and ham pie?" He looked down and saw a small hungry-looking boy, with whom a veal and ham pie would agree right well. Now his author had been very fond of boys, and was especially noted for his kindness to poor boys. The American saw his way to an active tribute of an appropriate kind to his memory. "How many boys," he asked, "would the shop hold?" "I dunno," said the boy; "fifteen or sixteen I should say." The American said, "Well, you go and fetch fifteen more boys and bring them here, and I'll treat the lot." In a minute or two the boy came back with fifteen others as ragged and hungry as himself. Our countryman led the disreputable procession into the shop and gave the astonished waiters orders to supply the boys with all the pies they wanted. He sat down and watched them feasting with a full heart; and, when they were satisfied, he paid the bill with the feeling that if his favorite author could have seen the feast, it would have given him more gratification than a gift of ten times the amount for a statue of him. Those who love Jesus have abundant opportunities of manifesting their love in a similar spirit. There are many things we can do in remembrance of Him, and that they will be acceptable to Him we know, for He said, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto me." (Matt. 25:40.)

A Desperate Rescue by an Engineer Occurred near Allentown, Pa., on June 2. The engineer had charge of the mail train and was going at a rapid rate, when he saw a tall, graceful girl walking on the track ahead of him. He blew a loud whistle, and the girl heard the warning and stepped lightly to the next track. He was horrified to see that she had walked right in front of a train approaching in the opposite direction. He tried by motions to warn her of her danger, but she did not understand him, and in looking back at him lost sight of her real danger. The noise of his train prevented her hearing that of the other. The man could not bear to see her killed, and he determined to venture his life in an effort to save her. He shut off steam, reversed his engine, and applied the steam-brakes. Before the train stopped his engine was abreast of the girl. He leaped from his cab, clutched her by the waist, and dragged her off the track just as the other engine swept by. The escape was so narrow that the man, though strong and brave, fell down fainting with emotion. We all admire the heroism that could lead a man to take such a risk to save the life of a stranger; but we listen unmoved to the story of that infinitely greater rescue of men who, like the girl, were unconscious of their peril, and which was effected by Christ at the cost of His life. And they whom He rescued were not strangers merely, but enemies. (Rom. 5:7.)

A Tree of Death has been Sent to a Lady in Savannah, Ga., by her brother, who is living in Java. He says that the natives warned him against handling a certain tree, which grows in the volcanic districts of Java and Sumatra, and which they called Kali Mujah. They said its breath would kill birds and even human beings. He paid little heed to the story until, chasing a bird-of-paradise one day, he saw it drop lifeless to the ground without apparent cause. He found the bird under a tree which gave forth the peculiar odor described by the natives, and knew that he had found one of the famous death-trees. He examined it closely. It had long slender stems, armed with thorns nearly an inch long, and covered with broad satin-smooth leaves of a heart shape and of a delicate emerald on one side and blood red, streaked with cream, on the other. The flowers were large, milk-white, and cup-like, and gave forth a faint perfume resembling that of chloroform. After inhaling it he became almost insensible, had a violent headache, singing in the ears, and twitching of the muscles. It appeared to have a baleful influence on other plants; for, though the soil was fertile, none were growing near it. It was fatal to all insects; and small birds felt its effects at a distance of fully three feet. They dropped to the ground and, if not speedily removed, soon died. He procured this specimen with some difficulty and sent it to America. It is the first living one that has ever been brought here. Unhappily, however, we have many forms of evil which produce still more disastrous results. Though the "death tree" does not flourish here, our saloons, gambling-houses, and haunts of vice, do the same deadly work on the souls of the people that the "death-tree" does on animal life. They attract the multitude, while few go the way to the "tree of life" the leaves of which are "for the healing of the nations." (Rev. 22:2.)

THE GLORIOUS EXPECTATION.

By G. H. Pember.*

The Time of Rejoicing—The Bereaved Bride—Absence Necessary—To Return for the Marriage—The Joy it will Bring—The Hope Lost—The Promise Forgotten—Remembrance of this Time to the First Advent—The Latter Rain.

UNTIL the time of the Saviour's departure had come, He would never stand by and see His people suffer, but always interfered for their relief. To cite His own words, the children of the bridechamber could not mourn, so long as the Bridegroom was with them. But such a state of things might not continue, for the disciples needed something more than justification; they had also to be sanctified, and that process could only be effected by the presence of the Holy Spirit to lead them through the cleansing fires of much tribulation. Accordingly the Lord says: "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you." Yes, it was necessary that the Bridegroom should depart for awhile, and during His absence, the children of the bridechamber should indeed mourn. In those dark days they must weep and lament while the world was rejoicing. They must be sorrowful, yet not without hope, for by-and-by their sorrow should be turned into joy.

How anxiously then would the disciples desire to hear what should be the cause of so glorious a change in their condition! But the Lord did not leave them long in suspense. "I," he continued, "will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice; and your joy no one taketh from you." This was indeed glad tidings for the disciples, and no less so for all other true believers. The Bridegroom, who sojourned with us a short time at His betrothal and if those who love Him could not mourn during His temporary presence, how all sorrow and sighing will flee away forever when He appears the second time, never again to be separated from His own! No matter what our sufferings, our perplexities, our anxieties may be, the instant we catch a glimpse of that dear face, which once was crowned with thorns for us, every disquietude will have vanished; the Egyptians which we may have seen that day, we shall see no more forever. The mountains of affliction which may be surrounding us, though they tower to the skies, shut out the light, and bar us from all that we love, will in a moment be leveled with the ground. The ship that may be fearfully tossing in mid-ocean on the waves of anguish, will immediately be within the calm, fair haven on the other side. And as we tread the happy shore that has never been stained by sin, we shall meet all the brothers and sisters in the Lord whom we have loved and lost, and, in the full consciousness that we have at last met to part no more, shall join them in ascribing blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever. So will the days of our mourning be ended, and everlasting joy shall be upon our heads when the Lord Jesus comes, and, according to His promise, sees us again. Moreover, if we be alive at the time, we shall be caught up to meet Him in the air, and escape altogether the gloomy portals of death.

Will Return for the Marriage,

Surely, then, the hope of this glorious event must be continually in the hearts of all believers? Doubtless they are accustomed to soften all care, and to soothe every grief with the thought, "The Lord is at hand!"

Nay, such is by no means the case. Passing strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless a fact, that the Church, though for awhile the return of the Lord was her only hope,

Soon forgot Him,

thought she could win her way without needing His personal presence, and did her best to establish herself as an earthly power, instead of waiting for the Son from heaven! Even at the time of the Reformation she did not recover her hope; she did indeed grasp again the truths connected with the First Advent, but altogether neglected those of the Second. And although in our days the Spirit of God is sending forth a stream of heralds to cry "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" yet even now there are many professing Christians of whom it is scarcely too severe to say that, if they do love the Lord Jesus, they at least seem to love Him best at a distance; for His glorious appearing is anything but a "blessed hope" to them.

How then can we account for such a phenomenon? Does it arise from the fact that the Second Advent is seldom mentioned and obscurely taught in the Bible? Oh, no; we cannot explain it in that way. For in the later Scriptures the Lord's return is brought before us perhaps more frequently than any other subject, sometimes in plain and direct statements, sometimes in parables, sometimes in exhortations, and sometimes in allusive notices. Indeed, Dr. Bullinger reckons no less than three hundred and eighteen references to it in the New Testament.

It is thus clear that we must seek an explanation of our difficulty, not in the Bible, but in the hearts of its readers.

History is Repeating Itself.

and the men of our times are found to be just what men were at the First Advent. For centuries the Jews had talked of their Messiah, boasted of Him, and looked down with scorn upon the Gentiles because of His expected coming. Yet when it was announced that He had actually been born into our world, not only was Herod disquieted—that, one could readily understand—but all Jerusalem was troubled with Him. For the truth was that the priestly hierarchy and the Pharisees were merely supporting their respectability, and feeding their pride upon the glorious promises of the Deliverer; and so, as soon as they knew that He had really come, they instinctively felt that He would tear away all their covering of lies. Conscience whispered that the Messiah of God would never permit their system of iniquity to continue.

Moreover, in their confusion of the two Advents they began to tremble at the question, "But who may abide the day of His coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth?" They remembered that He was to be like a refiner's fire, and would purify the sons of Levi and purge them as gold and silver. And for such things they were neither prepared nor willing to be prepared. Therefore they recoiled from Him with horror, knowing that He could be no Deliverer to them; they opposed Him during the whole time of His ministry, and as soon as they could compass their purpose they put Him to a shameful death.

Very similar is the disposition of many Christians of our days; they are content with churches upon earth, and do not wish the present order of things to be broken up, having in the depths of their hearts, but little confidence in the age that must follow. Yet!

The Impending Crisis

is far more solemn than that which disturbed Herod and the dwellers in Jerusalem. For we are not told that the Lord Jesus has just been born in Bethlehem, and therefore cannot be manifested to the world for some thirty years. No! the awful message to us is that at any moment, as suddenly as lightning from a summer sky, He may call for His waiting ones, and then begin to smite the earth with plagues, preparatory to His personal appearing to complete the destruction of His enemies.

To believe and rejoice in such a message we must have, first, a surpassing love for, and a boundless confidence in Him who is coming, and then a consequent readiness, to leave the scenes of earth and all their attractions without a backward glance as soon as His summons is heard.

Now, if we do not possess these qualifications, should we not be instant in prayer until we do possess them so that what was said of the Corinthians may be true of us also: "Ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ?" And if we do feel that we love Him more than all besides, should we not also love His appearing, and long for it? How discontented, amazed, nay, even indignant should we be if an earthly friend, while continually vaunting his affection for us, were always careful to avoid our company, and should never express a wish to see us face to face! And are there none among us to whom the Lord might sorrowfully turn and say, "Of thee is the parable spoken: thou art the man"? For centuries the whole Church, with rare individual exceptions has cared nought for her Lord's promise to come again; but in the last few decades many have remembered it, and the desire for His presence is returning.

The Showers of Blessing.

How marvellously have the lost truths of this New Testament been recovered during the times of the latter rain, which seem to have commenced with the Reformation. The first shower of blessing fell, and again the glad tidings were heard that salvation is not of works, but is the free gift of God to every one that seeth the Son and believeth on Him—freely given to us, but only after it had been purchased for us by the precious blood of Christ. Once more it was seen that the Lord had borne our sins in His own body on the tree, so that all Christendom and the whole wide world might resound with the joyous invitation, "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."

The second shower fell in the preaching of Whitfield, the band of devoted evangelists who gathered around Lady Huntington, and many others. Then the mourning sinner heard that he could not only be saved by faith, but saved immediately; that the instant he received the Lord Jesus, conversion had taken place.

Then followed the great revival which began in America and spread with more or less power through the Protestant lands of Christendom and in Ireland. And now the various denominations of the Church learned a new lesson, perceived more clearly that they had all been baptized into one body in Christ, and commenced to hold united prayer and other meetings on a larger scale than before.

Lastly the shower of our own days, which is very probably the last, the one immediately preceding the harvest, has brought once more into prominence two crowning truths which complete the restoration of apostolic doctrine. "Follow after holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" is now everywhere taught, and believers are being urged to purity of life, to whole-hearted consecration, and to earnest labor for the Lord. Meanwhile, on all sides, and waxing louder and louder, is heard the note of warning, "The Lord is at hand!"

CHINESE CONVERTS TESTED.

ONE of the best evidences of the value of mission work is not the number of the converts, but the proofs the converts who are made, give of their sincerity, and the high value they set on the religion they profess. There is found here and there in China, an eagerness to learn, a true martyr spirit that should quicken in every Christian heart an interest in foreign missions, and an effort to support them. Miss Grace Scott, one of the China Inland Missionaries, mentions in a recent letter two facts of this nature. She says:

"It might interest some of our friends to know how the Gospel found an entrance to this country village of Odzing. Less than two years ago a native colporteur visited the place with books and tracts. A woman welcomed him, and he began to tell her of Christ. She answered that once, when visiting the city of Wenchow, she heard, at the Native Orphan Asylum, a man telling of this Jesus and ever since had been longing to hear more. The colporteur was delighted to find that he was the very man who had spoken to her then. He stayed some few days, and instructed her and her household. At present there are eight or nine Christians in the village, and though now driven from their homes, their faith and confidence in God were in no way shaken.

"We have in our house at the present time six persons who have been cruelly beaten, had their things stolen, their wheat and vegetable rops destroyed, and themselves driven from their homes, because they refused to give money for the support of the idols. For six weeks they have been here, at serious loss to themselves and heavy expense to me, and yet their case seems as far from being settled as ever. The English Consul has kindly done all he could, but the magistrate has, so far, hardly moved in the matter, excusing himself on the ground of distance (about thirty-five miles), and the difficulty of controlling people so far off. One of the most trying experiences is seeing our native Christians tried and ill-used while we are unable to protect them, and are ourselves protected and allowed to live in comfort."

* From his article in Dr. A. J. Gordon's Watchword.

THE PHARISEES REPROVED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

S. Lesson for June 29; Luke 11: 37-54; Golden Text Luke 11: 36.

The Sign Refused—A Generation More Obtuse than Jonah's—Groping in the Presence of the Light of the World—The Meaning of the Single Eye—An Undivided Aim—The Ceremonial Washing—The True Cleansing—The Woe of the Hypocrite—The Motive Scrutinized—Teachers who are not Doers—Unbelievers Reverencing Dead Teachers—Exasperation Aroused by Faithful Reproof.

THE Lord Jesus, in His teaching, had been removing His hearers because they sought a sign; God's great Sign was manifest, present before their eyes, but they had no eyes for Him, and He declared that no sign should be given them but the sign of Jonas the prophet: "For as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation." He told them how the Queen of the South "came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here;" now the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonas: and behold, a greater than Jonas is here." He told them that the men of Nineveh and the Queen of the South should rise up in the judgment with that generation, and should condemn it, and He added, "No man when he hath lighted a candle putteth it in a secret place, neither under a bush, but on a candlestick; that they which come in may see the light."

God had sent His Son to be the Light of the world, but the generation to which Jesus came did dazzled their eyes with other objects, and in the very presence of God's light they groped for the wall like the blind. (Isa. 59: 10.) Therefore thy whole body also is full of light; but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness." Light and life streamed forth from the human body of our blessed Lord; those who came in contact with Him found light for their darkness, health for their sickness, comfort for their sadness; when He came in contact with the dead, He brought them to life again; and from His glorified body we receive our power, our light, our life. What He is to us, He would have us, as members of His body, to be to the world—His interpreters, reflectors, instruments. And, therefore, it is necessary that our whole being, body as well as soul and spirit, should come under the immediate control of the Holy Spirit; and should be "full of light, having no part dark," transparent, so that every movement, every word, every deed, may be in the full light and simplicity of Christ. "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the light shining of a candle doth give thee light."

When thine Eye is Single,

What is it then to have a single eye! Surely

One Undivided Aim

Christ pleased not Himself, sought not His own, did always those things which pleased His Father—this was a single aim. Paul said, "his one thing I do." In the multiplicity of His labors His aim was one, to live Christ, pressing to the mark for the prize of His high calling. He did not stay by the way to think whether he could afford to lose this, whether his endurance would hold out for that, whether his physical strength would be equal to the other; he had counted the cost, committed himself to the race-course, and staked all upon the issue. Paul's eye was single. Therefore it is that God has given us more details of his inward and outward life than of any other man mentioned in the Word of God.

"And as He spake, a certain Pharisee besought Him to dine with Him; and He went in, and sat down to meat. And when the Pharisee saw it, he marvelled that He had not first washed before dinner." It would appear from Mark 7: 3-9, that the Jews practised a ceremonial washing, not for the purpose of cleanliness, but in obedience to some tradition of the elders, for the Lord says, "For laying aside the commandment of God, and again (Ver. 13), "Making the Word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered." Are there not many who wish to be considered religious, and are exceedingly scrupulous as to whether they pray always kneeling, as to the laying no other book upon the Bible, and many other external marks of reverence, which are not to be despised, but which never change the heart or bring the soul in contact with God? There are some who would think it a greater sin to pray standing or sitting than to give way to anger or to be in debt.

Ye Hold the Tradition of Men;"

"The Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and platter: but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness. Ye fools, did not He that made that which is without make that which is within also? But rather give alms of such things as ye have" (or, give of the contents, i. e., of the vessel, Alford); "and behold, all things are clean unto you." That is to say, let your bodies serve the purpose for which they were created, to minister to God and man, and then the contact with men and things will not defile you; live, eat, think, speak to the glory of God, and "all things are clean unto you."

"But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees!" These were unusual words from the lips of Him who came, "not to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved." (John 3: 17.) But there was a reason for them. "The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore, whatever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not after their works: for

They Say, and Do Not."

Jesus' heart was open to the vilest sinner, and bless God! it is so still; but for those who want to appear holy, and get the credit of it before men, while their hearts are reeking in sin and wickedness—for those who will not come to the light lest their deeds should be reprov'd, even the Lord Jesus could only say, "Woe unto you."

"Woe unto you, Pharisees; for ye tithe mint, and rue, and all manner of herbs," ye do that which costs you nothing, and wins you the reputation for being pious, but "ye pass over judgment and the love of God," ye neither submit yourselves to the judgment of God nor yet do ye accept His love. "These ought ye to have done," these which ye have neglected, are of primary importance, and ye ought not to have left the other undone. "Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets," ye love the praise of men whether there is any ground for it or not. Oh, this awful, deadly blindness to things eternal! In our own day it reigns in the religion of many. Many are there whose aim is not to be holy, but to appear so; not to be pure in the sight of God, but to get credit with their fellow-creatures for being so; not to be self-denying as a habit of life, but to do two or three great things which may win the character of self-denial, and then to hide under that character a self-indulgence and a self-complacency which are despicable. To such our Lord has but one message, "Woe unto you!"

"Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them"—pitfalls for others, misleading signposts, which may cause others to go out of the way, and to rest in externalism, "having a form of Godliness, but denying (in word, in manner, in deed, in everything,) the power thereof!" (11. Tim. 3: 5.) These words of the Lord's were not without convincing power. One of the lawyers said unto Him, "Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also. And He said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers? for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers."

Theory without Practice!

This is what God hates—a teacher of the Word who is not a doer, is even more abominable than a hearer who is not a doer. To such the Lord has but one message, "Woe unto you!" No man has a right to teach others that which he himself is not prepared to put into practice. Paul could say, "Those things which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do." (Phil. 4: 9.) Oh, that every Christian parent, master, teacher, or minister, could say the same!

The Lord continued: "Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres;" and yet neither the fathers nor the children hearkened to the voice of the prophets! It was an easy thing to build the sepulchre of a prophet whose voice could no more disturb them. And thus it is in our own day, that men, such as John Bunyan, John Knox, etc., who were persecuted, despised, imprisoned, in their own lifetime, yet are memorialized after their death by the very successors in unbelief of those who have ill-treated them. It costs a man nothing to help in setting up a statue to the memory of one who, if he were living, he would keep at the greatest distance possible.

But He who knew "what was in man" (John 2: 25), went on to say, "therefore said also the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them shall they slay and persecute: that the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world may be required of this generation: from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation." That generation took upon itself the awful responsibility of rejecting God's Son, and, in rejecting the salvation which reached back to the time of Zacharias, and even to that of Abel, chose the awful alternative of having their lot with the rebellious in all ages, and thus the blood of Abel and Zacharias, who were both slain for God's sake, is required of those in all times who take part against God.

"God Requireth That Which is Past."

"God Requireth That Which is Past." "Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye enter not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered." And these were the professed leaders of the people. No wonder God said, "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran: I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied. But if they had stood in My council, and had caused My people to hear My words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evils of their doings" (Jer. 23: 21, 22). But these lawyers of the time of Christ, instead of opening the knowledge of God to others, took away the key, and caused many to stumble at the law (Mat. 2: 8), because they made no personal experience of it.

Christ's faithful dealing with the Pharisees and lawyers incensed them against Him, for "a scorner loveth not him that reproveth him; neither will he go unto the wise" (Prov. 15: 12). "The scribes and Pharisees began to urge Him vehemently, and to provoke Him to speak of many things; laying wait for Him, and seeking to catch something out of His mouth, that they might accuse Him." But they did not know that His mouth was guarded, that no guile could come out of it. "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself, but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." (John 14: 10.)

*This is a suggestion for a Sunday-school lesson on the part of Mrs. Baxter. The International S. S. Lesson for the day is either view of the previous thirteen lessons, or temperance (Daniel 17); or missionary lesson. (Isaiah 55: 8-13.)

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

ONE of the great natural needs of the world is a newspaper. The desire for one was evidenced so long ago as Paul's time, when it was said of the Athenians that they did nothing else than to tell or hear some new thing. Long before the art of printing was invented, the news of the day was gathered up and put in letters, and in manuscript form presented to the aristocracy. After awhile printing was invented and we live in a day when newspapers are published in almost all lands. In Mexico, in San Domingo, in Australia, in China, in India, even there the printing press has been exerting its power, and it is impossible to exaggerate the influence of a rightly conducted secular newspaper. But I have an idea that the printing press was prepared by God chiefly for the evangelization of the nations. I notice that at the time when the Church of God was waking up to the grandeur of its mission, God came out in His providence and said: "If you are now disposed to work, here is the mightiest of all agencies with which you may work."

The Boston Recorder began the campaign of religious journalism in this country, in 1815; but the work has gone on until now all the denominations of Christians have their organs of information, while there are other newspapers which, discarding and overlooking the bounds between the different denominations, work for evangelization without reference to any particular religious party. In every family there ought to be at least one religious newspaper. You take a morning paper—perhaps two morning papers. You take an evening paper—perhaps two evening papers. They are secular. Certainly there ought to be a religious newspaper in every Christian household. Without such a paper it is impossible that a family be intelligent in regard to the doings of Christ's kingdom. You would pronounce that business man utterly stupid who did not take a secular paper. You would have no very great respect for a merchant who, applying to no secular journal for information, should be ignorant in regard to the money market, in regard to the tariff of certain styles of goods, in regard to our peaceful or belligerent relations with foreign nations. You would have no regard for a man interested in the affairs of his country who never consulted the papers in the autumn in regard to the respective merits of candidates of different parties seeking office. But how utterly stupid is that Christian man who sits down with no religious newspaper, ignorant of the grand achievements of Christ's kingdom. During the last war, the army was divided into three divisions. You watched their marching, you read the list of killed and the wounded. You kept yourself well informed in regard to the victory or to the defeat of those armies: yet have you no interest in the fact that there are scores of divisions in Christ's army, all in the field to-day? Are you ignorant of the great revivals that have occurred all over the world? Do you know that there is thunder all along the line, and that the people are coming into the kingdom of God by hundreds and by thousands? The Church of Christ is assaulting Mohammedanism, assaulting Paganism, assaulting all forms of despotic government. How are we to be intimately acquainted with this grand procedure unless it be through the religious newspapers?

I argue also in behalf of taking religious newspapers into all families, because we need something to preach to us all the week long. We go into the house of God, and we hear the Gospel for an hour Sabbath morning and an hour Sabbath evening. But we want something on the stand, something on the library shelf, something by us to preach on Monday, on Tuesday, on Wednesday, on Thursday, on Friday, and on Saturday. We want a religious newspaper, that we may take it up five minutes while we are waiting for breakfast, that we may take it up in the half-hour of leisure after tea. It may be we only have time to read a sonnet about Christ or heaven, or read some call to a heavenly life, or read some fact in regard to Christ's kingdom. A religious newspaper preaches a sermon three hundred and sixty-five days long in every year, but the sermon is different from other long sermons in the fact that you can get away from it when you want to. We need religious information all the week long. The tendency of business is to make us pack-horses, to make us mere carts, to make us mere yardsticks. It is shoes, shoes, shoes! all the week. Hats, hats, hats! Crockery, crockery, crockery! ribbons, ribbons, ribbons! Now the religious newspaper comes in and says: "You are mortal. After awhile you are going to be done with these things, and you are to have an existence which will defy ail the ages of time and all the cycles of eternity."

Believing that you are persuaded that a religious newspaper ought to be placed in every household, I want to suggest certain rules by which you may make a selection. In the first place select those which abstain from all sectarian bitterness. There are many religious newspapers in this day that seem to have an appreciation of only one passage of Scripture, and that in Psalms: "Blessed be the Lord who teaches my hands to war and my fingers to fight." They are everlastingly stirring up old squabbles. There are Presbyterian newspapers that have not yet done discussing the difference between old schoolism and new schoolism. There are Methodist papers that have not yet done discussing whether a lay delegation ought to be permitted. There are newspapers of all denominations of Christians that are yet stirring up the old slavery question, as though that question had not done enough in filling a half century with acrimony, and producing the ghastliest war of modern times. I advise you very strongly not to have anything to do with a religious newspaper that bristles. Do not make a pet of a porcupine.

Have nothing to do with religious newspapers whose contributors are worn-out politicians, or ministers of the Gospel who, too lazy to keep up with the times, lie flat on their backs groaning because others do keep up with the times. A religious newspaper ought to be like a bed of spring violets, like a parterre of summer gladiolas. When the night falls, and the shutters are closed, you strike a light. So although the world may be closed darkly all around about you, have in your household a cheerful Christian illumination. A man or a newspaper that helps me either to laugh or to sing, I take to be my benefactor. In your choice of religious newspapers, seek those that are out-and-out evangelical. If you have in your house for one or two years a paper that is shilly-shally, at the end of the time you will be occupying a position in religion that is shilly-shally. The man that tries to carry water on both shoulders will succeed in keeping those on both sides of him sopping wet.

In the choice of religious newspapers seek those that are vivacious. Secular dullness may be excusable—religious dullness never. If a man is busy all the time on dull subjects and amid dull people you cannot blame him for getting dull; but when a man comes to write or speak in regard to the most exhilarant and exciting of all themes, the love of Christ, the glories of heaven, the imperative necessity of Christ's religion—and is dull in what he writes or dull in what he speaks, you come to the conclusion that he has mistaken his calling. When a young man comes before Church courts for examination as a candidate for the ministry, I ask him; "What is natural religion? What is revealed religion? What do you mean by the attributes of God? What do you mean by the decrees of God?" All these questions ought to be asked, no doubt, but there is one question which we ought to ask also; "Can you keep people awake when you are talking to them?" Now what is true in regard to religious address is true in regard to a religious newspaper. If no newspaper come into your house that is filled with stupid essays about God, or that is filled with pious twaddle or mental insipidity. One of the greatest slanders on the religion of Jesus Christ is dullness, is stupidity. A religious newspaper ought to come into your house like a fresh breeze off a meadow, instead of like the dank air of a cellar-door that has just been opened for ventilation.

In this matter of selecting religious newspapers, choose those that will give you help in both worlds. Such a paper will teach you how to be a better man, to be a better woman, to be a better child. It will help you in merchandise, in mechanism, in your studio, in your law office, in your school teaching, in anything you are called to do. But, above all, if it is the right kind of a paper, it will open before you the gates of heaven. A religious newspaper that calls for no repentance, exhibits no Christ, kindles no soul with no exhilarant anticipation of heaven is a dead failure. A religious paper that tends to tell you how to live in this world, without telling you how to prepare for the next world, will help you neither for this nor for that. O that all our religious journals might come up to a higher standard of influence. May God help us to an intelligent and saving choice in the selection of religious newspapers!

CURRENT EVENTS.

Instructions to the Cruisers for Behring are to capture and dismantle every vessel sealing there, whether she is British or American. This is ostensibly an attempt to protect the seals during the season and there should have the support of England. The difficulty arises from the dispute as to the violation of our rights over the sea. So long as the power our government wishes to exercise, for the general good, is held in our control of the sea, so long there will be friction between the two governments. Last year five Canadian vessels were seized, the seals were confiscated, but the escape of the seals was connived at by our captains. This year there are more ships engaged in the business and the orders are more stringent. Therefore a distinct prospect of trouble, unless the negotiations which are said to be still in progress, result in an amicable settlement before the cruisers get beyond the reach of telegraphic communication.

Seafarers by Sea will Hope that Congress will deal promptly with the bills now introduced to render operative the recommendations of the recent International Maritime Conference. As suggested by the Conference that the future legislation should be taken by this body, as it was our government that suggested the Conference, and received the delegates. The bills embody the decisions of the Conference, and if they are adopted, the President will have the power to issue a proclamation declaring the date on which the new rules are to go into effect. This is intended to allow time to the other Powers taking part in the Conference to make similar legislation, so as to have simultaneous action, without which confusion would result. The improvements adopted by the Conference were not all that were hoped for, but distinctly tend to insure greater safety in voyages, and it may therefore be hoped that all will gain that step, and others will follow.

Proposal to Apply the Alien Contract Labor Law to Mormon immigrants is made by an order in the Immigration Bureau and it has caused the Mormon authorities to fierce opposition. The Inspector who makes the proposal demands that the solicitation of immigrants by Mormon missionaries, the promises made to them in Europe, and the payment in whole or in part of their passage money are all violations of the Contract Labor Law, and he advises that a case be tried. This is quite a new element in the anti-Mormon fight, and the outcry it has excited proves that it is a formidable one. A committee was sent to New York last week to labor with the Collector of the Port on the subject. The result was not encouraging to the committee. The Collector believes it his duty to have a test case tried, and the immigrants expected to arrive this week will be questioned with a view of obtaining evidence for a case. This new blow, added to the heavier one of confiscating the funds of the Church, which the Supreme Court recently dealt them, will confirm the Mormons in their belief that the United States are inimical to their faith, as subtly they are to their works.

Significant and Instructive Figures in Connection with the number of labor strikes during the past five years, are given in the report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which has just been issued. It seems that the total number of strikes recorded during that period by the Bureau is 9,384. Of these 4,432 were more or less successful. The estimated gain in wages resulting from them is set down at $18,623,060. The loss to the workmen during the continuance of the strikes cannot be estimated, as there is no record of the wages they might have had had they remained at work. There were, however, paid out to the strikers a total of $1,210,260. The loss to the employers by a suspension of business during the strikes is estimated at $6,157,942. The one prominent feature to be drawn from these figures is the necessity of appointing Boards of Arbitration. Both capitalists and laborers deplore the losses entailed by strikes, and it is the interest of both parties to avoid them. It ought not to be difficult in any community to find some man, clergyman or layman, in whose integrity and impartiality both parties have confidence. With him should be joined two or three men appointed by employers, and the same number appointed by the employees. These might constitute the board, and both parties agree that when any dispute arises it should be submitted to the board, whose decision shall be final. The jurisdiction of such a Board might be a State, or it might be a certain trade throughout the country. By such a system the deplorable losses and sufferings of strikes would be avoided, and an equitable system of payment secured.

The Question of the Colored Vote in the South is receiving a more reasonable and candid attention in that section than heretofore. An able journalist in Alabama has published an exhaustive survey of the subject which is more statesmanlike than any production of the kind that has emanated from the halls of Congress. It implies that the objection to the domination of the colored population is now based, not on race prejudice, but on illiteracy. The remedy proposed is for the States interested to attach such restrictions to the right of suffrage as will exclude the illiterate and irresponsible. There is no doubt about this being the right principle. Here in the North, also such restrictions would be very beneficial. It is an anomaly anywhere that an ignorant and senseless man should be allowed by his vote to neutralize the vote of the well-informed and intelligent man. Beside which, the danger to the commonwealth is increased by the ease with which the political manager can by sophistry or direct bribery control an election through the ignorant and venal classes. The suggestion of the Alabama journalist is worthy of adoption, not only in the South, but throughout the Union.

The English Parliament is Still Wrestling with the liquor question. An enormous demonstration took place on June 7, as a protest against compensating liquor-dealers whose licenses might be withdrawn. There are districts in which there are more saloons in proportion to population than even persons opposed to the temperance movement, consider necessary. It is admitted that some of these must be closed and the government has stirred up a hornet's nest by proposing to compensate them. Mr. Gladstone strongly protested against the proposal. He said that it really meant the endowment of a gigantic interest at the expense of the public purse. It would entirely paralyze all hope of effecting a reduction in the number of saloons without ruinous cost to the country. There would be a more eager effort to acquire that description of property with the confidence that any loss there might come to it through restrictive legislation would fall upon the national treasury.

The War Estimates of European Powers Give no indication of any tendency toward disarmament. June 13 the appropriations for the army of Austria-Hungary were introduced and Marshal Baron Bauer, Minister of War for the whole monarchy, stated that the peace of Europe was not secure, and that therefore a considerable increase in the army was necessary. The cost of such increase would amount to from $36,000,000 to $45,000,000. He said he was not yet able to state definitely the exact cost of the desired increase. This indicates ominous clouds in the Balkan provinces which have long been that storm-quarter of Europe. These provinces are jealously watched by Russia and Austria, and constant intrigues are in operation for increasing the influence of one or other of these Powers. The recent trial of Major Panitza shows that Russian influence is gaining, as he has throughout the troubles of the past few years made himself conspicuous in resisting Russian dictation.

A Graceful Compliment to Bismarck was Paid by his successor, Gen. Caprivi, in the course of his speech on the military appropriations the other day. Referring to the proposed increase of the amount needed, he said, that he was simply carrying out the plans formed by the retired statesman. He had not presumed to change them. The withdrawal of Prince Bismarck had left affairs, from their nature, less secure than when his fascinating personality still figured before the world. A thousand things which were in themselves unchanged now appeared with notes of interrogation instead of points of exclamation. "I quite understand," he added, "that you should wish that things had happened otherwise or that Prince Bismarck should return. It was inevitable sooner or later. We still find the simplest duties difficult because his weight does not fall into the scales. I count in the first place upon a patriotic understanding on all sides. Let us wait another year. Then, if necessary, I shall be prepared to combat all conflicting elements here. But to-day I still face the fray with some anxiety."

BRIEF NOTES.

A number of students from Chicago Seminary have commenced Evangelistic work at Lyman and Earling, on the Sioux Reservation in South Dakota.

The Rev. Henry Marden, the devoted missionary of the American Board in Central Turkey is dead. He was on his way home for a brief rest and was taken ill, and died at Athens.

The new Episcopal diocese of Western Missouri has been organized at Kansas City, Mo. The Rev. E. R. Atwell, rector of Trinity Church at Toledo, O., was elected Bishop. Kansas City is the see city.

The report that Count Campello has returned to the Romish Church and has made a humiliating recantation, is authoritatively contradicted. The contradiction comes from the Count himself and his associates in Evangelistic work.

The Universities Mission to Central Africa employs seventy Europeans at four principal centres in Africa and on Lake Nyassa, where a church steamer is maintained. Bishop Smithers is the leader of this mission, which extends over 25,000 square miles.

A Santee Sioux Indian, Charles Alexander Eastman, or in his own tongue, Tawakanhdia, has just been graduated from the Medical School of the University of Boston. He is the son of a chief and a half-breed woman of great beauty, and was born on the Sioux Reservation in Minnesota.

At a recent communion service of the Presbyterian Church at Kamiah, Idaho, twenty-one Nez Perces Indians made a profession of faith and were received into the church. These raise the roll of membership to two hundred and ninety, all of whom, with their pastor, belong to the Nez Perces tribe.

The Fourteenth Summer School of Philosophy, will be held at Avon-by-the-Sea, N. J., August 6-13. Among the speakers are President Reed, of Dickinson College, Professor George Macloskie, of Princeton, Professor Jesse B. Thomas, of Newton Theological Seminary, and Dr. Thomas Scott Bacon, of Maryland.

Rev. Oren D. Thompson of Detroit, died in that city on June 4, aged eighty-four years. He was one of the pioneers of Michigan, and his long life was filled with active labors as a preacher and organizer of Churches and Sunday-schools. He was an active member of the Christian Commission in the war.

Miss Elaine Goodale, the poetess, who is superintendent of Indian schools in Dakota, will live principally in a wagon this summer. She has been supplied by General Morgan, Commissioner of the Indian affairs, with a covered wagon and a pair of horses to travel from school to school through Dakota.

Miss Leilla Bull, a former member of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pittsfield, Mass., has been a missionary in Osaka, Japan, for nearly two years. She reports that the temperance society organized there among the women by Mrs. Leavitt now numbers 200 women and that all the officers, except the president, are Japanese.

Dr. Talmage preached on June 6, at Mott Haven, N. Y., at the ordination of his nephew, Rev. G. Edwin Talmage, as pastor of the Reformed Church. Two other ministers of the family also took part in the interesting service. They were the young pastor's father and elder brother. The former is the Rev. John Talmage, D.D., the eminent missionary, who has labored for many years at Amoy, China; and the latter the Rev. David Talmage, who delivered the charge.

Mr. E. P. Telford's service in Seventeenth Street M. E. Church, New York, were largely attended last week in spite of the intense heat of the weather. There were manifest tokens of the Divine blessing in some very interesting conversions. On Sunday, June 8, eleven were brought to a knowledge of Christ at one service. Mr. Telford now leaves the revival in good shape to be continued by Mr. Keates and his friends. During their stay in New York, Mr. and Mrs. Telford were the guests of the pastor of the church, and made many warm friends.

THE BELIEVER'S CREDENTIALS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world." John 17 : 18.

A Fact the Disciples Believed—Another Fact Based Upon It—I. Christ's Own Commission—Involved Subjection to the Father—The Quitting of His Rest—Why the Second Advent is Delayed—Affinity with Men—Abiding in Humiliation—Unreserved Dedication—II. Why Christ was Sent—With One Design—To Teach—To Live—To Save Men—The Believer's Work Indispensable—III. How Christ Came—With Authority—With Determination—IV. How He Behaved—Constant Service—A Grandmother's China—Practical Words.

HERE is a great fact mentioned, namely, that the Father sent the Son into the world. In this our Lord's disciples had believed. Jesus says Himself, "They have believed that thou didst send me." It is one of the first essentials of saving faith to believe in Christ as the Sent One of God. They had proved, in their own experience, that Jesus was sent of God; for they had found Him to be sent to them. Our Lord based upon that fact another. He says to His Father, "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world." As surely as Christ was sent into the world by the Father, so surely are the saints sent into the world by Christ. Note well, that I say "the saints;" I mean not the apostles only, but all the saints. Beyond question, our great Intercessor pleaded for all those whom the Father gave to Him; and hence it is of all these that he speaks in the words of our text. He says to them all, without exception, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you."

This is no trifle, but a very solemn business. To our Lord it was a special matter of prayer. It is here in that prayer which always seems to me the core of the whole Bible. Our Lord pleads not only about our being saved, but about our being sent. There is something here which deserves our deepest thought.

Our Lord was evidently most careful as to our commission, which he bases upon His own commission, and declares to be as certain and real as His own sending by the Father. He so values this, that He prays, "Father, keep them," and "Father, sanctify them." May those two prayers be heard for us, and then we shall stand with our loins girt, our shoes on our feet, our lamps trimmed, and our lights burning, ready to go forth at the command of the Most High to the very ends of the earth. Our mission by Jesus grows out of His mission by the Father, and we may learn much about it by considering how the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

Christ's Commission.

I. I would open up this subject by asking you, first, to consider what our Lord's being sent involved to Himself; for, to a large extent, there will be a parallel between His being sent and ours. The parallel is drawn by way of quality, not of equality. Christ's commission is on a higher scale than ours; for He was sent to be a propitiation and covenant-head, and so came into positions which it would be presumption for us to dream of occupying. Still, there is a likeness, though it be only that of a drop to the sea.

Our Lord's mission involved complete subjection to the Father's will. He said, "My Father is greater than I:" this did not relate to His essential nature and dignity as God, but to the position which he took up in reference to the Father when He was sent to be our Saviour. He that sendeth is greater than He that is sent: the Saviour took up that subordinate position that He might do the Father's will. From that time forth, so long as He remained under His commission, He did not speak His own words, nor do His own deeds; but He listened to the Father's will, and what the Father said to Him He both spoke and did. That is exactly where you and I have to place ourselves now, deliberately and unreservedly. If we are ambitious, and our ambition is guided by wisdom, it will take us down to that basin and the towel, and we shall be willing to wash the disciples' feet, to show that we are sent by our condescending

Lord. We shall henceforth have no respect unto our own dignity or interest, but shall lay ourselves out to serve Him to whom we belong. Whatsoever He saith unto us we shall aim to do. Although we are sons of God, yet now we are also servants; and we would not do our own will, but the will of Him that sent us.

What He Left.

This meant for our Lord the quitting of His rest. He reigned in heaven, all angels paid Him homage; but when the Father sent Him, He left His high abode. He was laid in the manger, for there was no room for Him in the inn. Where the horned oxen fed, there must the holy child be cradled. The royalties of heaven are left behind; the rest which He enjoyed in the bosom of the Father must be renounced for toil, and hunger, and thirst, and weariness, and the death of the cross. Dear friends, you may serve the Lord, and yet be as happy as your Lord was; but if Jesus has sent you into the world you are not to seek ease or comfort; you are not even to make your own spiritual comfort the first object of your thought. Henceforth you are to consider nothing but how you can answer the design of Him who sent you.

When sent of God, the Saviour also had to forego even heaven itself. He was here on earth the God-man, the Mediator, and He did not return to the splendor of His Father's court till he could say, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do; and now, O Father, glorify thou me." We must not sigh for heaven while so much is to be done on earth. The rest of glory will come soon; but just now we have to do with the work of grace. Let us stick to our work here below, and do it thoroughly well, for our Lord has gone above, and is preparing a place for us.

Why Does not Our Lord Come

at once in his glory? Why do we not see the millennial reign begin? It is because of the long-suffering of God: He waits and puts off the closing scene, because He is "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. He keeps back even the glorious advent to give men space for salvation. The Bridegroom postpones His marriage day that men may be brought to Him by the divine longsuffering. If Jesus can do this, surely we may well wait out of compassion to our fellow-men. Even our hope of being forever with the Lord may wait a while.

The words of the text are, "As thou hast sent me into the world"; and this implies affinity with men. Our Lord was not sent to the edge of the world to look over the fence, and converse hopefully from a distance; but He was sent right into the world. He took on Him human nature, and became bone of our bone. We read, "Then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him." He was a man among men. In this way Jesus has sent you, my brethren, into families, into offices, into establishments, into places where you labor for daily bread, amongst a company of ungodly men. Do not cry out because you have thus to mingle with them.

A Pattern of Humiliation.

He was sent into the world, and this involved abiding in humiliation. "The world knew Him not": therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not. You are not sent into the world, to be honored and pampered; nor even to receive your righteous due. Expect to be misunderstood, misrepresented, belied, ridiculed, and so forth; for so was the Sent of the Father. You are to look for evil treatment; for as the Father sent His Son into a world which was sure to treat Him ill, so has He sent you into the same world, which will treat you in the same manner if you are like your Lord.

In a word, your being sent of Christ involves unreserved dedication to His work. When Christ came into the world, He did nothing but what His Father sent Him to do. Now, as the Father sent Jesus, so has Jesus sent you, to be henceforth by occupation a Christian. You are to be consecrated wholly and alone to the one object for which Christ has set you apart. There may be other lawful objects; but these you render subsidiary to the one object of your life. Henceforth you belong to Christ, body, soul, and spirit—from the morning light to the evening shade and through the night-watches. Let your whole being be the Lord's; for "ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price." "This is a high standard," says one. My brethren it is none too high; and it is sad that any should think it so. God help you to know that you are sent, and clearly to perceive what your mission involves. We, too, are missioned from above; we, too, are to have a hand in the saving of the world.

II. Secondly, having thus shown you the parallel so far, I now ask you to consider

Why Our Lord was Sent into the world. Our Lord came here with one design. Christ was not sent to teach a correct system of philosophy. He was not Plato, or Jesus; not a sage, but a Saviour. He could have solved the problems of the universe; but He did not even allude to them. He was not an Aristotelian, ruling the world of human thought; although He could have done so easily had He chosen. Blessed be His name, He came to save from sin; and this no Plato or Aristotle could have done. All the sages and philosophers put together are not worth as much as the little finger of a Christ. Christ entered into no rivalry with the academy; He came on a very different errand. He could have anticipated all that we have slowly learned, and saved the world the long processes of experiment and observation; but this was not the object of His mission.

Let us inquire what was Christ's work upon earth. It was, first, to teach. Wherever I went He was an instructor of the ignorant. He preached of the kingdom, and of faith, and grace. We are to teach. "I do not know anything," says one. Then do not tell it; but first go to the Lord and something; and as soon as you know the A B C of the Gospel, go and teach somebody that A B C. Learn first; but when you have learned, then let others learn from you. That is what Jesus did: be teaching the Gospel everywhere.

Ask Him to Teach You

Forget not that He lived, and His living was teaching. His actions were so many heads of His life-sermon. His every movement was instructive. He went about doing good. May your life tally with your teaching; and may the best part of your discourse. The most solid and most emphatic teaching that comes from you should be what you do rather than what you say. Christ has sent you into the world for that end.

"Ah!" say you, "our Lord might very well give Himself up to His work; for if He had done so, the whole world must have perished. Listen! Your work also is indispensable. His is the work of Christ to be made effectual among the sons of men for their salvation? Must they not hear it, that they may believe it? How shall they hear without a preacher? I venture to say that as the salvation of men depended on Christ, so, in another sense, the salvation of men at the hour depends upon the Church of God. If believers do not go and preach Christ, who will? If you that love Him do not commend Him, who will?"

III. This leads me a little further, and I now invite you to consider for this will show us how we ought to go forward when we are sent. Our Lord came with authority. The Lord God had sent Him, and He had the Father at His back. Be sure that, when Jesus sends you, you are invested with authority, and they that despise you do it at their peril. Your blunders and mistakes are not authorized; but so far as you speak His Word with a desire for His glory, he that receives you receives Christ, even as our Lord said, "He that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me." God is with you, be not afraid; your Lord will not let your words fall to the ground.

How Our Lord Came;

Our Lord came with ability, too. What is His ability consist in? Mainly in this—"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me." This is also where your sufficiency be found; and you can have as much pleasure of it. You cannot get every faculty of the brain, but you can have every influence of the Spirit. It may be, you cannot reach the best form of education or of utterance, but these things are not vital: God can speak with a stammering tongue, even as in the case of Balaam. You shall do the Lord's work, and I, if you are anointed of the Holy Ghost. The Lord came with abiding resolve to go through with His mission to the end. He never went of going back. He steadfastly set His face to Jerusalem. He pressed through through death, to accomplish our redemption. In these days we shall not do much, but we have a desperate determination to persevere in the teeth of difficulties. Those who back will go back. Remember how Gideon claimed throughout the host, that if any man was a faint-hearted he might go home; so proclaim to-day: go home if you are weary. "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the word!" Woe is unto you if you do not have the children, or speak to individuals, or to the masses, or in some way fulfil your mission! Bear with me, while I bid you consider sent One. Oh, that we may learn from Him how to fulfil our own mission! Our Lord was early. While He was yet a youth, he said, "I am not that I must be about my Father's house." As soon as ever a man is converted, he should inquire, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Next, our Lord waited very patiently. He was forty years old before He preached openly. He did not know all that He did in the workshop of the carpenter. Is it not possible that He supported his widowed mother by his hand-labor? We know; but of this we are sure, that it is the duty of many young men to look after their mothers first. It is the duty of all to "show piety to the world." Many Christian women will have all if they have carried out home duties. There is a holy woman upon whose grave they have this epitaph, "She made home happy." What Jesus did for the first thirty years of His life. He was doing the Father's will when a young man at home. Though He did not teach, yet while He was working and learning, was carrying out the purpose for which He was sent.

How Our Lord Behaved

Baptised of John.

At the time came for Him to commence His public service, He sought proper entrance into it. He did not blunder into God's service by a rush and a leap; but He went to John the Baptist, and to be publicly recognized as Messiah. I like our young friends, when at their time has come for public service, to go in right style and due order, carrying the Lord's mind in the Lord's way. When Jesus was being passed, see how He labored at His Father's will. He was always doing the Father's will. He kept all the day, and every day, and every-where with everybody. Some Christian people render occasional service. They are good at a Convention. They save up their services for meetings. At a religious gathering they are in fine form; but they are not everywhere. The kind of person the Church needs is the maid-of-all-work, the worker who is in his hand to anything which Providence requires, and is glad to do so, however humble the work may be. My venerated grandmother had

A Set of Choice China,

I believe, is, part of it, in existence now. Does it exist now? It has seen little service, only came out on high-days and holidays once in six months, when ministers and friends came to tea. It was a very nice set of china; too good for children to break. Christians are like that fine old ware: it is not to be used too often. They are good for every day. They do not teach the servants, and try to win the poor people of their own neighborhood to Christ; but they wait till a Conference. Oh, you fine bits of old china, I know you! Don't fear. I am going to break you. Yet I would somewhat trouble you by the remark that in the case of such ware as you are, more pieces get broken in the cupboard than on the table.

Notice about our Lord's service, that His prayers always kept pace with His work. This is where most of us fail. When our Lord had a long day's work, we find Him taking a long night's prayer. "I have so much to do," says one, "that I could not be long in prayer." That is putting the case the wrong way upward. When you have most to do, you have most need to pray; and unless you keep up the proportion, your offering will fail in quality.

Practical Lessons.

I would leave with you four words. We are sent; therefore, whenever we try to press Christ upon men we are not guilty of intrusion. We have sometimes known strangers asked in this place about their souls; by certain of our friends, and they have grown angry at such a question. This is very silly of them, is it not? But I hope the friend who meets with an angry answer will not be at all hurt. You are not intrusive; though the angry person says you are. You are sent, and where Jesus sends you you have a right to go. Go on without fear: your commission is your warrant: if Jesus has sent you, you have a right to speak even to princes and kings.

Next, we are sent; therefore, we dare not run away. If Jesus bids us go forward, we must not retreat. If what we have preached and taught be of God, if we are ridiculed for it let us take no notice, but steam ahead. Put more coals in the furnace, get the steam up, and go faster than ever in the same course.

Next, we are sent; therefore, we are sure to be helped. Our King never sends a servant on an errand at his own charges. Our own power fails us, but He never allows His power to fail us when engaged in His service. Those who are sent shall be sustained.

The Accounting.

But, if we are sent, remember lastly, we have to give in an account. Our Lord does not call for the time-sheet every night; but a time-sheet is kept all the same, and there will be a day for passing in the checks, and we shall have to answer for what we have done. You will have to render in your account, and may God grant you may not have to make a lamentable return in this fashion—"On such a day so much wood, and such a day so much hay, and on such a day so much stubble." You know what I mean: so much time spent in planning frivolous amusements for the people, so much talent expended in teaching what is not the gospel, so much zeal consumed upon matters which do not concern eternal things, all this will burn. Beloved, do your Master's work, win souls, preach Christ, expound your Bibles, pray men to be reconciled to God, plead with men to come to Christ. This kind of work will stand the fire; and when the last great day shall dawn, this will remain to glory and honor. God bless you, brethren, for Christ's sake!

AN ORDINATION UNDER A LAMP-POST.

MANY of our readers have listened with delight to that eminently successful evangelist Major D. W. Whittle, but probably few have heard the story of his ordination. Here it is in his own quaint words, as he told it recently to a group of friends:

"I have been sixteen years now doing the work of an evangelist; led into it by that bundle of electricity and steam and dynamite combined, D. L. Moody. Years ago he crossed my path. God works in a mysterious way, and brings us into line in order to make use of us. In 1863 I was in Chicago, home on a brief furlough with a wound received at Vicksburg. There was a great demonstration at that time, and that dear eloquent man of God, Bishop Simpson, was to give an address, stirring up the people in connection with the work of the Christian Commission. I was brought on to the platform, and I never felt so foolish in my life as in being there. Dear friends in Chicago received me kindly because of the patriotism and love of the soldiers they felt. Mr. Moody was in the audience, and as I stood on the platform, he rose to his feet, and waved his hat, with that face of his all lit up. I told him afterwards how foolish I felt, and he said to me, "Whittle, I took you into my heart that night, and you have never been out of it since." I thought I was amply rewarded for being made a fool of. Well, he followed me right along, and one night, in the city of Chicago, I received my ordination, and Mr. Moody was the Bishop who ordained me. We stood under a lamp-post as we were walking home. We were talking about the work, and what ought to be done, and what could be done. In that earnest, simple, direct way of his, he pulled out his Bible, and put his finger on II. Timothy 4: 1, 2, and said, "See here, Whittle, this is what God wants us to do—'Preach the Word.'" That went down into my soul and I have never got rid of it."

A CHINESE WEDDING.

AN American lady missionary in China sends to the Missionary Link an interesting description of the marriage of two of the converts of the mission. It appears that in consideration of the social prejudices of the two families, the Chinese wedding customs were retained, though the ceremony was Christian. In the course of her narrative she says:

After four hours had been spent in arraying the bride, we were permitted to see her, and a marvelous spectacle truly, was the figure seated motionless, in the centre of a room adjoining the mission-hall. Gorgeously elaborate was her array from head to foot: the former crowned with a helmet-like erection, of a material resembling turquoise-enamel, wrought into the finest filagree-work, from which projected glittering artificial beetles and butterflies, and other quaint, rich ornaments, the whole surmounted by three large round tufts of crimson silk, arranged tiarawise. From the brim of this head-gear, fell all around, strings of pearl and ruby beads, about half a yard in length. Just visible through these at the back, were broad loops of jet-black hair, stiff and solid-looking as polished ebony, and decorated with artificial pink roses. The bride's principal vestment, was a long tunic whose foundation-fabric of crimson satin was scarcely discernible amidst its embroidery of gold: a corner turned back, lined with emerald satin, revealed an underskirt, panelled in brilliant red and blue silk, this also profusely trimmed with gold embroidery. A belt of scarlet satin studded with tablets of white cornelian, crossed the waist behind. From the front edge of her head-dress, a red silk veil fell almost to the ground, adding much to her appearance. The whole costume was, I learned, hired for the day.

Into some aperture of head-gear and veil, I contrived to insert the sympathizing inquiry, "Are you very tired?" and caught a faintly whispered reply, Veh sadoo (not tired), as I was called off with the admonition that the damsel must neither speak, nor be spoken to.

"The bridegroom entered, attended by his friends, he and they alike dressed in deep purple satin gowns, and hats of velvet or fur, the crowns covered with scarlet fringe, and surmounted with a crystal and gilt ball. Then appeared his brilliant, if not very graceful bride, half led and half supported by two motherly Chinese women, in every day dress, save for a broad bordering of gold-garnished azure satin on their large hanging sleeves. A simple marriage service from a Chinese version of the English prayer-book, was read by a missionary who has befriended the bridegroom from childhood and trained him as a helper in mission-work. Then a joyously sung hymn concluded the ceremony. Afterward the bridegroom, with his native friends, partook of dinner, the women in a separate room, while the heroine of the day was conveyed to some retreat where the foreign lady visitors were privileged to see her partake of some refreshment, the red veil being now lifted from a very calm and contented countenance. Thankful she must have been for this merciful violation of native etiquette, which would have prohibited her tasting food till the end of the day.

Miss De Broen of the Belleville Mission. (See page 388.)

Missionaries and Converts of the Hill Tribes of Central India.

"Finally the bridal pair, closely encased in sedan-chairs, adjourned to the home prepared by the husband hard by in the native city, where, as we have good reason to believe, a happy and useful life awaits them."

THE HILL TRIBES OF INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

Considerable discussion has been aroused as to the possibility of evangelizing the Gonds, Korkoos and other tribes of Central India, and as to the value of the work done by the Rev. Albert Norton and other American Missionaries who have been laboring for several years among them, by the criticisms of Sir Lepel Griffin, recently published. Two photographs have now come from India that answer those criticisms. The first is a group of natives as they were when Mr. Norton and his devoted wife arrived there. The natives were gaunt, almost naked,—the children entirely so—and ferocious and cruel of expression. The second, from which our illustration is taken, represents a number of the same people in company with their beloved teachers, after they had come under the ennobling and civilizing influences of the religion of Christ.

Mr. and Mrs. Norton are now leaving this sphere of labor, after giving to it the best years of their lives. But they have in their mission-house two missionaries who have volunteered to take their places and carry on the work. These latter have received a suitable theological preparation for the work in the institution established and conducted by Mrs. M. Baxter, whose articles on the Sunday School Lessons appear from week to week in this journal. On their arrival at Bithson, a lonely place on the hills about eighteen miles from Ellertysar, they were welcomed by Mrs. Norton and her children, and began at once to study the language, sharing the entire work of the house, and living in the simplest way. The little privations and self-denials which the remoteness of the place imposes upon them, seem easy to them while they have the joy of living in the midst of natives who are still sitting in the dark shadows of heathen superstition and hopelessness, but are willing to listen to Gospel teaching. They rejoice in the privilege of going down from the hill, where the Mission premises stand, into the valleys, and seeing the natives coming out of their miserable huts, bringing a mat for the missionaries to sit down upon, and listening attentively and thankfully to the Gospel message, translated by the eldest of Mr. Norton's boys, and to the hymns sung to them in their native language.

Col. Dalton, an official under the British government in that district says: "The mission stations of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, in the central provinces of Jubbulpore and Khandwa should be made bases from which aggressive evangelistic work should be pushed among the Gonds, Korkoos, Bhils, and other hill-tribes of the central provinces. Something has already been accomplished among these aboriginal races, but more missionaries of an aggressive stamp are sadly needed. If the same effort be put forth, there is no reason why we may not see tens of thousands from the Gonds, Korkoos, and Bhils of Central India coming over to Christianity, as has been the case among the Karens and Burnam and the Kols and Santhals of Bengal."

MR. STANLEY'S BIBLE.

THE tendency to hold the Bible in light esteem which is so prevalent in the present day, is apt to discourage young people from studying it. So many who do study it, do so in a critical, supercilious spirit, under the guidance of teachers whose chief aim appears to be to diminish its authority, that it is well to have it made known how it is regarded by men of eminence, who are held in high respect for their achievements in the cause of science and humanity. An incident in point was related a few days ago respecting Mr. H. M. Stanley, whose recent achievement in the rescue of Emin Pasha, places him in the forefront of the distinguished men of our time. A personal friend of the explorer says: "I was sitting a few days ago next to Mr. Stanley, the great African traveller, and in conversation he said to me, 'Just before I started for Africa Sir William Mackinnon said to me, 'Now I want to give you something, but I should like you to choose for yourself. I shall have the utmost pleasure in presenting you with anything you like. Never mind the expense. Just say what you would like.' I replied, said the traveller, 'Give me a Bible.' The desired gift was soon in my possession, just the Bible I wanted. And during my absence in Africa I have read that Bible through three times.'"

THE STOLEN FLOWERS.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for June 29: "If thy whole body, therefore, be full of light, having no part dark," etc. (Luke 11:36).

"I wish I had some flowers," said Philip Hunt. "My sister is to be taken away to the ship to-night. She is going to Europe to see if that will do her any good. She is dreadfully ill; I don't believe I shall ever see her again. I wish I could take her some flowers when I go to say good-bye. She had one poor little rose-bud when I was there yesterday. It was crushed and, soiled but she seemed to think it the most precious thing in the world. Reminded her of her country I guess. I'd buy some, but I haven't left."

"Nor I," said Robert Lane, to whom he was speaking. "I would lend it you if you give it you for that matter. You have been a good friend to me with my lessons. I'll give you a good turn. Let us go and look at our garden. Perhaps there is a rose-bud or two there now. Perhaps there is a rose-bud or two there now. Perhaps there is a rose-bud or two there now."

"No," said Philip, "I've looked at the garden. They will be a week longer yet."

"Oh, come along," said Robert, "I'll show you what the rain and sun may have done this morning."

The two boys went out of the big garden which the conversation took place, around the building to the back where the boarders had a little garden of their own which Mr. Prior, the principal, encouraged them to cultivate. Philip was lame, but his bright eager face indicating great intelligence and quickness in acquiring knowledge made up for his years. It was clouded over now as he walked along on his crutches beside his brother. It was a futile visit. As Philip had said there was not a single flower out yet. He walked on disappointed and depressed. They came to the south side of the garden. There Mr. Prior's garden was, and it looked longingly at the two rose-bushes with buds just opening in all their beauty.

"Say," said Robert, "let us go to the garden and ask him to give you a few. I'll show you what the rain and sun may have done this morning."

"No use," said Philip disconsolately. "I've gone to the teacher's convention; and he drove off in his buggy. He won't be back Monday; I heard him tell the stable-boy."

The boys stood and look at the coveted roses—always a dangerous practice when temptation—and the more they looked the more beautiful and desirable they seemed to be. It was a very strong temptation, for nothing selfish in it. Philip thought how his sister's eyes would brighten if she saw how her stilling berth on the ship would be fumed by their fragrance. And Robert thought of the pleasure it would give his church to them to give to this loved sister of his a very potent temptation; too potent for his nature.

"I can't stand it," said Robert, "I'll go and gather some of those buds, anyhow. You come, your crutches will make such a noise. They will get them and you can take them right to your sister."

Philip protested, against his taking a protests were enfeebled by the presence of his sister. Both boys knew roses did not belong to them, in fact, there was an explicit prohibition against their taking any from Mr. Prior's garden. Still, it was so good and so urgent, and Mr. Prior was not at home, or they had asked permission. There were many rose-buds too, more than Mr. Prior or his daughter could pick. There would be many more to-morrow. Robert was sure they could be helped in helping themselves to begin to think so, too. In a moment a handful of the buds were plucked and a little later they were carrying them to his sister's room to board the steamer.

When the summons that reached the following Monday morning did not need to be told the story of the inquisition. Neither had they been at ease about the flow-ers. The conscience has the habit of coming out more emphatically after a time than before it. Robert had been in his mind not to do anything again, and Philip was re-hat his friend should have been used for his sake. The thing, however, could not be made to make a voluntary confession to invite punishment, so they agreed to say nothing about it. But now they were evidently called to account.

"Sorry to hear," said Mr. Prior, "the two boys stood before him, you have broken one of the rules of the school. Did you know you were forbidden to pick flowers from the garden?"

Robert stepped forward, feeling it his duty to take offence on his own shoulders: but Mr. Prior put his hand on Robert's shoulder and turned him to the front. "Did you know it?" he asked in a more peremptory tone. "My daughter told me you take the flowers and I want to know you knew at the time you were doing so."

"Sir; I knew it was forbidden, but—"

"Did you know too, Hunt?"

"Sir."

"You knew that you were not only breaking the rules, but you were stealing. Now let me tell you it could have led two boys of your standing to a crime. That is the word for it. What the law calls it. There are men in prison now for just that offence."

Mr. Prior kept his hand on Robert's shoulder as the question was addressed to him. He was a transgressor, and Philip was a cripple, he hoped he might spare on that account. He told the whole story. Mr. Prior had some sympathy in maintaining the severity of his face, but his daughter's eyes filled with tears as she saw her father. She would have interceded for the boys, but Mr. Prior waved her aside.

"You still think you were justified in taking the flowers?" he asked.

"Sir, I did at the time, but things look different now," Robert said.

"What do you say, Hunt?"

"We had not taken them now, sir; but you would let Lane off; it was my fault."

"I put me in a painful position, you boys," Mr. Prior said. "I cannot let either of you off without punishing you. I should fail in my duty if I did. But I want you to see why I do it. I want you to learn an important lesson, and the only way to impress it upon you. You had to face your conscience before you took the flowers. It told you it was wrong to take them and you had to talk it over. You had to let the light of God give you to show you the difference between right and wrong. Now, no man can resist temptation who does that. If you do wrong, knowing it to be wrong, that is another matter. Your danger is in doing wrong under the idea that in the circumstances it is right. You must keep your guiding light always burning. The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, lighted from His own ineffable light. If you put it out, or cover it temporarily by such arguments as you used, you will be in darkness, and fall into mischief and ruin. You must 'Look to it,' as Christ taught, 'that the light which is in you be not darkness.'

The Inquisition About the Flowers.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser,

Author of The Only Way Out, Epochs of a Life, etc.
THE BITTER-SWEET OF MEMORY.

"YOUR mail is lighter than usual this morning, Mr. Heritage. You'll have to be content with but one letter. No journals at all this time."

"Ah, well, I shall not complain. Perhaps the quality will make up for the lack in the quantity. Sometimes a single letter is of more value than a whole armful of other mail matter."

"Especially if it contains a cheque, eh?"

"That isn't likely to be the case this morning."

"Ha! ha! You mean cheques don't come in so rapidly these hard times. Well, one doesn't find 'em rolling up hill, that's a fact—or down either, for that matter."

"Business will look up by-and-by, I hope."

The first speaker engaged in the foregoing dialogue, was the mail carrier on his daily morning route, his lithe, agile figure, clad in the indispensable blue-gray suit which has become a part of the American postman's personality. His interlocutor was Mr. Robert Heritage, who sat before his writing-table at the open window of his library; for it was May and the weather was warm and balmy. The apartment was on the ground floor, and so the carrier, as was his wont, tossed Mr. Heritage's mail into the window upon the desk, and then, after a minute's hurried exchange of remarks, passed on.

The house in which Mr. Heritage had established himself as a lodger was a private residence on a quiet street of Basseterre, a town of about sixty thousand inhabitants, according to the latest census. However, the figure was placed considerably higher by the ambitious citizens of the flourishing place, who were anxious for its business prospects and reputation. Heritage himself took a laudable pride in the enterprise of the city, in which he had now been a resident for several years.

His library was a well-appointed room; the walls were lined on two sides with tall cases whose shelves were filled with books, which were of the highest literary excellence and scientific value. Upon the other two walls hung several choice engravings, with Holman Hunt's "The Awakened Conscience" and "The Light of the World," both of which perhaps gave some clue to the moral and spiritual sentiments of their owner. On the casement of an open window to the left, placed in such a position that the combined fragrance would be wafted to him by the western breeze, were blooming hyacinths, heliotropes, and several kinds of geraniums; while a pot of delicately hued primroses stood as an ornament on one corner of his writing-desk.

The other appurtenances of the room were such as bespoke the man of taste and the scholar. An open secretary, delicately curved and solidly built, stood at his left. Several reference books, an Oxford Bible, some sheets of manuscript, a sealed letter or two, and scrawls of various kinds lay upon the table, and in the pigeon-holes and small drawers were crowded such belongings as appertain to the needs of the student.

But Heritage's thoughts were not at this moment upon his books and flowers, for he was intent on learning the contents of the letter that he had just received. His paper-knife slipped deftly under the flap of the envelope and cut it open. A pleased smile played over his mustached lip as he glanced at the enclosure, and when he had read it through, his well-chiselled features were radiant, making him look actually handsome.

It was a gratifying epistle on several grounds, but chiefly because it recalled pleasant memories, and proved that he was not forgotten by some old friends, whose esteem was well worth having. It came from Prof. Detwold, of Mount Morril University. That was Heritage's Alma Mater, and Detwold had been his college friend and fellow-student. He now wrote at the suggestion of the members of the Literary Athenæum to ask Mr. Heritage to deliver an address to them at their approaching reunion, which would be held during Commencement week. "Do come," wrote the Professor, "it will oblige me and will be a pleasure to us all."

"Of course, I'll oblige you, my dear chum," said Heritage, apostrophizing the writer, "I could not resist such an appeal from an old friend. What comrades and confidants we used to be in those 'halcyon days' of our college life! I wonder whether Detwold remembers the evening we burt our Lyncurgus, when the Sophomores made a raid upon us, or the time when the old President caught him in the act of rolling a cannon-ball through the halls of the old dormitory. Ha! ha! ha! Those were prime days."

"But about that address," he said, arousing himself with an effort from these pleasant memories. "I shall have no time to prepare anything new, and probably I should acquit myself better with something I have on hand and have used already. My lecture on 'Scholastic Pretenders' would answer the purpose, I should think. It seemed to suit the Teachers' Institute when I delivered it there. With a little revising it would do for the Athenæum."

So he wrote to his friend promising to come, and as he sealed his letter, he began to enjoy in anticipation the pleasure of meeting old acquaintances of his college days. Smiles flitted over his face as one and another familiar visage was recalled by his memory; but suddenly his expression changed, and a frown knitted his brow. Apparently memory had recalled one figure which had less agreeable associations. "I wonder if she will be there," he muttered between his set teeth. "I declare I would not go if I thought I should meet her. I expect it would be as painful for her as for me. The dead past is so clumsy at burying its dead, and we don't realize it until it is too late. Well, she is little likely to go. I will take the risk."

It had been five years since the fine June day when the celebrated Mount Morrill University had granted Robert Heritage a diploma, with the degree of B. A. Since that event he had not been idle, but had carried on certain literary and scientific lines of study, on account of which, his alma mater had, two years after his graduation, conferred upon him an A. M. He was now the Principal of the High School in the city of Basserine; a position he had held for nearly five years. He had been frequently urged to take the superintendency of the city schools, but had declined, fearing that additional burdens and responsibilities would interfere with the extraneous literary studies he was anxious to pursue.

One thing more must be added. There had been a time when he was strongly inclined to enter the ministry, and he had even gone so far as to give special attention to the study of theology; but finally, for various reasons which need not be recounted here, he had abandoned the idea, feeling that teaching was his forte. Yet his study of dogmatics and the allied branches of theology had given him a keen interest in all current doctrinal discussions.

Having mailed his reply to Professor Detwold, he hurried to the "central building," arriving just in time to begin the work of the day.

The school-year in Basserine closed a week earlier than the time of the reunion at which he was to speak; so that there was nothing to interfere with his visit to the old college. The weeks passed rapidly, and at last the morning came when he was to start on his journey. On his way to the depot he stopped at a book store and purchased several works of fiction that had been provoking a good deal of comment in the literary world. He would need something to beguile the weariness of the journey. It was a bright morning in June. The sky was a shining dome of the deepest azure, the sun sparkled in the dew globules on the grass, and the air was vocal with the maternal minstrelsy of many birds.

For a while Heritage sat at the car-window looking out at the landscapes flitting by in quick procession, as the "limited Express" whirled and rumbled on. Now a green, sloping field caught his eye; now a rocky grotto or a quiet dingle flashed into view; a sparrow-hawk poised for a moment in mid-air over a meadow and then swooped down upon the mouse or small bird that it had marked for its prey; at intervals a red-headed woodpecker would wheel off in a tumult of fright from the telegraph pole in which it had chiselled its summer domicile. These observations were interesting to Heritage, who was a lover of nature; but presently he interrupted them by the reflection:

"If I am to get these books read, I must be at them."

Blue pencil in hand he took up one of the volumes, and having examined its binding, title-page, and general make-up with the critical eye of a book-lover, he began its perusal. He had not read many pages before an expression of impatience, if not disgust, crossed his face, marring somewhat its expression of habitual good nature, or bonhomie, as his college friends were wont to express it.

"I don't see how an author can have the patience to write such inane, pointless stuff, such refined nonsense!" he reflected. "The style is smooth and graceful, it is true; in fact, it is too fine, too elaborate for the worthless subject matter. Why, I've read over twenty pages without finding a single thought worth preserving. And then there is scarcely any movement in the tale to relieve its tedium. The author is a literary trifle."

He closed the book with so sharp a concussion that the old German woman opposite looked up with surprise and stopped munching her breakfast of bread and broiled chicken for a few moments. Then he picked up a second volume, and, as in the former case, gave it a critical examination by way of preparation.

"Ah! this is a story with a 'local coloring,'" he thought. "I hope the coloring is something more than mere daubing."

The book opened with a four-page description of some mountain scenery, the author pouring forth a turgid stream of verbiage, adjective upon adjective, detail following hard upon the heels of detail, obsolete, rare, and foreign words crowding thick and fast upon one another, until the landscapes appeared about as clear in outline as the pictures of a boy's cheap magic lantern. Heritage had read, or tried to read, several pages, when his lids began to droop, while the mountains of the author went reeling, and tumbling, and turning somersault, and performing other evolutions before his vacuous gaze; his head gradually lost its poise, and he nodded. He was awakened by the book falling from his hand, and saw a broad grin on the face of the old German woman.

"The story is intolerably dull," he muttered, flinging the volume into his valise beside its equally despised fellow. "The author's self-consciousness spoils it all. Well, I wonder if this one," taking up the third work of fiction, which he had brought with him, "will prove as excellent a soporific as the last. It has certainly made quite a sensation in reading circles. Ah! it deals with certain problems of theology I see, and it is the author's treatment of them that has stirred up the doctors, and the author is a lady, too."

The very first sentence of the new book fixed the attention of the critical reader. He detected at once that the writer had virility of thought, and a serious purpose, all of which prepossessed him in favor of the work, which was indeed one of real literary merit, the author's clear, graceful style and her skilful management of her characters and incidents relieving it of all tedium. And yet it was vastly more than a vapid society novel, as Heritage admitted at once. He scarcely glanced up from the glowing pages as the hours of the forenoon sped.

"A powerfully written story!" was his mental comment, when the train stopped for the noon lunch.

He got off the train, ate his lunch absently, and then hurried back to the book that had so enthralled his attention, reading uninterruptedly until the middle of the afternoon.

"It is a real pleasure to read a story by an author who combines such a rare artistic taste with just as rare a mental grasp, he reflected, closing the book for a few minutes, and looking out at the distant wooded hills. "What a graphic style she has! I scarcely know a modern writer who wields a more facile pen. And yet the book has one serious defect as a contribution to a religious discussion. The author does not settle the questions she raises. She suggests doubts, and her characters abandon their old religious beliefs, but she omits to state the reasons they had for leaving their faith. She generalizes too much there. We cannot judge whether they did right if we do not know what their reasons were. It looks, too, as if she had a bias against orthodox Christianity, and inclines strongly toward the so-called 'liberal' or rationalistic doctrines. Unconsciously perhaps, she is a little unfair, making her orthodox characters narrow, if not bigoted, whereas in real life we find them just as large-orbed, and well-poised, as their opponents. I am afraid the story will disturb the faith of the weak, and that is most unfortunate. It is a pity; I am very sorry."

His eyes were still bent, though vacantly, upon the remote landscapes over which the silvery mists hung like a gauzy mantle.

"Why, shouldn't I—" he stopped short, giving the half-formed thought time to articulate itself in his mind. "Why not write a story myself, on the other side of the theological question—one that would have for its aim the counteracting of this rationalistic teaching? Ah! let me think. I might weave into it that romantic episode of my college days—no, no, that would never do; it might stir bitter memories. I must have no personalities. They are not necessary."

The train steamed on, Heritage's thoughts keeping pace. Presently the prolonged shriek of the locomotive was heard, and the speed of the train gradually slackened, until it came to a full stop at a station, crowded with waiting passengers. Our traveller had now come within about fifty miles of his destination. Always interested in any phase of human nature displayed before him, he looked curiously out of the car-window, watching the selfish struggle of men and women pushing into the coaches. Suddenly he gave a start of surprise, the blood rushed to his face, he looked intently out of the window as if to settle a doubt, and then, with a half-stifled ejaculation, sank back into the seat in evident discomposure.

For a minute or two he sat staring at the front entrance of the coach, as if expecting some one to enter. Presently his eye became riveted upon the face and figure of a tall, lithe girl of the brunette order of beauty, who stood in the doorway glancing with dark keen eyes through the car in search of a vacant seat. A tell-tale flush burned on Heritage's cheeks, he became more flurried than before, and bent his face over his book with the obvious purpose of preventing the young lady recognizing him.

The next few moments were evidently a period of suspense for the young man. The lady was walking down the aisle of the car toward the rear, where he sat, and if she found no vacant seat on her way might take the one recently vacated opposite to him. A stranger judging by the usual proclivities of young men, and knowing nothing of the past relations of the two, would have expected that Heritage would rather court recognition than avoid it, for the newcomer was a girl of attractive appearance, and her physiognomy indicated both intelligence and culture. She had a graceful figure, dark, flashing eyes, and black wavy hair, which was coiled into a knot at the back of her beautiful head. The face was slightly sallow and bore traces of suffering, physical or mental, and there was a nervous tremor perceptible in her movements that implied restlessness and excitability.

She found a seat a few paces away from the young man, and he breathed a sigh of relief. He watched her furtively for a few moments, and then when her attention was occupied with some movement at the front of the car, he took up his valise and moved quietly to a car further in the rear of the train. He had the vexed irritated look of a man unexpectedly confronted with some reminder of past misdoing, yet Heritage was a man of high moral character little likely to have any scandal associated with his past career. No man could have his open, frank, earnest manner whose conscience reproached him with evil deeds.

(To be Continued.)

Rubifoam

A PERFECT LIQUID DENTIFRICE
DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED.

ITS USE INSURES
BEAUTIFUL
CLEAN TEETH.
PUT UP BY
E. W. HOYT
& CO.
LOWELL, MASS.

Price

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP
for CHILDREN TEETHING. SOOTHENS THE GUMS.
REDUCES INFLAMMATION. ALLAYS PAIN.
CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

HOOD'S

COMPOUND EXTRACT

SARSAPARILLA

TRADE MARK

plait, catarrh, rheumatism, etc. Be Hood's Sarsaparilla, which is peculiar Hood's Sarsaparilla sold by druggists for $5. Prepared by C. I. Hood & Co., I.

100 Doses One D

JOHNSON'S LINIMENT

ANODYNE LINIMENT

Unlike any Other
Originated by an Old Family
THINK OF IT.

In use over 40 YEARS in on Dr. J. S. Johnson & Co.—It is sixty y learned of this now celebrated reme mon ills of life—Johnson's Anodyne more than forty years I have used it I say (unasked by you) I regard it one safest remedies that can be found, in external, in all cases it is claimed to O. H. INGALLS, Dea. 2d Baptist Ch.
Should b
Every Mother Anodyne house for Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cuts, B and Pains. Delays may cost a life. R Complaints like magic. Price, 35 cts. 1 ties, $2. Express paid. J. S. Johnson & C

LADIES' BROWN FRENCH DRESSING

Use C BROWN
FRENCH
DRESSING

Awarded high

Phila., 1876; Fr
Berlin, 1877; A
Paris, 1878; N
Melbourne, 1880; Pa

and wherever Paris Medal on Beware of I

P. D. & S. P.

SUPERIOR TO ALL
Send 10 cents for Sample
12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co York.

Better than Tea and Coffee for a

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA

"Once Tried, Always Used"

Ask your Grocer for it, take no

TYPEWRITER

Largest like establishment in the class Second-hand Instruments at 1/2 Unprejudiced advice given on all chines sold on monthly payment.
ment manufactured shipped, private EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Volu to dealers. Illustrated Catalogue TYPEWRITER 70 Broadway
HEADQUARTERS, 144 La Sa St.

SHORTHAND. Private instruction. 1/2
batim reporter. 20 yrs. ex
No failures. Situations guaranteed. 10k lars free. FRANK HARRISON, Ste
229 Broadway, N. Y., or 721 Broad St., New

GIPSY'S IMPRISONMENT.

of the most successful workers of the degraded classes in England is a Gipsy, who is known as Gipsy Smith. He was, in his young days, one of the gipsies, wandering from town to town sleeping in tents pitched by the roadside and making a precarious livelihood of fortune-telling and other less respectable. Since his conversion, the natural gifts which he formerly used in singing and declaiming in the streets, have been used in the service of Christ.

He has the reminiscences on which he has written for his illustrations in preaching, following story of his vicarious imprisonment: "We had reached a country which was frequented by expressmen, and I pitched the tent for the night, I left my brother in it, and went with my brother or two other members of our community to the tavern for a carouse. I was a little worse for liquor when we left to go to the tents; my brother was nearly drunk, but the others, being older and accustomed to heavy potations, were sensible, though they had drunk as much as we. I remembered afterwards that the heavily laden express cart before us was passing it, while the driver was waiting for a few minutes to go into a next day a couple of police officers came to the expressman to the tents, and they found a basket of clothing had been taken from the back of the wagon the night before. I had seen one of the young men who had been with us, sink away in the arms of the officers, and I had suspected it was he who had stolen the basket. "Now," said one of the policemen to the expressman, "do you know the fellow who took your basket?" At once he turned to me, saying, "It was that dark fellow who had been with you in another mind, the handcuffs on, and was marched away as a thief. I protested my innocence, and I did so again when I was before the judge. I think he half believed me, for he urged me to tell him the truth, but I was innocent and he would have me arrested. I did not do that, for I thought that, being innocent, I should escape without getting into trouble. To my astonishment, however, the jury found me guilty, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with hard labor.

It was a dreadful experience, for I had been in prison before. At last the months dragged themselves away, and I was released. My mother and brother, young man for whom I had suffered, came to the prison gates to meet me. No one would see me but he put his arm around my shoulders, and in a voice broken with emotion, said I was the best friend he had. I was 'a brick,' 'a trump,' and he was so excited that he did not care to say more, and the policemen around me understood the cause of his excitement. I expected to see them arrest him on my own confession, but, as I afterwards learned, they could not do that, as I had been convicted and punished for the same offense. He was safe, and I have often since what an illustration that was of the doctrine of the Atonement. I, the sinner who believes in Christ, am to be punished, because his punishment is borne for him. 'He was bruised for our iniquities.'

Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria. she was a Child, she cried for Castoria. she became Miss, she clung to Castoria. she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

DO YOU WRITE?

Little Ely Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. It is as good as the best, except that it is not used. Useful to office men, collectors, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Send to any address on receipt of price. Agents everywhere. Liberal discounts.

WM. E. PIAGET & CO., 301 Broadway, New York.

RIDLEYS' Grand Street, NEW YORK.

Low Cut Shoes.

Ladies' Tan Color Oxford Ties, with Pointed Toe Caps, Soles very Flexible, Hand Sewed, all sizes, $1.50, $1.75 and $2.00 a pair.

Ladies' Soft Dongola Kid Oxford Ties. Comfort Last; also Narrow Toes, with or without Patent Leather Toe Caps, sizes 2½ to 7, at $1.50 and $2.00 a pair.

Misses' Chocolate Color Oxford Ties, Spring Heels, sizes 11 to 2, at $1.50.

Children's Tan and Chocolate Color Ties and Spring Heel Button Shoes, $1.00, $1.15 and $1.25 a pair.

SUMMER GARMENTS.

Ladies' Jersey Outing Suits, Blouse Waists, Trimmed Braid, $3.90.

Ladies' English Mohair Suits, Full Trimmed, $8.90.

Ladies' Lace Capes, Silk Lined, Trimmed Ribbon, $4.50, have been $7.50.

500 Misses' Gingham and Seersucker Suits, Latest Styles, Puff Sleeves, 69c., 95c., $1.25 to $3.50.

Misses' White Suits, $1.90, $2.50 and $3.50.

Ladies' Striped Flannel Outing Jackets, $1.25.

Boys' Clothing

Children's Short Pant Suits, (ages 4 to 14 years), Mixed Colors, Suitable for Seaside and Country Wear, $1.69 and $1.75 the suit.

Boys' Long Pant Suits (ages 14 to 15 years), Medium Colors, Strong, All Wool, for Vacation Wear, at $4.89 and $6.98.

Men's Alpaca Coats, all Colors, $1.25 to $2.95. Each Suitable for Summer Wear.

Men's Fancy Flannel Coats & Vests, $2.50. Worth $4.00.

Men's Blazers, at $1.50. Cheap at $2.50.

EVERY REQUISITE

For Seaside, Country and Out-door Sports.

Tennis Blazers, Shirts, Caps, Silk Belts, Gordon Sashes, etc.

Boating Goods, Bathing Suits, Shoes, Stockings and Caps.

GAMES.

4 Ball Croquet 75c. and up the set.

6 8 Ball Croquet 85c. and up the set.

Lawn Tennis $2.80 to $15.00 the set.

Hammocks 28c. to $2.19.

Base balls 5c. to $1.00. Bats 10c. to 69c. each.

Sail Boats 49c. to $3.00.

Garden Benches 99c., worth $1.35.

Trunks---Valises.

All makes, sizes, styles and prices, large assortment.

Baby Carriages from $33.69 and up to finest make.

Refrigerators, Ice Chests, Cream Freezers.

Gas and Oil Stoves, Window Screens, Awnings, etc.

Fishing Tackle, Rods, Reels, Poles, Lines and Hooks.

Spring and Summer Magazine, FREE ON APPLICATION.

ORDERS BY MAIL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

EDWARD RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand Street.

56 to 68 ALLEN STREET

59 to 65 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

Hotter the Weather Bigger the Proof.

As the weather grows warm, the sale of James Pyle's Pearline Washing Compound rapidly increases. This proves that many women recognize the fact that PEARLINE makes washing and cleaning very much easier than when done with the ordinary means. Proves also that summer clothing, being of delicate texture and color, will not stand the rough usage necessary when washed with soap, and establishes the fact that PEARLINE, in doing away with the rubbing, lessens the wear and tear and fills a very important place. Delightful for bathing in fresh or salt water. Its ingredients render it harmless to the most delicate skin. Especially during the hot weather it is to your advantage to use PEARLINE, and only humane to supply your servants with it, and thus lighten their labors; besides you insure much better results. Beware of imitations. JAMES PYLE, New York

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Company,

827 and 829 Broadway, New York,

HERMANN SCHAEFFER, President;

ERNEST BROWER, Vice-President.

NONE GENUINE WITHOUT

THIS TRADE MARK.

Note our Trade Mark Closely!

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS!

We ask attention to our Complete Assortment of

SUMMER UNDERWEAR,

And Especially to our exquisite

All-Wool GAUZE

Underwear for the hot, summer season.

Send for explanatory, descriptive and illustrated Catalogue and price-list, free by mail.

Garments made to order, a Specialty.

Mail orders promptly attended to.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Company,

827 and 829 Broadway, New York.

BRANCH HOUSES:

119 NASSAU ST., Temple Court Building;

504 FULTON ST., next to V.M.C.A. Bldg., Brooklyn, N.Y.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY. DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDevell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine. Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular. THE McDEVELL CO. 6 West 14th Street, New York City.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

SENSIBLE WOMEN

all want FERRIS?

GOOD SENSE CORSET WAISTS. THOUSANDS

NOW IN USE.

Best for Health, Economy and Beauty.

BUTTONS at front instead of CLASPS. RING BUCKLE at hip for Hose supporters. Tape-fastened Buttons—won't pull off. Cord Edge Button Holes—won't wear out. FIT ALL AGES—Infants to Adults. Sold by Leading

RETAILERS everywhere.

Send for Circular.

FERRIS BROS., Manufacturers,

341 BROADWAY, New York.

MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO,

WHOLESALE WESTERN AGENTS.

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"

"Retrograde" Seamed Mitts.

THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Dealers.

BABY WARDROBE.

PATTERNS. Complete outfit of 25 new and improved patterns for infants' clothes. Also 25 patterns of short clothes. Either set of patterns, together with full directions for making, amount and kind of material required, by mail, 50c.; both sets, $1.00. Such reliable patterns including every necessary article are needed by every mother. Mrs. J. BRIDE, P. O. Box 2033, New York.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on 10cts.

If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

GARFIELD TEA Cures Constipation and Sick Headache. Free samples at all druggists or 319 W. 45th St., N.Y.

RUPTURE CURED

with our Improved Elastic Truss worn with ease night and day, retains the rupture under the hardest exercise or severest strain. Send for pamphlet. IMPROVED ELASTIC TRUSS CO., 822 & 824 Broadway, Cor. 12th St., New York.

TWO OR THREE.

There were only two or three of us
Who came to the place of prayer,
Came in the teeth of a driving storm,
But for that we did not care,
Since after our hymns of praise had risen,
And our earnest prayers were said,
The Master Himself was present there
And gave us the living bread.

We knew His look in our leader's face,
So rapt, and glad, and free;
We felt His touch when our heads were bowed,
We heard His "Come to Me!"
Nobody saw Him lift the latch,
And none unbarred the door;
But "Peace" was His token to every heart,
And how could we ask for more?

Each of us felt the load of sin
From the weary shoulder fall;
Each of us dropped the load of care,
And the grief that was like a pall;
And over our spirits a blessed calm Swept in from the jasper sea,
And strength was ours for toil and strife
In the days that were thence to be.

It was only a handful gathered in
To the little place of prayer,
Outside were struggle and pain and sin,
But the Lord Himself was there;
He came to redeem the pledge He gave—Wherever His loved ones be,
To stand Himself in the midst of them,
Though they count but two or three.

And forth we fared in the bitter rain,
And our hearts had grown so warm,
It seemed like the pelting of summer flowers,
And not like the crash of a storm.
"Twas a time of the dearest privilege
Of the Lord's right hand," we said,
As we thought how Jesus Himself had come To feed us with living bread.

—Margaret E. Sangster.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.
Will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Dealers who claim that their preparations are "as good as Hood's Sarsaparilla," by so doing admit that Hood's is the standard and possesses peculiar merit which they try in vain to reach.

TERSE and TIMELY.

Diabolos and His Demons.

By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 20 cents.

A Scriptural exposition of an important subject.
Most suitable for the present time. Should be read, pondered, considered, and consulted by all classes. Demonology is an alarming fact. No person should read of Satan's agencies and remain indifferent. There is great curiosity for the supernatural, and in this book such will find food for reflection.

The Spiritual Man.

By Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents.
$5.00 per hundred.

A Biblical Expository Lecture delivered at one of the Northfield conventions under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody.

"This pamphlet contains important teaching as to the natural and spiritual—the man born of the flesh, and the new man in Christ Jesus."—The Christian (London).

The Royal Priest.

As typified in Melchizedek and Aaron. By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents
each. $5.00 per hundred.

Melchizedek has always been one of the mysterious characters in the Old Testament. His life is seen in its true light when applied typically, as is done in this pamphlet.

Sent post-paid to any address on receipt of price.
Address, ALBERT NEEDHAM, Publisher,
Manchester, Mass.

WINNOWN SONGS.

FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

By IRA D. SANKEY.

Already adopted for use by the Chautauque Assembly, also N. Y., N. J., and other State S. S. Conventions.
Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If sent by mail, add 5 cents per copy.

Biglow & Main, The John Church Co.,
New York & Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

FRUIT DIET

is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 77 Broadway, New York City.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "THE CHRIST-IAN'S LEGACY."

102 sold in one church, 72 in one place of 799 people.
W. J. HOLLAND, 107 Duane St., New York.

A LADY WANTED in every Town to sell
WOMAN'S HAND BOOK.
Just issued. Quick Sales. Big Pay at Home. Circ'lrs Free. E. B. TREAT, Pub., New York.

To MOTHERS.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is practically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility, and that is LACTO-PREPA-RATA. It is made wholly from milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed for the facts told to any intelligent person would condemn most of them.

CARRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent. of Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent. of wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged People and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of trying any other Food, do not fail to send to us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Years, by Marion Harland, which also gives a minute description of Lacto-Prepa-rata and Carrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Sent Free.

Read the above pamphlet and then ask your Physician which Foods are the nearest approach to mother's milk.
REED & CARRICK, New York.

W. F. RICE, Pres't. UNION INVESTMENT CO. O. F. PAGE, Sec'y & Treas.
KANSAS CITY, MO.
Paid up Capital, $1,000,000.

SPECIAL OFFER TO INVESTORS. A Guaranteed 7 per cent.
Business Property centrally located in Kansas City, with 50 per cent. of the net profits additional.

Indorsed by Prominent Business men, Bankers and Capitalists, viz.:

H. P. STIMSON, Pres. American National Bank,
E. L. MARTIN, Pres. Mercantile Bank,
HON. T. B. BULLEN, Ex-Mayor,
B. T. WHIPPLE & CO., Real Estate & Inv't Sec's.
HON. WILLIAM WARNER, Late Commander in Chief G. A. R. and Ex-Member of Congress.
WALTON H. HOLMES, Pres. G. A. Cable R'y Co.
L. R. MOORE, Director Nat. Bank of Kansas City.
E. C. SATTLEY, Cashier Kansas City Safe Deposit and Savings Bank.

By permission we refer to any of the above gentlemen. Send for circulars containing description of property and full particulars.

20 YEARS OF SUCCESS.

Without loss to investors a good reason for buying the Debenture Bonds and Mortgage Loans of the
AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO.
Assets, $2,000,000.00. Highest rate of interest consistent with the choicest security. Pamphlets free,
address,
E. S. ORMSBY, A. L. ORMSBY, Vice-President, H. E. SIMMONS, President's.
150 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. CITY.

Invested to yield a present income of from 6 per cent to 8 per cent with one half the profits.

IDLE MONEY
Send for circulars to
WM. H. PARMENTER,
General Agent of the
WINNER INVESTMENT
CO., 60 STATE STREET,
BOSTON, MASS.

Ideal Felt Tooth Polisher.

ENDORSED BY LEADING DENTISTS.

NON-IRRITATING TO GUMS OR ENAMEL

DANIEL GREEN & CO.,
122 East 13th St., New York.

Perfect Days in June

Need perfect Lays for June—and here they are!

IN SHEET MUSIC FORM.

ELAINE. A Love Song. Van de Water. 50c
MIZPAH. Song. Adam Geibel. 35c
SIGNAL BELLS AT SEA. Song. W. S. Hays. 40c
OLD HOME DOWN ON THE FARM. DuBois. 40c
VISIONS OF REST WALTZES. F. T. Baker. 60c
DANSE ECOSSAINE. F. T. Baker. 60c
EDELWEISS. Glide Waltz. T. E. Vanderbeck. 60c
BATTLE WON. Triumphal March. E. Holst. 50c

IN BOOK FORM.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. Very beautiful music. More than 40 sacred airs Arranged by Leon Keach.
OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Arr. for Piano.
YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLEC-TION. 51 very easy and very good pieces.
CLASSIC FOUR-HAND COLLECTION.
19 Piano Duets. Highly praised by good players.
PIANO CLASSICS. Volume 2. Marvellously good pieces, as are those of vol. 1.
SONG CLASSICS. Volume 2. Grand Music.

Any book or piece mailed for retail price, which, for any one of the superior books above mentioned is but $1.00.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.
C. H. Ditson & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY
ESTAB. 1859. INCOR. 1877
PRICE $150 to $1500
They Lead the World!
Sent for trial in your own home.
ABSOLUTELY PERFECT
DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!
Cat. Free.
MARGAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N.Y.
$35 to $500

THE STANLEY BOOK.
JUST ISSUED,
Stanley and His Relief of Emin Pasha,
By E. P. SCOTT, Author of "Lectures on Africa," etc.
250 Pages, with Maps and 20 Full-Page Illustrations.
Paper, 25 cents; Half Russia, Marbled Edges, $1.00.
All classes of people are interested in the wonderful history and travels of this most wonderful man, and this book will have an immense sale. It will be mailed to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price. Agents wanted, to whom 50 per cent. commission will be paid.
Send 25 cents for Prospectus Book, and go to work selling it. Address, J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, P. O. Box 2767, 57 Rose Street, New York.

3 MONTHS FOR 10c.
To secure at once for our popular magazine, NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING, THE GREAT-EST OF ALL HOME JOURNALS, 25,000 new subscribers AT ONCE, we will send it three months for only 10c. Regular subscription, $1.00. NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING is a full 36-page magazine, with a hand-colored cover each issue. It is complete on all home subjects, PRACTICAL COOKING RE-CIPES, Kitchen and Dining Room, Home Decoration, Bric-a-Brac, Needle Work, Short Stories of Travel and Serials by our best authors, Historical Notes, &c. Subscribe now, as you will never have such an offer again. Address, National Housekeeping, 72 Cortland Street, New York City.

Parturition Without Pain.

A Code of Directions for avoiding most of the Pains and Dangers of Childbearing. By M. L. Holbrook, M.D. Price by mail, $1.00.

"A work whose excellence surpasses our power to commend."—New York Evening Mail. 1000 Lady agents wanted. M. L. HOLBROOK CO., 25 Bond St., New York.

"'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true." Some people still clean house without

SAPOLIO.

Sapolio is a solid cake of Scouring Soap.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect
Tea. A TRIAL ORDER OF
3½ pounds of Fine Tea, either
Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea
you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach.
For a DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

New Edition Just Published

GOD IN BUSINESS

A REMARKABLE RECORD OF DIVINE
DELIVERANCES TO CHRISTIAN BUSI-

This book is a record of God's dealings people in business. The author begins personal testimony. Then follows the experience of more than 100 of God's people who do knowledge that they were helped by His power. * * * The incidents here recorded such a wonderful character that it is a matter to lay down the book until or perused. A short sketch of the life Creed, of Brooklyn, is a most wonderful divine guidance and help. Here then is that there is a God-force waiting to be prayer and faith for all our affairs. It that all God's people need more and more —Presbyterian Messenger (London).

This is a well-intended book, and one that is built on such a foundation that it is able to shake it. * * * If young business men will read they may learn from it a lesson prove of great commercial value.—Melth (London).

Bound in Cloth. Price, 85 Cts.
Paper Cover, 50 Cents.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

TWENTY-EIGHTH EDITION
REVISED AND ENLARGED

THE KING'S SON

OR,

A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY

WITH PORTRAIT.

By F. W. BOURNE.

Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist Cornwall, England, it may be truly said
"speakeeth," although he has been dead for twenty years. It is reported that at least persons are known to have been led to reading his biography, entitled "The King's Memoir of Billy Bray." These converts in all parts of the world, and come into every position in life. Noted leaders, emi-nents, and cultivated scholars, as well as of unlearned men, have been drawn into the grace by this fascinating story. The preacher of the age frequently finds the illustrations which enrich his sermons in Billy Bray. A new and enlarged edition of his biography has just been published. All is the twenty-eighth large edition, there is ment of the sale. The editor, F. W. Bourne his work well. The readers of "Daniel Q.
His Religious Notions" will particularly biography.

12 mo. Cloth, 160 pp. Price, 75

Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher & Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

EVERYBODY'S PAINT BOOK

A new work on INDOOR and OUTDOOR painting which is designed to teach people how to DO THEIR OWN PAINTING and save the expense of a professional painter. The most practical and valuable work of the kind ever issued. Full and plain directions are given for mixing paints for ALL PURPOSES. Tells all about PAPER HANGING, KAL-VARMINING, STAINING, VARNISHING, POLISH-
ING, as well as how to RENOVATE FURNITURE, so that it will look as good as new. Tells all about HOUSE-CLEANING.

Full directions are given for mixing and applying Kalsomine to ceils and walls. It tells how to make and use ready-made hand-painted ceilings. Gives detailed directions for PAPER HANGING so that every one can paper a room successfully. Tells how to make DA-MASK WALLS, etc. Tells how to paint a kitchen or chamber varnish. OIL-CLOTHS, varnish WORK, restore CHROMOS and oil renovate, PICTURE FRAMES, etc.
MARBLE, etc. Many useful hints on TIC WORK for HOME DECORATgiven. Full directions are given for ma-beautiful SPATTER-WORK pictures the ladies are so much interested. Tells how OUTBUILDINGS, ROOFS, FARM-ON, FARM IMPLEMENTS, and RIAGES as well as how to polish a PL-ORGAN—how to imitate GROUND GLmake paint for BLACKBOARDS—G-ING in oak and black walnut, painting in of EBONY—MAHOGANY and ROSE-stain, GILDING, BRONZING and S-ING. Elegantly printed, handsome bound tra cloth, with ink and gold, contains a large or illustrations; will save its cost in time. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of $1.00. Five books for $4.00. Get four friends with you and thus get your book free. Address
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

CHOICE LEAFLETS

To inclose in or for distri-Sample packet
leaflets (no two alike) will be sent post-paid for 100 for 20 cts, or 150 for 30 cts. Special price for of 1,000 or over. J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, House, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 26. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

CHINESE MISSION WORK IN NEW YORK. Portrait of Dr. MacArthur, Picture of his Church and Chinese Sunday-school, and two of the Workers.
THE FORWARDLY DAUGHTER-IN-LAW. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
MOON FOSTER OFFENDED. A Story of the S. S. Golden Text.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: An Experiment in Nerve Training, Etc.
THE APOCALYPTIC WAR. By Dr. J. H. Todd.
LAWFUL WORK ON THE SABBATH. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
The Conversion of a Buddhist Priest—A Chinese Soldier's Work—A Coalheaver's Last Glass—A Search for a Wanderer, Etc.

THE SPARKLING FOUNTAIN. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Napoleon's Second Wife—The Marriage Ceremony, Etc.
PICTURES OF ELEPHANTS IN MILITARY LIFE IN INDIA: Morning Toilet—At Breakfast.
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Kevser. (Continued.)

CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG CHINAMEN IN NEW YORK.

1. Rev. Dr. MacArthur, Pastor—No. 2. Calvary Baptist Church—No. 3. Mr. A. Freeman, Supt—No. 4. Miss H. Dunstan, Teacher—Nos. 5 and 6. The School.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

THE COWARDLY DAUGHTER-IN-LAW.

"And they lifted up their voices and wept, and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her." Ruth 1:14.

The Sorrowful Trio—Naomi's Appeal to her Daughters-in-Law—Orpah Decides to Go Back—I. People Who Stay in Moab Have Often Fine Susceptibility—The Hardest Hearts Sometimes Drawn to Christ—God's Servants Drawn From the Hopeless Classes—People of Lovable Natures Not Won to Christ—II. Some Who Start Well Turn Back—The Converts at a Revival—The Example of Lot's Wife—III. Returning to the World Involves a Struggle—The Sacred Barriers in the Way—Shenstone's Discontent—IV. A Religious Choice Dividing Families—V. Reasons Why People Refuse Christ—The Wide Invitation.

MOAB was a heathen land. Naomi is about to leave it and go into the land of Bethlehem. She has two daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah, who conclude to go with her. Naomi tells them they had better not leave their native land and undertake the hardship of the journey, but they will not be persuaded. They all three start out on their journey. After awhile, Naomi, although she highly prized the company of her two daughters-in-law, attempted again to persuade them to go back because of the hardship and self-denial through which they would be obliged to go. Ruth responds in the words from which I once discoursed to you: "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee, for where thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge, thy people shall be my people and thy God my God, where thou diest will I die and there will I be buried, the Lord do so to me and more also if aught but death part thee and me." Not so with her sister Orpah. Her determination had already been shaken. The length and peril of the journey began to appal her, and she had worshipped the gods of Moab so long that it was hard to give them up. From that point Orpah turned back, the parting being described in my text: "And they lifted up their voice and wept again, and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her."

Learn from this story of Orpah that some of those who do not leave the Moab of their iniquities are Persons of Fine Susceptibility.

It was compassion for Naomi in widowhood and sorrow that led Orpah to start with her toward Bethlehem. It was not because of any lack of affection for her that she turned back. We know this from the grief exhibited at parting. I do not know but that she had as much warmth and ardor of nature as Ruth, but she lacked the courage and persistence of her sister. That there are many with as fine susceptibility as Orpah who will not take up their cross and follow Christ, is a truth which needs but little demonstration. Many of those who have become the followers of Jesus have but very little natural impressibility. Grace often takes hold of the hardest heart and the most unlovely character and transforms it. It is a hammer that breaks rocks. In this Christ often shows His power. It wants but little generalship to conquer a flat country, but might of artillery and heroism to take a fort manned and ready for raking cannonade. The great Captain of our salvation has forced his way into many an armed castle. I doubt not that Christ could have found many a fisherman naturally more noble-hearted than Simon Peter, but there was no one by whose conversion He could more gloriously have magnified His grace. The conversion of a score of Johns would not have illustrated the power of the Holy Ghost as much as the conversion of one Peter. It would have been easier to drive twenty than to tame one lion like Peter. God has often made some of His most efficient servants out of men naturally unimpressible. As men take stiff and unwieldy timbers, and under huge-handed machinery bend them into the hulk of great ships, thus God has often shaped and bent into His service the most unwieldy natures, while those naturally impressionable are still in their unchanged state.

Lambs Like John

Oh, how many, like Orpah, have warm affections and yet never become Christians! Like Orpah, they know how to weep, but they do not know how to pray. Their fineness of feeling leads them into the friendships of the world, but not into communion with God. They can love everybody but Him, who is altogether lovely. All other sorrow rends their heart, but they are untouched by the woes of a dying Christ. Good news fills them with excitement, but the glad tidings of great joy and salvation stir not their soul. Anxious to do what is right, yet they rob God. Grateful for the slightest favors, they make no return to Him who wrung out the last drop of blood from His heart to deliver them from going down to the pit.

They Would Weep

at the door of a prison at the sight of a wicked captive in chains, but have no compassion for their own souls over which Satan, like a grim jailer, holds the lock and key. When repulsive, grasping, unsympathetic natures resist the story of a Saviour's love, it does not excite our surprise; but it is among the greatest of wonders that so many who exhibit Orpah's susceptibility also exhibit Orpah's impenitency. We are not surprised that there is barrenness in a desert, but a strange thing is it that sometimes the Rose of Sharon will not grow in a garden. On a summer morning we are not surprised to find a rock without any dew on it, but if, going among a flock of lilies, we saw in them no glittering drops, we would say, "What foul sprite has been robbing these vases?" We are not surprised that Herod did not become a Christian, but how strange that the young man Jesus loved for his sweetness of temper should not have loved the Redeemer. Hard-hearted Felix trembled, proud Nebuchadnezzar repented, and cruel Manasseh turned unto the Lord; but many a nature, affectionate and gentle, has fought successfully against divine influences. Many a dove has refused to come in the window of the ark yet finding no rest for the sole of her foot.

Hopeful Beginnings.

Again, the history of Orpah impresses upon me the truth that there are many who make a good starting, but after awhile change their minds and turn back. When these three mourners start from their home in Moab there is as much probability that Orpah will reach Bethlehem as that her sister Ruth and her mother-in-law Naomi will arrive there. But while these continue in the journey they commenced, Orpah after awhile gets discouraged and turns back. This is the history of many a soul. Perhaps it was during a revival of religion they resolved upon a Christian life, and made preparations to leave Moab. Before that they were indifferent to the sanctuary, churches were necessary evils. The minister almost always preached poor sermons, because they had not the heart to hear them. They thought the bread was not good because their appetite was poor. Religion did very well for invalids and the aged, but they had no desire for it. Suddenly a change came upon their soul. They found that something must be done. Every night there was a thorn in their pillow. There was gall in their wine. They found that their pleasures were of a swamp that rise out of decay and death. Losing their self-control they were startled by their own prayer, "God be merciful to me a sinner." They did not suspect it, but the Holy Ghost was in their soul. Without thinking what they were doing, they brushed the dust off the family Bible. The ground did not feel as firm under them nor did the air seem as bright. They tried to dam back the flood of their emotions, but the attempt failed, and they confessed their anguish of soul before they meant to. The secret was out! They wanted to know what they must do to be saved.

Only False Lights

With Ruth and Naomi, weeping Orpah started for the land of Bethlehem. They longed for the Sabbath to come. Straight as an arrow to the mark the sermon struck them. They thought the minister must have heard of their case and was preaching right at them. They thought the sermon was very short, nor did they once coil themselves up in their pew with their eye shut and head averted with an air of unmoved dignity. They began to pray with an earnestness that astonished themselves and astonished others. Shoving the plane or writing up accounts or walking the street when you might have thought their mind entirely upon the world, they were saying within themselves "O that I were a Christian!" Orpah is fully started on the road to Bethlehem. Christian friends observing the religious anxiety of the awakened soul say, "He must certainly be a Christian. There is another soldier in Christ's rank, another sick one has been cured of the leprosy. The observers turn their attention another way, they say, "Orpah is safe enough, she has gone Bethlehem."

The Ancient Example.

Alas! Alas! Starting out for heaven is a very different thing from arriving there. Remember Lot's wife. She looked back with longing to the place from which she came, and was destroyed. Half way between Sodom and the city of Refuge that strange storm comes upon her, and its s and brimstone gather on her garments until they are so stiffened she cannot proceed, nor can she lie down, because of this dreadful wrapping around her garments and limbs; and lo after her life has gone she still stands there covered up by the strange storm that she called a pillar of salt, as some sailor on ship deck in the wintry tempest stands covered with a mail of ice. Ten thousand times ten thousand men have been destroyed half way between Sodom and the city of Refuge. Orpah might well never have started as afterwards to turn back. Yet multitudes have walked in her footsteps. Go among those the least interested sacred things and you will find that they were once out of the land of Moab. Every one of them prayed right heartily and studied the Bibles; and frequented the sanctuary, but Lot's wife looked back wistfully to Sodom, and Orpah retreated from the company of Ruth and Naomi. It is an impressive thought that as Orpah had gone so far as actually to look out into the land of Bethlehem she turned back and died in Moab.

A Hard Road.

Again: let our subject impress upon us the truth that those who have once felt it their duty to leave their natural state cannot give up the duty and go back to hardness of heart with a struggle. After Orpah had thoroughly made up her mind to go back to the place from which she started, she went through the sad scene of parting with Ruth and Naomi. My text says: "They lifted up their voice and wept." Ah, hearer, it requires more decision and perseverance to stay away from the kingdom of God than to enter it. Although she did not in it, Orpah passed through a greater struggle turning back into the land of Moab than would have been necessary to take her clear through to Bethlehem. Suppose you that those persons who have remained in their evil ways have no struggle? Why, they have been obliged to fight every inch of their way. The road to death is not such easy travelling as some ministers have been accustomed to describe it. From beginning to end it is fighting against the sharp sword of the Spirit. It is climbing over the cross. It is wading through the deep blood of the Son of God. It is scaling mountains of privilege. It is wading through lakes of sorrow. It is breaking over communion tables and baptismal fonts and pulpits and Bibles. It is wedging one's self through between pious kindred who stand before and press us back and hold on to us by their prayers after we have passed them in our headlong downward career. No man ought to think of undertaking to go back into Moab after having come within sight of Bethlehem unless he has a heart that cannot be made to quake, a sure foot that will not slip among infinite perils, and an arm that can drive back the Son of God who stands in the centre of the broad road, spreading out His arms and shouting into the ear of the thoughtless pilgrim, "Stop! Stop!"

We talk about taking up the cross and following Jesus, but that cross is not half so heavy as the burden which the sinner carries. It is a very solemn thing to be a Christian, but it is a more solemn thing not to be a Christian. Just in proportion as gospel advantages have been numerous will be the disturbance of the heart that will not come to Christ.

The Bible says, in regard to the place where Christ was buried, "in the midst of the garden there was a sepulchre;" and in the midst of the most flowery enjoyments of the unpardoned there is a chilliness of death. Although they may pull out the arrows that strike their soul from the Almighty's quiver, there remain a stinging and a smarting. If men wrench themselves away from Christ of His hand by which He would have rescued them. The pleasures of the world may give temporary relief from the upbraidings of conscience, but are like stupefying drugs that dull the pain only temporarily. Herod monopolizes the most of the world's honor, and yet is thrown into a rage because they say a little child is born in Bethlehem who, may after awhile dispute his authority. Byron conquered the world with his pen and yet said, that he felt more unhappiness from the criticism of the most illiterate reader, than he experienced pleasure from the praise of all the talented.

They Will Bear the Mark

In the last century in England lived the immortal Shenstone. Portions of his life were given to the writing of poetry, but this was not evidently the field for which nature had equipped him. His name will never be forgotten, because of the home which he adorned and beautified, until there probably never has been so bright spot since the Garden of Eden as

"The Leasowes."

In addition to the marvels of nature, he added the perfection of art. Arbor and terrace and slope and rustic temple and reservoir and urn and fountain here had their crowning. Oak and yew and hazel, put on their glory of verdure. What the greenness of deep grass and the foam of cascade, and the glitter of still lake could give of beauty were added. No life was more diligent and no soul more ingenious, than those of Shenstone, and all that genius and diligence, were directed to the adornment of that treasured spot. What more could one want to make home happy. Yet there is one man who sits sighing in those bowers, and casting gloomy looks upon those parks, and the birth of leaping waterfalls makes no melody to his ear. It is Shenstone, the owner of the leasowes. "I have lost my road to happiness," says the despondent man. "I am angry and morose, and dejected, and frantic, and disregard all present things just as it becomes a madman to do." My friends, there is no solid happiness in anything but religion. I care not how bright a home, Orpah has in Moab, when she runs from duty she turns from peace.

Again: This subject teaches that a religious voice and the want of it frequently divide families. Ruth and Orpah and Naomi were tenderly attached. They were all widows, and their life had been consecrated by a baptism of tears. In the fire of trial their affections had been forged. Together they were so pleasantly united, you can hardly imagine them separated. At a fatal line is drawn dividing them from each other, perhaps forever. Naomi cannot be in a heathen country. She must go into Bethlehem that there among the pious she may worship the true God. Ruth makes a similar choice, but Orpah rebels. "And they lifted up their voice and wept again, and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her." The history of this family of Elimelech is the story of many families of this day. How often it is that in a circle of relatives, while they look alike, and walk alike, and talk alike, there is a tremendous difference. Outwardly united in the affectional relations of this life, they are separated in the most important respects. Some are the children of light, and others the children of darkness. These are alive in Christ, and those are dead in sin. Ruth in the land of Bethlehem, Orpah in Moab. Dying, yet immortal hearer, by the solemnity of the parental, and filial, and conjugal relation, by the sacredness of the family hearth, by the honor of the family name, by the memory of departed kindred, I point out this parting of Ruth and Orpah.

Again: This subject suggests to me two of the prominent reasons

Why People Refuse

the kingdom of Christ. There may have been many other reasons why Orpah left her sister and mother-in-law, and went back home, but there were two reasons which I think were more prominent than the rest. She had been brought up in idolatries. She loved the heathen gods which her ancestors had worshipped, and, though these blocks of wood and stone could not hear, she thought they could hear, and, though they could not see, she thought they could see, and, though they could not feel, she thought they could feel. A new religion had been brought to her attention. She had married a godly man. She must often have heard her mother-in-law talk of the God of Israel. She was so much shaken in her original belief that she concluded to leave her idolatries, but, coming to the margin of the land of Bethlehem, her determination failed her, and speedily she returned to her gods. This is the very reason why multitudes of persons never become Christians. They cannot bear to give up their gods. Business is that crushes more men than the car of the Hindoos. To it they say their morning and evening prayers. A little of Christ's religion may creep into the Sabbath, but Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, are the days devoted to this American idol. Every hour there is a sacrifice on the altar. Home duties, health of body, manly strength and immortal affections must all burn in this holocaust. Men act as though they could take their bonds, and mortgages, with them into the kingdom of heaven.

The American Juggernaut

There are many who have no unholy thirst for gold, yet who are devoting themselves to their worldly occupations with a ruinous intensity. Men of the stock exchange, men of the yardstick, men of the saw, men of the trowel, men of the day-book, what will become of you, if unforgiven, in the great day when there are no bargains to make? It is possible to devote oneself even to a lawful calling until it becomes sinful. There is no excuse on the earth or under the earth for the neglect of our deathless spirit. The man who has no time to attend to religion will have no time to enter heaven.

But there are others who, while their worldly occupation has no particular fascination over them, are entirely absorbed in the gains that come to that occupation. This is the worship of Mammon.

The Ring of Dollars and Cents

is the only litany they ever utter. Though in the last day the earth itself will not be worth a farthing, a heap of ashes scattered in the whirlwind, they are now giving their time and eternity for the acquisition of so much of it as you might at last hold in the hollow of one hand. The American Indian who gave enough land to make a State out of, for a string of beads, made a princely bargain compared with the speculation of that man who gains the whole world and loses his own soul. How much comfort do the men take who died unforgiven ten years ago, leaving large fortunes to their heirs? Do they ever come up to count the gold they hoarded or walk through the mansions they built? Though they could have bought an empire, they have not now as much money as you have this moment in your pocket. Solomon looked upon his palace and the grounds surrounding it, pools rimmed with gold, and circling roads along which, at times, rushed his fourteen hundred chariots, while under the out-branching sycamores and cedars walked the apes and peacocks, which by the navy of Hiram had been brought from Tarshish, and from the window curtains with embroidered gold and purple through which came out the thrill of harps and psalteries mingling with the song of the waters. When Solomon saw that all these luxuries of sight and sound had been purchased by his wealth, he broke forth in the exclamation, "Money answereth all things." But we cannot receive it as literal. It cannot still the voice of conscience. It of the soul. It cannot put a bribe in the hand of death. It cannot unlock the gate of heaven. The tower of Siloam fell and killed eighteen of its admirers, but this idol to whose worship the exchanges and banks and custom-houses of the world have been dedicated, will fall and crush to death its thousands. But I cannot enumerate the idolatries to which men give themselves. They are kept by them from a religious life. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon," and the first thing that Christ does when He comes into the temple of the soul is to drive out the exchangers.

Cannot Drown the Sorrows

But it was not only the gods of Moab that made Orpah leave her sister and mother-in-law. She doubtless had a dread of the hardship to which they would be exposed on the journey to Bethlehem, and Orpah was not alone in the fear. Doubtless some of you have been appalled and driven back by the self-denials of the Christian life. The taunt of the world, the charge of hypocrisy which they would sometimes be obliged to confront, has kept many away from the land of Bethlehem. They spend their life in counting the cost and, because a Christian life demands so much courage and faith, they dare not begin to build. Perhaps they are courageous in every other respect. They are not timid in presence of any danger except that of trusting in the infinite mercy of Christ. The sheep are more afraid of the shepherd than of the wolves. They shrink away from the presence of Christ as though He were a tyrant rather than a friend who sticketh closer than a brother. They feel more safe in the ranks of the enemy where they must suffer infinite defeat than in the army of Christ which shall be more than conquerors, through Him that hath loved them. Men shiver and tremble before religion as though they were commanded to throw their life away, as though it were a surrender of honor and manliness, and reason and self-respect and all that is worth keeping.

Christ's Weapons.

What has God ever done that His mercy should be doubted? Was there ever a sorrow of His frailest child that He did not pity? Was there ever a soul that He left unhelped in the darkness? Was there ever a martyr that He did not strengthen in the flames? Was there ever a dying man to whose relief He did not come at the cry of "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." Aye, my soul, what has God done that so basely thou hast doubted Him? Did He make the whole earth a desert? Are all the skies dark and storm-swept? Is life all sickness? Is the air all plague? Are there nothing but rods and scorpions and furnaces? God knew how many suspicions and unbeliefs men would entertain in regard to Him and therefore, after making a multitude of plain and precious promises, He places His hand on His own heart and swears by His own existence: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." Why then fight against God? This day the battle rages. Thou art armed with thy sins, thy ingratitude, thy neglects, and Christ is armed against thee, but His weapons are tears, are dying agonies, are calls to mercy, and the battle-cry which He this day sends over thy soul as He rushes towards thee is "save thee from going down to the pit for I have found a ransom." I would not envy thy victory, O hearer, if thou dost conquer, for what wilt thou do with the weapons thou hast snatched from the armed Redeemer, what with the tears, what with His dying agonies, what with His calls to mercy? Would God that Orpah would get tired of Moab! Would God that Orpah would go to Bethlehem.

CHINESE MISSION WORK IN NEW YORK.

The Advantages of Foreign Missions at Home—The Valuable Opportunity—Dr. MacArthur's Testimony—His Life and Work—The Origin and Growth of the Work at Calvary—Its Recent Developments—Other Denominational Efforts—Dr. Greer's Guild—The Methodist Chinese Y. M. C. A.

THE possibility of doing effective foreign missionary work at home, has now aroused evangelical churches of all denominations to energetic and organized effort. The opportunity is one that should not be missed. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, this week calls attention to it, and by giving pictures of a typical school in New York, hopes that its readers who live in every city of the Union, and who, as a class, are earnestly desirous of spreading the knowledge of Christ throughout the world, may be stirred up to make the best use of the opportunity afforded them. There are over a hundred thousand Chinamen scattered through the country, and the majority of them have come here in the hope of gaining a modest competence with which they intend to return to their own land, there to spend their old age. Few of them look upon this country as their permanent residence. It is for the churches to see to it that every one of these men who have come here as heathen, who, even here have their idols and are seen prostrate before their Joss, practising their heathen rites, shall be taught the knowledge of the true God, and when they return to their own land shall carry with them the good news of Him who was "the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

The Opportunity

is one of extraordinary promise. In China, the Christian missionary is a foreigner, and must encounter the prejudice which prevails everywhere against foreigners, and nowhere is so strong as in a nation so conservative as China. He has, too, the enormous difficulty of expressing his thoughts in a difficult foreign language. He is liable to make mistakes and to tell his story in phrases which seem grotesque to the natives, and which render its meaning almost incomprehensible. But here, the Chinaman is the foreigner. He finds that his Christian teacher has no prejudice against him. His interest lies in learning the English language. He acquires it with wonderful rapidity. He mixes with the people and learns the use of simple words relating to his business, and is daily enlarging his vocabulary. In China, he might pass by the foreigner painfully endeavoring to make himself understood, but here he has strong inducements to concentrate his efforts on the comprehension of all he hears. His opportunities for making money are increased by his knowledge of English, and he naturally gives his mind to the study of it. He consequently appreciates the help of Christian teachers, which, as he perceives, springs from a kindly and disinterested motive, and is grateful. He avails himself joyfully of their service, and in learning English he learns the truths of the Christian religion. So with God's blessing, he goes back to be himself a missionary, able to tell his own people in their own tongue the glorious tidings of salvation through Christ.

Individual Effort

in such circumstances is all powerful. Every Christian may engage in it. Though there may be no Chinese school in his city, he may seek out a Chinaman, and he will find him ready to receive help, and grateful for any effort to assist him. The man who will help him to read and write English is his friend, and he is too shrewd not to understand that. He is conscious of his obligation, and learns to respect and love his teacher. As he makes progress, that sense of obligation grows. He pays more and more attention to that teacher's words, and is impressed with the disinterestedness of the labor freely given for his advantage. He wonders what can be the motive for the kindness so opposed to all the maxims of the world, and learns that it proceeds from the love of Christ and concern for his own soul. So the Chinaman is reached more easily here than he would have been in his own land. The impression is deeper, the obstacle of prejudice is non-existent, and he becomes a Christian by natural process. Then when he returns to China, by his life, and by his words, and by the influence that his independent financial standing gives him, he can labor effectively in the cause of Christ.

Dr. MacArthur,

whose portrait appears on the first page, is is an enthusiast in this work. He is only one of many clergymen in New York, and other cities who have realized the opportunity afforded them, and are laboring earnestly in the work. Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Methodist clergymen are giving time and effort to it, and are encouraged by the success attending the effort. They have aroused their congregations to a sense of its value and importance, and there are no churches without self-denying men and women ready to engage in it. The minister has only to show interest in it, to encourage the workers, to give his advice, and occasional participation, and it sustains itself. In New York all the denominations named have successful Chinese schools in their districts, and the pastors speak highly of the results.

Dr. MacArthur is especially hopeful. He is a vigorous energetic man of forty-nine years of age. He comes of a Scottish family which emigrated from the Highlands to Canada early in the century and settled in Ontario. Robert Stuart MacArthur was born in 1841. He studied at the Canadian Literary Institute of Woodstock Ontario, and at the conclusion of his course entered mercantile life. He had been converted at the age of thirteen, and the devotion and energy, which characterize him now, were then manifest. All the time which he could spare from business was given to Christian work. In Sunday-school, in the houses of the poor at St. Andrews, Quebec, where he was living, it was his delight to speak of Christ and salvation. Gradually from giving addresses to little gatherings, he was led to preach, and his sermons were with power. He was led to see the duty of giving himself wholly to the work of the ministry. He went to the University of Rochester, N. Y., from which he graduated in 1867, and thence he went into the Rochester Theological Seminary for a three years' course. During his studies he continued preaching in neglected districts, and from one sphere of his labors a revival started, which led to the formation of a church which is now an important and flourishing society. He received several calls at the conclusion of his college course, among which was a pressing one from Titusville, Pa., but finally he accepted a call from Calvary Baptist Church, New York, (a picture of which appears on the first page) where he was ordained, and began his labors in June, 1870.

During the twenty years he has been there the church has grown amazingly in numbers and influence, as well as in financial standing. It has opened up many fields of Christian effort, and Dr. MacArthur has been the leader in them all, inspiring and stimulating the workers. This later development in the direction of Chinese evangelization seems to have taken a deep hold on his sympathies. He speaks of it most enthusiastically. "I am deeply interested in this work," he said recently to the writer. "We have had in connection with this church for six years. It has been most prosperous, and a considerable amount of good has been done. We have twelve Chinamen now here in regular attendance, most of them members of our church, and leading exemplary Christian lives. Many whom we have had have gone back to China, converted to Christ and are now doing good work in their own country. All our scholars have developed one prominent trait. They are liberal and cheerful givers. Not only do they contribute to the support of the schools and evangelistic work among their own countrymen here, but they give largely to foreign mission work especially in China. Two Chinamen, who were taught in the school, recently started for home. We had letters from them, which they wrote from San Francisco before sailing, speaking in the highest terms of their gratitude for the help they received here, and avowing their intention to work as missionaries.

A Chinese School

The Origin and Growth

of the work, Dr. MacArthur says, were unequivocal indications of the Divine approval. A small Chinese class had been gathered in another church, which was about to remove farther uptown. Its new location would be difficult of access for the Chinamen, and the class was therefore offered to Calvary. It was evidently a work of God, and the church dare not refuse. Mr. Freeman, a member of the Calvary church, whose portrait with that of Miss H. Dunstan, one of the lady teachers, appears on the first page, was ready to take hold of the school, and several ladies volunteered as teachers. They knew nothing of the Chinese language, but books were procured with phrases in parallel columns, Chinese on one side and English on the other. The ladies showed themselves skilful in imparting instruction, and the Chinese pupils were no less intelligent and earnest in gaining it. Each lady had one Chinaman for her particular charge, and the pupils showed a remarkable degree of attachment and respect for their respective teachers.

Some interesting developments have recently taken place in the work. In the lower part of the city of New York, an effort is being made as an outgrowth of the work at Calvary to reach Chinamen of a higher class than those in the laundries near the church. Some of the pupils of the laundries are ignorant of their own peculiar departments of education. When they came to the Calvary school they could scarcely read their own language. But in lower New York there are Chinamen of culture, merchants, college graduates, and men of excellent attainments. Two excellent ladies, members of the Calvary Church, undertook at their own cost mission among these men. These ladies—Mr. Rounday and Miss Christopher—have obtained the use of a room in the Baptist Mariners' Temple, and are organizing a mission work there. A library is being formed. The founding of a Hospital for Chinamen is also under contemplation, and a young Chinaman, who has studied medicine in the Long Island Medical College, to be placed in charge.

This work at Calvary Church is, as we have said, a typical work. The

Other Denominations

are equally in earnest in the same direction, as this work is but a specimen of the others. I. Greer, of St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church is prominent in this field of labor. He has taken up the work organized by Mr. John Thorne returned missionary from China, who, having started the work in New York, is now in Philadelphia organizing a similar work there. I. Greer has imbibed his spirit and his enthusiasm and is fostering and developing the movement. He has now a Chinese Guild at No. 11 St. Mark's place where Christian Chinamen meet for social converse and improvement and where Chinese strangers can obtain advice and help. Here there is a Sunday-school from fifty to seventy in attendance. This guild is under the management of Guy Maine, a most intelligent and consecrated Christian Chinaman, who, with Dr. Stewart Happer and others, is doing a valuable philanthropic and religious work among the Chinese. The Methodist Episcopal Church has also entered energetically into this field, has established a Chinese Young Men's Christian Association, and in other ways helped in the work. We hope that this necessarily brief and imperfect sketch of the effort may encourage our readers, in other cities, to do for the Chinamen in their neighborhood what is being done for them in New York, and so the Missions in China may find their hands being continually strengthened by the arrival in China of men from America, able and anxious to help them in the stupendous task of evangelizing that vast empire.

AN ELEPHANT BATTERY IN INDIA.

(See Illustration on pages 412 and 413.)

Two important and interesting incidents in the daily life of the animals, which constitute a part of the British forces in India, are depicted in the illustrations given in this number. The elephants are connected with the artillery branch of the service, and have proved themselves amenable to the arts of the drill-sergeant as the horses of the cavalry. The first of the two sketches represents the morning bath. The elephants much enjoy the operation, lying down in any position to suit the convenience of their attendant. He rubs their hides with a piece of tallow, and, should it slip out of his hand, they politely pick it up with their trunks and restore it to him. They also use their trunks to dash water over themselves, and can hit off any part of their bodies with great exactitude. These are all female elephants, as they are more tractable than males. In the second sketch the elephants are formed up in a row, waiting for their breakfast. Every elephant has five bundles, each containing two pounds of raw rice, laid in front of her; and they are not allowed to take it up for themselves, as they usually spill some of the rice. When the word "feed" is given, each animal raises its trunk. The mahout then picks up a bundle and puts it into the animal's mouth. After the feed they march back in line to the tables, where they remain for the rest of the day, with some sugar-cane and coarse grass as second course.

Elephants have been used in Indian warfare from very ancient times. Pliny and other historians mention them. They were also used in Persia. Thence the practice spread to Asia Minor, and though not mentioned in this connection in the Bible, the Apocrypha contains records of their use. It is stated that the Maccabees had to contend with such trained elephants in the Syrian armies of the Seleucids in immense numbers. Military elephants used to go into battle with a wooden tower on their backs in which were four or more soldiers armed with bows. Their height and vast strength rendered them formidable in battle, and the intelligence which they showed in their training gave them additional value.

AN INEBRIATE CHILD.

In the recently issued report of the Fourth Convention of Christian Workers* is an extraordinary autobiographic sketch by the Rev. J. L. Jones, whose work at Cleveland, O., has been lessened in the conversion of some of the most hardened criminals in the city. He said: "I am one of those whom the Lord has saved from drunkenness. Twenty-two years ago it pleased God to bring me out of drunkenness. Twenty-two years have been spent in the city of Cleveland as a missionary, where I have many warm Christian friends. I have been thirty-one times behind the prison bars. I was the son of a minister. My people were educated people, but I could not put the A B Cs together. Grandfather got me when I was a little child to take whiskey. Before I was six years old, it was well known in my city that I was a drunkard. I loved the intoxicating cup. I never knew a case just like mine. I have been ground between the railroad cars, and everybody turned their back upon me but a minister of the Gospel. I went to him and said, 'I am going to turn away from my wicked ways.' I stood on the verge of whiskey palsy and delirium tremens, but I said, 'I am going to turn away from my wicked ways,' and that minister gave me half his bed that night, and slept with me. Now where will you find another minister who will take a drunkard and give him half his bed, nurse him and keep him there six weeks? To-day I am a minister of the Gospel. I speak of this only because I want you to know that God sometimes takes us right out of the gutter and lifts us into His service. Since that time I have had charge of various Sunday-schools and other Christian work, but I cannot go into all the details. I speak of it only to praise God, because He can use the most hopeless case I ever saw in this world. 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief.' If He can save one-armed Jack and keep him twenty-two years in Cleveland, where is the man that the Lord cannot save? I would like to see him."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Life of a Hard Working Mother was Described recently by a bright boy with whom a reporter entered into conversation. He said: "My mother gets me up, makes the fire, and sends me off. Then she gets my father up, gets the other children their breakfast, and sends them to school; and then she and the baby have their breakfast." "How old is the baby?" asked the reporter. "Oh, she is most two, but she can talk and walk as well as any of us." "Are you well paid?" "I get $4 a week, and my father gets $3.50 a day." "How much does your mother get?" With a bewildered look, the boy said: "Mother? Why she don't work for anybody." "I thought you said she worked for all of you." "Oh, yes! for us she does, but there isn't any money in it." As the boy grows older he will find that very many of the world's best workers toil without any prospect of making money by their labors, and very often they do not win the gratitude of those who benefit by their exertions. Missionaries, preachers, and Christian workers often do a great deal of laborious work with the knowledge that there is no money in it, but, like their Master, they will eventually be satisfied as they look back on the travail of their souls. (Isa. 53:11.)

An Automatic Register of Temperature is the object of an invention recently patented. By an ingenious contrivance the exact heat in any given place is registered by means of an electric wire at another place. The inventor explaining its uses says: "Suppose that a man has an immense cold storage warehouse like that in connection with the markets in New York. It is desirable and even necessary that he be able to sit in his office, and tell at a glance just what the temperature is in each room and closet of that warehouse, and whether his refrigerating machinery is working evenly for a rise of temperature might spoil thousands of dollars worth of provisions stored there. Take the case of a ship with a cargo of fruit, grain, or vegetables. Fermentation setting in would produce heat. Heat reacting, would accelerate fermentation, and soon half the cargo is ruined, possibly the ship might be set on fire. My invention would give prompt and timely warning of the danger, and measures could be taken in time to check it. What a startling record would be made if such an automatic register could be applied to the condition of churches. Variations of spiritual temperature often take place unknown to those who have the oversight of the church, who are too apt to consider large attendance and good collections sufficient indications of a church's welfare. Christ has given warning that He is not satisfied with such indications. (Rev. 3:15, 16.)

An Experiment in Hypnotic Nerve-Training has had injurious effects on two pupils in a Massachusetts Academy. One of the teachers there has conceived an original idea in educational methods which she applied to the pupils. Her object was to train them to obtain complete control over their own minds, and nerves, and muscles, so as to focus and exercise them at will on any given subject for any length of time. The system adopted was to have them lie perfectly flat on the floor, and by an effort relax all the muscles of the body, so that if a hand or an arm is lifted it will fall back as if lifeless. When complete passivity was attained, the pupil was next told to make one arm tense, and use it while all other parts of the body were relaxed. This, the teacher believed, would give the pupil the power of concentrating all her power in one particular set of muscles by the exercise of the will. With this physical training was combined a corresponding mental training, designed to develop a power of complete mental abstraction in any given direction. Two of the pupils became sick under the system and were sent home for medical treatment. The physicians who attended them were puzzled for a time, but at length pronounced their case one of hypnotism, and treated it accordingly. The patients are now recovering, but for several weeks it was feared that they would lose life or reason. The achievement of attaining entire passivity is, as the teacher admits, extremely difficult, and she supposes that these pupils were of a nervous temperament too active to accomplish it. Still more difficult does the Christian find it to reach a condition of entire passivity of soul as a preliminary to higher attainments in the Christian life. The will and the natural man are so strong that it would never be attained if God did not give the help of the Holy Spirit to those who are trying to yield themselves up fully to Him. (Gal. 5:17.)

A Canine Hospital Patient has been Treated at the Charing Cross Hospital, in London. The English correspondent of a New York journal states that the Secretary of the hospital reports the case, and pledges his word to its literal truth. He says that on a recent Sunday night a rough terrier barked outside the door of the hospital till he was let in. When admitted he limped in, squatted on the mat, and held up an injured forepaw. The house surgeon came, whereupon the dog followed him at once across the hall to the accident room, jumped at once, when invited to do so, on the chair, and again held out the injured paw. It was dressed, when the dog licked the hand of the surgeon and loudly barked its gratitude till it had to be turned out, showing great reluctance to leave. The house surgeon, confirms this statement, and adds that the next day the dog came, like any other out patient, to have his paw dressed. It is not known to whom the dog belongs. The dog had evidently had some previous experience in some way, through its owner, or another person, of the benefits to be derived from a hospital in cases of injury, and applied on his own account for the aid rendered others. It is strange that men do not show in their spiritual maladies a similar sagacity. They see others delivered from their evil habits and made happy for time and eternity through Christ, yet they do not seek the blessing for themselves. (John 9:27, 28.)

How a Sentinel's Mistake Disconcerted a Royal lover is told by the German correspondent, of an American journal. He states that some months ago, when the young prince royal of Greece went to Berlin, to pay his addresses to the sister of the Emperor of Germany, he used to go frequently from that city to the palace at Potsdam, where the young princess resided. They were stated formal visits and the princess being duly notified that her lover was coming, the imperial carriage was sent to the station for him. But the prince thought he would like to pay her an unexpected, and informal visit. He therefore set out dressed in the usual attire of a gentleman, and on arriving at Potsdam hired an ordinary hack, and drove to the palace. There, however, the sentinel on duty stopped him. The prince stated who he was, and what he had come for. "No," said the sentinel, "you are no prince. You are not in uniform: you have no decorations. I know a prince when I see one. Go away," and he clutched his rifle menacingly. The prince protested, but without avail. At last, however, he saw a footman pass, and induced him to carry a card to the ex-empress. Very soon that lady came herself, and, to the sentinel's amazement, received her future son-in-law with cordiality, and took him to the palace. "I thought," said the sentinel afterward, "that he was one of those crazy fellows, who imagine themselves great folks." As he could not recognize royalty in common dress, his mistake was natural and his surprise at seeing the empress recognize him, must have been great. Similar mistakes as to the status of the poor of this world are often made, and there will be similar surprise at the last great day, when those among them who are rich in faith are recognized of God and welcomed to the heavenly mansions. (James 2:5.)

* Published by the Bureau of Supplies, First National Bank building, New Haven, Conn. Price, $1.

THE APOCALYPTIC WAR.

By Dr. J. H. Todd.*

The Dragon Who Makes War—Represents Satan Himself—Who the Persecuted Are—The Remnant Left in Jerusalem—The Instruments Employed—Two Beasts from the Sea and Earth Respectively—The First Beast Invested with Satanic Power—His Character—The Second Beast Co-ordinate—Can Work Miracles—Compels Worship—Imposes a Mark—The End of the War.

AFTER the dragon, who is expressly called the Devil and Satan, is cast out of heaven into the earth, he is represented as persecuting with great wrath, the woman who had brought forth the man child. (Rev. 12: 1-6.) And after the woman had escaped into the wilderness, he turns his fury against "the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." The prophecy, signifies that after the occupation of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, the great mass of the Jewish people will be compelled to evacuate the promised land, and will be preserved by some singular providence, in the wilderness "where she hath a place prepared for her of God, and where she shall be nourished, safe from the power of her enemies, during the whole continuance of the persecution. We learn that at the period to which we suppose these prophecies to refer, when the Gentiles should tread down the holy city, and the abomination of desolation shall stand in the holy place, there shall be as well as from Jerusalem, into the mountains, occasioned by the urgent and overwhelming pressure of some sudden danger, such as is indicated in the Apocalypse, "and the dragon cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood." The prophecy supposes a remnant of the woman's seed to be left exposed to the fury of the dragon, after the flight of the woman; and it describes this remnant as consisting of those "which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." "The dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed." The circumstances of this war are detailed in Revelation 13; the instruments by which it shall be carried on, and the limits within which it will be restrained by the protecting Providence of God over His Church.

A Flight From Judæa,

The Instruments Employed

by the dragon, in this his great wrath against the woman and her seed, are represented to the Apostle under the figure of two Beasts, of which one was seen to rise up out of the sea, and the other out of the earth.

The first of these Beasts is described as "having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy." Now it is remarkable that the dragon, when he was first seen by the Apostle, was seen with the same number of heads and horns as this Beast: but the crowns of the dragon were upon his heads, and were, therefore, but seven in number, whereas the crowns of the Beast were on his horns, and were, therefore ten. This circumstance evidently denotes some close and mysterious connection between the dragon, who is expressly said to be the devil and Satan, and the Beast here exhibited to the Apostle: and this is indeed expressly stated in the prophecy, for we read: "And the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority."

The prophecy goes on to describe the character and actions of this formidable enemy of the truth and of the people of God. First, it is expressly revealed that he shall establish a system of idolatry over the whole earth, the objects of idolatrous worship being the dragon and the Beast himself. A second characteristic of the Beast is blasphemy of the most awful character.

We are further told, thirdly, that "it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them." Fourthly, the duration of this persecution of the saints is limited; "power was given unto him to continue, forty and two months."

This fixes the appearance of this Beast to the same chronological period in which, as we have seen, the holy city shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, and the woman preserved in the wilderness from the face of the Serpent. And we may infer, that, at the end of this time, the Beast shall himself be destroyed and killed with the sword; for it is added, "he that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints." (Ver. 10.)

It follows from these characteristics of this great enemy of the saints, that the power foretold must be identical with that predicted under the emblem of the little horn, in the prophecies of Daniel 7. For they coincide, as you will perceive, in their actions and in their duration; both being characterized by idolatry, blasphemy against God, and persecution of the saints: and both being in existence for the some period of "a time, and times, and the dividing of a time," or as it is expressed in the Apocalypse, for forty and two months or three years and a half.

The Second Instrument

to be used by the Dragon in this awful war is a Beast who, as the Apostle saw, came up out of the earth as the first Beast came out of the sea. Of this Beast it is said that he had "two horns like a lamb," and that he spake as a dragon" (ver. 11); and he is elsewhere called "the false prophet" (chap. 19: 20; 22: 10). His character and actions are thus described in the vision before us: First, his power is co-ordinate with that of the first Beast: "he exerciseth all the power of the first Beast before him," i.e., in his presence, or before his face. Secondly, he shall have power to work miracles. "And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men, and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the Beast" (chap. 13: 13, 14). Thirdly, it is further stated that the object of the miracles performed by this second Beast shall be to promote the idolatrous worship of the first Beast; "he causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first Beast, whose deadly wound was healed" (Rev. 13: 12).

Fourthly, he shall also impose "a mark" upon all the followers of his idolatry, to be impressed upon their foreheads, or upon their hands; and this mark shall be closely connected with that commercial character, which as we learn from a subsequent vision, shall be one of the distinguishing features of the kingdom of the beast. "And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or on their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had that mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name" (ver. 16, 17).

We learn from another passage of the Apocalypse, that these two beasts shall perish together by the same doom; "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone" (chap. 19: 20). The power of dominion of these beasts will be chiefly exercised

Among the Gentiles.

Of the first beast, it is said that, "power was given him over all kindreds and tongues, and nations; and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the Book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (chap. 13: 7-8).

On the whole then, we see from this prophecy, if the view I have taken of it be correct, that in the latter days when the Gentiles shall have fallen away into the great apostasy, and the candlestick of the Christian Church shall be removed from amongst them [at the Rapture] the Jewish nation, after their restoration to the Promised Land, shall again be subjected to fearful persecutions, and the great body of them forced to abandon Judæa, and to take refuge in "a place prepared for them of God," where they shall be preserved "until the indignation be overpast;" that a formidable power shall then arise, headed by

Two Remarkable Leaders,

who shall fix their seat and establish their authority among the apostate Gentiles, setting up a gross blasphemous system of idolatry, persecuting the saints, the holy people and putting all to death, whether Jew or Gentile, small or great, who shall refuse to conform to the idolatrous worship that shall be the then established religion of the world; that one at least of these blasphemous potentates shall have power to work miracles, whereby he shall deceive them that dwell on the earth; and that Antichrist's kingdom which shall thus be set up on the ruins of the Gentile Church, and, in open defiance of everything Divine and sacred, shall be destroyed only by the immediate presence and sudden appearing of Him, "out of whose mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it He should smite the nations; who shall rule them with a rod of iron; and who treadeth the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God."

But if it be true, as I have endeavored to show, and as the ancient Christians unanimously believed, that the purport of the Apocalypse is to forewarn us of a fearful trial of our faith which is yet to come, which is, perhaps, at hand; that it predicts an apostasy and the prevalence of errors, in comparison with which all former apostasy and heresy and error, great and awful as they have been, will sink into insignificance; that it predicts a persecution of such bitter intensity, and of such universal extent, that all former persecutions of the Christian name will become as nothing; and that it teaches us to look for a deliverance of the Church out of this fiery trial, not from any human aid or power, but from the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ Himself; then, surely, my brethren, the question whether these things are so or not—the question whether or not this be the real testimony of Holy Scripture, and the mind of Him by whose inspiration the Apocalypse was given is a question which demands the most serious and unprejudiced examination from every Christian.

A BUDDHIST PRIEST CONVERTED.

IN South Ceylon a remarkable conversion has recently occurred. The Rev. John Scott, who has just returned from that land on a visit, says that a very promising work is going on there among the Singalese, Mohammedan, and Tamil people. One of the most notable of the new converts is a Buddhist priest who came to the missionary's house to talk with him. "He had been to a school," says Mr. Scott, "and had been taught to read the New Testament. I did not seem to do him any good at the time. Afterward, at the wish of his parents, he entered the Buddhist priesthood. He was ordained in their manner, and then a strange influence came upon him. We know what it was—it was the influence of the Spirit of God, and it made him very uneasy and anxious about what would become of him after death. He applied to the priests in the monastery, but they could give him no satisfaction, and he became much distressed in mind. One day a villager came and brought him some little colored papers, and said that we were preaching in the open-air from the doctrine found in these papers, and asked if the people might read them. He said 'leave them with me; I cannot tell till I have read them.' He found Christ was held forth in them as the hope in life and after death, but he could gain no further light from these papers. Then one day he had a newspaper put into his hand in Singalese, and found that it had been

*This is an extract from a sermon preached by the eminent divine fifty years ago, and published in this month's Prophetic News, which, besides, contains the following articles: "The Lord is Coming" by Rev. W. Haslam; "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms of the Roman Empire," by Benjamin W. Newton; "The Great Day of Christ's Return," by Thomas Jones; "Future Translation of Christians at Christ's Second Advent," by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Mass.; etc., etc. Price 6 cents, including postage; seventy cents a year. Subscriptions may be sent to Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York.

ated at the Wesleyan mission Press of Colombo. He said: I must go there. He came a long, difficult, and dangerous journey, because the Buddhists had known what he was about and would have prevented him. He came to the house, and the result was that the following day he gave up his yellow robes and formally renounced Buddhism. That night I sent him one of our local preachers to a distant village, where they were having special services. I heard the Gospel preached for the first time in his life, and afterward there was a meeting in which inquirers were asked to come forward, and he came forward and found peace with God. He stayed a little while with me and I sent him out as far as I could to native Christian churches, and he returned saying he had believed before that the Singalese could be so bright, cheerful, and loving." On the 1st Sunday I baptized him in the presence of the congregation in Colombo. I sent for him immediately before leaving Ceylon, and was thankful that he was standing firm.

LAWFUL WORK ON THE SABBATH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Lesson for July 6; Luke 13: 10-17; Golden Text Matt. 12: 12.

Common but Heathenish Idea of Suffering—The Carnal Spirit of Condemnation—A Woman Imprisoned in Her Own Body—The Loosing of Her—The Indignation of the Ruler of the Synagogue—The Sabbath of Rest in God—The Healing was at, Not Work—The Spirit of Infirmity.

THE teaching of Jesus was always in opposition to the traditions of the day, which were in accordance with the Word of God. "The men of the Pharisees." (Luke 12: 14.) "The tradition of the elders" (Mark 7: 5), found no joy at His hands. We are redeemed with precious blood from (our) vain manner of life handed down from (our) fathers." (1 Pet. 3, 19, R. V.) and saved "from this present world, or age." (Gal. 1: 11.) One of the notions which was very common, and which had strong hold on people, both in Christian and heathen lands, at the present time, is that of fortune as a sure sign of the culpability of a person who suffer, a heathenish idea which is up the heart's compassion for suffering. There were some present with Jesus, who told of those "Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices"—probably one of the numerous factions which had opposed the Roman government. No doubt their very words were of voice was condemnatory of those executioners, but Jesus left them no ground to stand on. He said, "Suppose ye that those Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, nay; except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. These eighteen upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell at Jerusalem? I tell you, nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

The spirit of condemnation is a carnal spirit, who possess it "walk as men" and are "carnal." (1 Cor. 3: 3.) They which "are carnal" can "restore" a fallen brother "in the spirit of meekness" (Gal. 6: 1); they are released from the spirit of judging; they are released, not only from sin, but "from among men" and "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth;" "like their Lord," in their mouth was no guile, for they are without fault before the throne of God." (Rev. 14: 4, 5.) The whole law of which the children of Israel were witnesses was summed up in the words, "Thou shalt love," and yet the most harsh, ungentle, condemnatory spirit was found in them. And He was teaching in one of these synagogues on the Sabbath. And behold, there was a man which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could not wise lift up herself." The poor woman used her remaining strength to find her way to the synagogue, where she would meet Jesus, and hear His word. Her very presence was an appeal to Jesus. He was anointed to teach "liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prisons to them that are bound" (Isa. 51: 1); and of all prisoners, those who are imprisoned in their own bodies by physical helplessness are the truest. There may be the will to walk, but the limbs cannot obey; there may be the effort to feed themselves, but the stiffened hands hang powerless, and they must be dependent upon others for everything. "When Jesus saw her, He called her (R. V.), and said unto her, woman thou art loosed from thine infirmity."

Thou art Loosed.

Imagine an eighteen-year's-long prisoner who had thought himself a prisoner for life, accustomed to his narrow dwelling, hoping for nothing, seeking for nothing outside, and one day the doors are unexpectedly opened and the only official who would have sufficient authority to declare it, appears upon the scene and says to her, thou art loosed! Before she could recover from the joyous import of His words, "He lays His hands on her," and immediately the curved spine returned to its straightness, and the tightened muscles relaxed. The creative hand has been the restoring hand, and "she glorified God." It was an interruption perhaps, to the regular order of things in the synagogue, but how glad everybody would be; how they would surround her, and take her by the hand; how the women would embrace her in their joy! But no; the ruler of the synagogue, instead of joining the woman in glorifying God, "answered with indignation because that Jesus had healed on the Sabbath day"; and ignoring the poor woman altogether, "He said unto the people, there are six days in which men ought to work; in them, therefore, come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath day."

Again, Jesus had to correct the leaven of the Pharisees and the tradition of the elders, who held to outside forms, and all which did not demand a real change of heart and mind. The Lord then answered him, and said, "Thou hypocrite! Doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound to these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?"

Let us go back a little. Jesus loosed her by His word, without waiting, either for her consent, or for that of the elder of the synagogue. He came to proclaim liberty, His office is to make us free. Bondage either to sin or sickness, to man or circumstances, should not continue to exist in the life of a child of God. "If the Son therefore, shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8: 36.) He has set us free from sin, "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace." (Rom. 6: 12.) Therefore, by right of the death and resurrection of Christ, we are loosed from sin, and have but to believe it. "He hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath transported us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. 1: 13). But of course if we do not yield ourselves to His loving power, we are not loosed. He has loosed us from men's service. "Ye are bought with a price, be not ye the servants of men." (Cor. 7: 23.) We have and have a spirit of infirmity which bows us down under other men's opinions, or the power of their will or prejudices. We are loosed from the bondage which would bow us down under oppressing circumstances. He has loosed us by His own word, which tells us that "all things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. 8: 28.) If we are bowed under them, it is because we do not believe He has set us free by Himself taking the responsibility, and because we have not really cast all our care on Him, believing that He cares for us. (1 Pet. 5: 9.) He says, "Thou art loosed," but, by our unbelief, we are bound still. He has loosed us from sickness by bearing it Himself. "Himself took our infirmities and bore our sicknesses" (Matt. 8: 17), and most surely, as we trust Him, He unlooses our bonds, in some cases, by so lifting us above the weakness or pain, that there is nothing of bondage in it, like the men in the fiery furnace; and in others by completely healing. There are some who seem to need a touch, like this woman, a word, and then a touch: some have heard the word, but have not yet experienced the touch of healing.

No Right to be in Bondage

And the Question of the Sabbath?

Was the ruler of the synagogue right? Jesus in replying to him, not only argued, "Ought not this woman be loosed? And, even more, ought she not to be loosed on the Sabbath day?" The whole teaching of the Sabbath day tends to one great purpose,—that God shall have His rest in man, and that man shall have his rest in God. Every seventh year was to be a year of rest among His people, they were neither to sow nor reap (Lev. 25: 4), and thus the lesson of trust in Him found exercise, the people were to practice trusting God for the supply of their temporal need, for if the sixth year were a scarce year, and they must not sow in the seventh year, they risked famine, and thus the temptation would be great to violate these commands. If they trusted God, they would obey, and leave the responsibility of feeding them to Him. If they could not trust Him they would fail to keep His Sabbath, and this was the case,—they thought they could provide for themselves better than He could for them; so that perpetually we read in the prophets of this plea of God against them, "They kept not My Sabbath," or, "They despised My Sabbath," and the captivity in Babylon was to last, "until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths, for as long as she lay desolate she kept Sabbath to fulfil threescore and ten years." (II Chron. 36: 21.) The idea of the Sabbath was that the people should cease from their own works, "as God did from His" (Matt. 4: 10), and should trust Him. "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day, and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words, then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord," etc. (Isa. 58: 13, 14.)

In healing this woman on the Sabbath day, Jesus was not disobeying the law, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." There was no work, but rest in His words, "Thou art loosed." There was no work but rest in the laying of His hands upon her. There was rest for her from her long suffering, and rest for the people from the pain it would be to them to see her bound. It was all rest. No instruments were used, no bandages, no doctor was sought in the midst of the service which was being offered to God. Satan was conquered in a daughter of Abraham, i. e., one who is "of faith" (Gal. 3: 7.) It was God's work, no man could have wrought it.

But what is this

Spirit of Infirmity

which possessed the poor woman? Do we ever see anything like it in our day? Every invalid will know that there are times when they are quite above the suffering, and the weakness which their condition of body causes them, and there are other times when the pain and weakness conquer them, when they cannot rise above them, they are overpowered; it seems impossible to pray, impossible to hope, they have gone under the trouble. This is a spirit of sickness. It is the same with an unclean spirit when it gets possession; the man or woman who is possessed by it is under a power he cannot resist. It is the same with a drunkard, an opium slave, etc. But Christ Jesus has given all that believe power over unclean spirits, and all these powers of sin, and self, and sickness. He can bring us up from under them, and always will when He is trusted. But He always does it on the Sabbath day, i. e., when we are in rest of soul. "We which have believed do enter into rest." (Heb. 4: 3.) But while we try to do battle against it, we are helpless, but when we are at rest, then God works.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

THE GOSPEL ON THE WING.

It is said to be against the law in all our cities to hold religious services on the public thoroughfares. Without molestation, razor-strop men and quack-medicine venders may gather their audiences; but if a man with no idea of personal gain dare to take a stand on a dry-goods-box, and tell the story of Christ and heaven, he is a criminal. Now I have to say if there is a law forbidding Gospel proclamation on the streets, while the venders of a new style of soap or preparation for mending broken dishes may by the hour harangue the people on the street corners, then it is time that the law was changed. The Christian people of our cities have submitted too long to this invasion of their rights. Who ever heard of any damage done by preaching Christ on the streets? If our cities are ever to be redeemed, and our abandoned population reformed, it will be by this evangelism on the wing. The majority of the inhabitants of our cities will not come inside the churches. If the Gospel do not meet these outside on the street it will never meet them at all. We have got to get back to the way it was done when John Wesley and the Fletchers and George Whitefield preached in the open air. This summer there ought to be a camp-meeting on every street of every city in America. The world is dying for lack of it. Christ says, as of old: "Go out into the highways and the hedges." The Founder of our Christianity preached the most of His sermons outside of synagogue and consecrated building. The model sermon of the centuries had a mountain for a pulpit. It is all right that we have our neatly appareled assemblages on the Sabbath, seated in cushioned pews under adorned rafters. But are the decorous worshippers thus gathered to be the only ones who shall get the advantages of the Gospel which is the world's necessity? I call upon the Christian lawyers of these cities to report on this question, and by wise organization move for the repeal of any statute that runs into the face of our glorious Christianity. By canvass of the city of Philadelphia, to discover the truthfulness or falsity of the charge that the attorneys of that city were nearly all antagonistic to the Christian religion, it was found out that nine-tenths of them were either members of churches or respecters of religion, on Christ's side, and we appeal to the men of the Bar and Bench to see to it that there shall not be a point where it shall be a criminality for a man to tell our dying populations the way out of their sorrow and sins. The time will come when our churches will be only the headquarters, or the war barracks, from which we shall send forth the good soldiers of Jesus Christ to do battle everywhere, instead of being, as many of our churches are, select Pullman cars to take a few through passengers, sound asleep, to the Grand Central Depot of the celestial city. I am jealous more than I can tell, of this attempt to stop street-preaching. It cost too much to establish religious liberty in this country to have it interfered with. "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel," says Christ—into the factory, the engine house, the club room, into the dark lane and the wide thoroughfare. Let every man, woman, and child, in these cities, know that Jesus died, and that the gate of heaven is wide open. With the Bible in one pocket and the hymn book in another pocket and a loaf of bread under your arm, go forth, and woe be to the law that forbids the fulfillment of your magnificent mission. The trouble is, we are trying to save this world in our own way as dictated by severest proprieties. If we have not the newest style of rifle we won't shoot, and if we have not the best style of rod and reel we won't fish. We will have to get down off our stilts and give up our finical and fastidious notion about the way things ought to be done, and, utterly reckless of everything but the results, go ahead to do our whole duty. Here we are in the evening of the Nineteenth Century, and vast multitudes about us as ignorant of their necessity as though the angels had never chanted over the Saviour's birth and the foundations of the world had not quaked at His martyrdom. God grant that the work may go on at such increased ratio that the few years that yet remain of this century may see the world's disenchantment. We may be nearer than we think to the sunburst of the millennium.

SUPPRESS THEM.

ONE of the grandest results of the Fulton Street prayer-meeting is the fact that all the devotional services of the country have been revolutionized. The tap of the bell of that historical prayer-meeting has shortened the prayers and exhortations of the Church universal. But since it has become the custom to throw open the meetings for remark and exhortation, there has been a jubilee among the religious bores who wander around pestering the churches. They talk long and loud in proportion as they have nothing to say. They empty on us several bushels of "Ohs" "Ahs." But they seldom get a chance, for we never throw the meetings open when we see they are there. We make such a close hedge of hymns and prayers that they cannot break into the garden. One of them we are free of because, one night, seeing him wiggle-waggle in his seat as if about to rise, we sent an elder to him to say that his remarks were not acceptable. The elder blushed and halted a little when we gave him the mission, but setting his teeth together he started for the offensive brother, leaned over the back of the pew and discharged the duty. We have never seen that brother since, but once in the street, and then he was looking the other way. By what right such men go about in ecclesiastical vagabondism to spoil the peace of devotional meetings it is impossible to tell. Either that nuisance must be abated or we must cease to "throw open our prayer-meetings for exhortation."

POLITICS AS A BUSINESS.

WHAT a most unsatisfactory life the life of professional politicians must be! The majority of them go from disappointment to disappointment. For every position there are at least a hundred candidates; hence, of necessity, ninety-nine applicants are disappointed. Do not suppose that all the complaints made up and down the land are founded in unadulterated patriotism. The simple fact is, the appointment is more than they can bear. As an inexorable law, we cannot have more than six Presidents in a generation. What a disappointing thing to seek the Presidency, when of the one thousand who think themselves qualified for the office only five men can get it! There is more probability that any of them will be stricken by lightning than that they will get to be President. If you, through love of city, or State, or nation, seek official position, go ahead; but if you seek it for a livelihood, or seek it for you make a terrible mistake. Always vote, always attend the caucus. Always use your influence for the betterment of the public interest. But he who enters politics as a profession, hoping from it to get famous and rich, is in all probability committing a blunder. Through all the wards, through all the townships, through all the States there are people sore of head and sick of heart, cast down and misanthropic. The time was when men were so far from objecting to seeking that they had by penalties to be compelled to take office. The Court of Plymouth in 1632, enacted that "whoever should receive the office of Governor should pay twenty pounds sterling, unless he should be chosen twice successively; and whoever should refuse to take the office of counsellor or magistrate should pay ten pounds." No more such compulsion is necessary, and the scramble is terrific, notwithstanding all the peril financial, social, moral, and eternal. Macaulay wrote, "Every friend of a man which a man may have becomes precarious soon as he engages in politics." Thomas Win, the great orator of Ohio, said to a man who wanted him to get him official position in Washington: "Accept a clerkship here and sink at once all independence. I may give you a place to-day, and I can kick you out to-morrow, and there is another man over my shoulder at the White House who can kick me out, and then you and I can kick him out, and so on. But if you own one acre of land it is your own, and your cabin is your castle. You are sovereign, and you will feel it in every tick of your pulse, and every day of your life will assure me of your thanks for having thus secured you." But if you have a mission in public affairs, advance confidently. Whatever our duty findeth to do in any department of social, civic, or religious duty, let us do it. We must have to do for this world's improvement, and must do quickly or never do it at all. Napoleon said that the Austrians failed at Rivoli because they did not know the value of minutes.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Proposal from Mr. Blaine was introduced to Congress with the President's approval Thursday last. It is nothing less than free trade with Central and South America. Considering the quarter from which the proposal emanates and the vigorous speeches in favor of protection that Mr. Blaine has delivered, the suggestion is astonishing. The debates in the American Conference clearly proved that the reason why our neighbors bought so little from us, and so much from Europe, was that they could send their products to Europe in exchange, while their purchases from us must be largely paid for in gold. Not that we did not send their products, but because our tariff forced the consumer as to make them practically uneconomical. This was understood, but it was supposed that even the desire of closer relations with our neighbors was not so strong as our reluctance to abandon the principle of protection. It is gratifying to find that so uncompromising an advocate of protection and so influential a statesman as Mr. Blaine, desires a change. He recommends that the President be authorized to declare our ports open to the products of any of the Central and South American Republics, which will admit our products on the same terms. It is difficult to understand how this proposal can be consistent with Mr. Blaine's principles, but it is clear evidence of his sagacity and patriotism.

The Changes that the Senate Proposes to make in the Tariff Bill passed by the House, are not so radical as was anticipated. The measure came from the Committee on June 18 and was carefully studied by the Senators. The chief change is in sugar, the duty on which should, the committee think, be increased. Other articles of minor importance are placed by the Committee at a lower rate. The change which is sure to cause the greatest opposition is that in respect to works of art. The House placed them on the free list, but the Senate Committee reserves the duty of thirty per cent. Should the Senate endorse its Committee's recommendation there will be a dispute between the two Houses which a Conference Committee will find difficult to settle. On the whole, however, the prospects of Tariff legislation on the lines of the McKinley bill have improved since the report is made public, though there is still considerable doubt whether the bill will reduce the revenue to the extent claimed for it and whether the changes it makes will really remove the burdens which are restricting commerce.

The Politicians are Becoming Awakened to the fact that the new ballot reform law necessitates some educational effort on their part. It strikes at the root of ring rule and provides facilities for independent movements which are their special dread. It also may be used prejudicially to the public interest by the multiplication of tickets which at a critical time may divert support from really beneficial projects. So long as there are men with special hobbies their support may be drawn to a ticket shrewdly prepared with a view to the hobby. It would be harmless so far as the specialty is concerned; but it might succeed in depleting the strength of the party to which the supporters naturally cling. In some cases one hundred persons are sufficient to put a ticket in the field and if these independent tickets are numerous the vote will be frittered away and the honest voter confused. The new law like other things may be abused and it will be necessary to make the public understand that it is possible to have it applied by its enemies to defeat the very object for which it was enacted.

The Advice of the Secretary of the Treasury to silver has been rejected by a formal vote of the Senate. Mr. Windom finds himself inundated with silver dollars, which the people do not want, and will not have. Yet by law he is required to go on coining two millions of them every month. They go into the treasury vaults, and if they are sent out into circulation they go back again. Mr. Windom therefore proposed to suspend the coinage until there was a demand for it; but, in order to disarm the opposition of the silver men, he proposed to continue the purchase of silver and even increase it. He wished to keep it in bullion, uncoined, and to issue notes against it which could be redeemed in bullion at the market rate. A Bill embodying his suggestion passed the House with some modifications, but when it came up for consideration in the Senate on June 17th, it was so changed as to have an effect precisely opposite to that desired by Mr. Windom. Not only did it provide for unlimited coinage of silver, but the silver was to be coined free of charge. This rebuke to the administration in the Senate was due to sectional combination. Fifteen Republican Senators from the West voted with the Democrats, while only three Democrats went over to the Republican side. The House will probably reject these changes, and the expectation that it will do so, allays the apprehension that would otherwise be aroused in commercial circles.

The Report of an Outbreak of Cholera in Spain startled the whole civilized world last week. The plague first appeared at Puebla de Rugat in the Province of Valencia where some soldiers from Northern Africa had been quartered. It was alleged that they had carried the infection, but the fact that the first victims of the disease all resided in one street, which had been opened for repaving, indicated that the soldiers had less to do with the outbreak than had the soil. The greater part of the inhabitants fled in terror when the nature of the disease became known, and carried the infection to the environs. The Spanish Government sent a commission to investigate and it reported that there were forty cases of pronounced Asiatic cholera and there had been many deaths. A cordon of soldiers was placed around the infected district and it is hoped that the disease will be localized and stamped out. Portugal, Italy and France have, however, taken the precaution of a quarantine against Spanish ships.

The Discovery of another Nihilist Plot Against the life of the Czar is reported. Three weeks ago he and his family were in their retreat at Gatschina and were not expected to return to St. Petersburg for some months. Suddenly, however the imperial household quitted Gatschina in such haste that no luggage was taken with them. They went to the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg. No reason was given for the unexpected removal; but last week it was explained by a press correspondent, who says that the St. Petersburg police have discovered a widespread conspiracy against the Czar's life. The imperial palace at Gatschina is undermined. The guards at all the palaces have been doubled. Several arrests have been made.

The Sultan of Turkey is Disturbed by Symptoms of revolution. An agitation has developed among the aristocracy of the empire against the extravagant expenditure of the imperial palace. Protests are being made against the course of the Sultan in entertaining foreigners with banquets, and fetes, and ignoring the intense misery in the country, and the sufferings of the Moslems. At a meeting of notables it was declared that the moment had arrived to restore the old regime, as alone conducive to the greatness and prosperity of the empire. The Sultan is alarmed and suspects that the movement was prompted by persons in his court. The gates of the Yildiz Kiosk have been closely guarded, and ingress and egress have been prohibited. Several civil and military officials have been arrested.

England and Germany Have Apparently agreed upon an amicable settlement of their claims on Eastern Africa. An important concession on the part of England has paved the way for the adjustment. For nearly a century England has held possession of the small island of Heligoland, in the North Sea. It was ceded to her by the Danes. It is practically of no value, but in the event of a war with Germany it would be of immense strategic importance. This fact was recognized on both sides, and Germany desired to gain possession of it. Lord Salisbury agreed to cede it to her, subject to the approval of the English Parliament, and in return, Germany agreed to certain concessions in Africa. The general public does not understand the value of those concessions, but the fact that Mr. Stanley declares the bargain a good one for England, carries great weight. He says that it adds 500,000 square miles of African Territory to the British possessions. Speaking on the subject at a public meeting, after the agreement was made public, he dwelt with enthusiasm upon the prospects in Africa, and said he was confident that if he could muster all the chiefs of the regions that England had acquired they would acquiesce in the opinion that the date of the agreement would be a red letter day in the African calendar. He was sure that when the news spread a grand feast day would be held throughout the interior of Africa.

BRIEF NOTES.

Prof. Moffat, of Princeton Theological Seminary, is dead. He was seventy-nine years of age.

Major M. L. Blanton, of Nashville, Tenn., is doing successful evangelistic work in North Mississippi.

Mr. S. H. Hadley of the Jerry McAuley Mission, Water Street, New York, asks us to acknowledge his receipt of two dollars for the mission from B. S.

A Summer school of theology will be conducted this season at Round Lake, by the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Butts, president of Drew Theological Seminary.

Joseph Hillman, the leader of the Troy Praying Band, died on June 14, aged sixty-seven years. Mr. Hillman organized the Round Lake Camp-Meeting Association, and was its president for several years.

Evangelist Bliss is holding a series of summer night meetings at the First Church, Chicago, and preached there last Sunday morning and evening. The meetings were held all last week and are to be continued.

Evangelist Bischoff has been holding successful meetings at Appanoose, Mich. The attendance has been large and many have come long distances to hear the Gospel. Already more than thirty persons have made profession of faith in Christ.

One of the teachers secured by Mr. D. L. Moody for his Summer School for College Students at Northfield, is the Rev. W. R. Mowll, of All Souls' Church, London, England. Mr. Mowll is a graduate of Cambridge, of high repute for learning and piety.

The revival at Seventeenth Street M. E. Church is still continued, with manifest tokens of the Divine blessing. It is being conducted by the Rev. H. R. Keates, E. S. Johnson (formerly Joseph Hillman's favorite solo singer) and J. H. Cannon, and his singing evangelists.

One of the delegates at the recent Temperance Congress, in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, was Rev. Lorenzo Waugh, of San Francisco, Cal. Mr. Waugh is eighty-two years of age. He gave Bishop Harris his first license to exhort, in the Ohio Conference in 1834.

A Summer convocation of Christian workers of different denominations will be held in July and August, at Western Springs, a suburb of Chicago, Ill. The Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, Rev. A. B. Simpson, Mrs. E. V. Baker, Miss Scovil, the Rev. R. L. Marsh and others will take part in the meetings.

Bishop J. M. Thoburn, of India, is on his way to this country for a brief visit. Several matters in connection with the extension of his work require personal consultation with the General Committee. He reports remarkable success, and prospects unprecedentedly bright. He expects to arrive about July 1st.

The annual pilgrimage of the Brooklyn Tabernacle Congregation will this year be to Watkin's Glen and Niagara Falls. The party will leave the Bridge Dock, Brooklyn, on July 2, at 8 o'clock A.M. Applications for tickets and information may be sent to Mr. John Wood, 223 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, or any of the trustees.

Mr. E. P. Telford has left New York for a tour of six weeks among the churches in Nova Scotia. Afterward he hopes to attend several camp-meetings. Among them those at Hamilton and Framingham, Mass., and Northport, Me., in which, with others in New Hampshire, he expects to take part by invitation of the managers. Letters in relation to his fall work may be sent to him at the office of this journal.

A call for a convocation for prayer, at Northfield, Mass., has been issued by Mr. D. L. Moody. It will commence on July 31st, and continue ten days. Mr. Sankey and Mr. Stebbins will have charge of the musical exercises. Mr. Moody writes: "All Christians who long for a closer communion with God and more spiritual wisdom, zeal and power to do His work, are most heartily invited to assemble with us. Board may be obtained at the Seminary buildings during the time of the meetings for one dollar and fifty cents a day, to secure which please address me. Accommodations may also be obtained at the new hotel, 'The Northfield,' by applying to the manager, Mr. Samuel Grigg."

THE SPARKLING FOUNTAIN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee." Ps. 5: 11.

Christ's Legacy—Peace and Joy—I. The Kind of Joy Allotted to Believers—Universal to All Who Trust—Constant at all Times—To be Manifested—With Variations—Logical—From the Heart—II. The Reason for Joy—The God in Whom he Trusts—Because of What God Does—The Discoveries Faith Makes—The Promises It Believes—III. The Failures Reported—Deep Spiritual Joy Not Perceived—Some Professors Only Pretenders—Unhappiness Caused by Others—IV. Arguments for Joy.

"THE Lord doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel." There is an ancient difference which He made in His eternal purpose; and this is seen in every item of the covenant of grace. "The Lord hath set apart him that is godly for Himself"; but it is also written, "The foolish shall not stand in their sight: thou hatest all workers of iniquity." You that have believed are of the house of Israel, and heirs according to promise; for they that are of faith are the true seed of faithful Abraham. See that ye make manifest this difference by the holiness of your lives. "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing." Evermore display this difference by the joyfulness of your spirits. The servants of the Lord should wear the royal livery: that livery is made of the fine cloth of holiness, trimmed with the lace of joy. Take care that you exhibit both holiness of character and joyfulness of spirit; for where these two things are in us, and abound, they make us that we be not barren nor unfruitful. To us there should be joy, strikingly to contrast with the unrest of the unbeliever. If you walk in the light as God is in the light, go forth and let men see the brightness of your countenances, and take knowledge of you that you have been with Jesus, and have learned of Him His gracious calm as well as His holiness.

The subject for this morning is joy, the joy of faith, the joy which is the fruit of the Spirit from the root of trust in God. I want you to see not only the sparkling fountain of joy, but to drink deep draughts of it; yes, and drink all the week, and all the month, and all the year, and all the rest of your lives, both in time and in eternity.

I. First, let us speak a little upon the kind of joy which is Allotted to Believers:

"Let us all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee." Note, first, concerning this joy, that it is to be universal to all who trust: "Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice." This is not only for the healthy, but for the sickly; not only for the successful, but for the disappointed; not only for those who have the bird in the hand, but for those who only see it in the bush. Let all rejoice! If you have but a little faith, yet if you are trusting in the Lord, you have a right to joy. It may be, your joy will not raise you so high as it might do if your faith were greater; but still, where faith is true, it gives sure ground for joy. O ye babes in grace, ye little children, you that have been newly converted, and sadly feel your feebleness, yet rejoice; for the Lord will bless them that fear Him, "both small and great!"

This joy, in the next place, is to be as constant as to time as it is universal as to persons. "Let them ever shout for joy." Do not be content that a good time in the morning should be followed by dreariness in the afternoon. Do not cultivate an occasional delight, but aim at perpetual joy. To be happy at a revival meeting, and then go home to groan is a poor business. We should "feel like singing all the time." The believer has abiding arguments for abiding consolation. There is never a time when the saint of God has not great cause for gladness; and if he never doubts and worries till He has a justifiable reason for distrust, He will never doubt nor worry.

Next, let your joy be manifested. "Let them ever shout for joy." Shouting is an enthusiastic utterance, a method which men use when they have won a victory, when they divide the spoil when they bear home the harvest, when they tread the vintage, when they drain the goblet. Believers, you may shout for joy with unreserved delight. Some religionists shout, and we would not wish to stop them; but we wish certain of them knew better

What They Are Shouting For.

The shouting need not always be done in a public service, or it might hinder devout hearing; but there are times and places where a glorious outburst of enthusiastic joy would quicken life in all around. The ungodly are not half so restrained in their blasphemy as we are in our praise. How is this? They go home making night hideous with their yells: are we never to have an outbreak of consecrated delight? Yes, we will have our high days and holidays, and we will sing and shout for joy till even the heathen say, "The Lord hath done great things for them."

This joy is to be repeated with variations. Joy blends many colors in its one ray of light. At times it is quiet, and sits still beneath a weight of glory. I have known it weep, not salt drops, but sweet showers. Have you never cried because of your joy in the Lord? Sometimes joy labors for expression till it is ready to faint; and anon it sings till it rivals the angels. Singing is the natural language of joy; but oftentimes silence suits it even better. Our joy abides in Christ, whether we are quiet or shouting, whether we fall at our Lord's feet as dead, or lean on His bosom in calm delight.

This joy is logical. When I was a child, and went to school, I remember learning out of a book called "Why and Because." Things one learns as a child stick in the memory; and therefore I like a text which has a "because" in it. Here it is: "Let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them." Emotions are not fired by logic; and yet for the flame. A man may be sad, if he cannot explain his sadness, or he may be greatly glad, though he cannot set forth the reasons for his joy. The joy of a believer in God has a firm foundation: it is not the fabric of a vision.

Reasons Furnish Fuel

Once more, the happiness is a thing of the heart; for the text runs thus—"Let them that love thy name be joyful in thee." We love God. I trust I am speaking to many who could say, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Is it not a very happy emotion? What is sweeter than to say, with the tears in one's eyes,—"My God, I love thee!" To sit down and have nothing to ask for, no words to utter, but only for the soul to love—is not this heavenly? Measureless depths of unutterable love are in the soul, and in those depths we find the pearl of joy. When the heart is taken up with so delightful an object as the ever-blessed God, it feels a joy which cannot be rivalled.

II. Now I come to the second head:

The Ground and Reason of holy joy. I am bound to speak upon this matter: for I have told you that the joy of the believer is logical, and can be defended by facts and so indeed it is. For first, the believer's joy arises from the God in whom he trusts. "Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice." My nature gets all its wants supplied, all its desires gratified, when it rests in God. Oh, you that never trusted in God in Christ Jesus, you do not know what real happiness means! You may search all the theatres in London, and ransack all the music-halls, and clubs, and public-houses, but you will find no happiness in any of their mirth, or show, or wine. True joy dwells where dwells the living God, and nowhere else. In your own home with God, even though that home be only a single room, and your meal be very scanty, you will see more of heaven than in the palaces of kings! Have God for your sole trust, and you shall never lack for joy.

Our joy arises next from what the Lord does for us. "Let them shout for joy, because thou defendest them." God always guards His people whoever may attack them. "The Lord is thy keeper." Angels are our guardians, providence is our protector; but God Himself is the preserver of His chosen. "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday." No fortress guards the soldier as well as God guards His redeemed. The God of our salvation will defend us from all evil, He will defend our souls. "Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident."

I have pointed to the deep sources from which the joy of the believer wells up; but I must also add, it is by faith that this joy comes to us. Faith makes joyful discoveries. I speak to those of you who have faith. When you first believed in Christ you found that and knew that you were forgiven. What a joy is justification by faith, when it is well understood! What bliss also to learn our union with Christ! Believers are members of His body of His flesh, and of His bones. Because He lives we shall live also. One with Jesus! Wonderful discovery this! Equally full of joy is our adoption! "Beloved now are we the sons of God"; "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Faith then heaps fuel on the fire of our joy; for it keeps on making discoveries out of the Word of the Lord. The more you search the Scripture, and the nearer you live to God, the more you will enjoy of that great goodness which the Lord has laid up for them that fear Him.

You were Saved.

Faith perceives that affliction may be more precious as a test, acting, as doth the fire, when it shows what is pure gold and what is base metal. Faith joys in a test so valuable. Faith sees sweet love in every bitter cup. Faith knows that whenever she gets a black envelope from the heavenly post-office, there is treasure in it. When the Lord's black horses call at our door they bring us double loads of blessing. Up to this moment I, God's servant, beg to bear my unreserved testimony to the fact that it is good for me to have been afflicted. In spiritual life and knowledge and power, I have grown but little except when under the hand of trouble. I set my door open, and am half inclined to shut to pain and sickness and sadness, "Turn hither; for I know that you will leave a blessing behind. Come, crosses, if you will; for you always turn to crowns." Thus faith glories in tribulations also, and in the lion of adversity finds the honey of joy.

The Bank of Promises.

Moreover, faith believes great promises. It opens other wells of joy. I cannot stop to quote them to you this morning: the Book of the Lord is full of them. What more can the Lord do than He hath said? The promises of God are full, and as varied as they are full, and as sure as they are varied, and as rich as they are sure. "Exceeding great and precious promises." When I wrote "The Cheque Book of the Bank of Faith" I was at no loss to find a promise for every day in the year; the difficulty was what to leave out. When a man gets a promise from the hand of faith, and goes to God with it, he must rejoice.

Above all, faith has an eye to the eternal reward. She rejoices in her prospects. She takes into her hand the birds which to others are in the bush. To be with Christ in the glory-life is the joy of hope, the hope which maketh us ashamed. Our hope is no dream; as sure as we are here to-day, we who are trusting in Christ will be in heaven before long; for He prays that we may be with Him where He is, and may behold His glory. There is a crown of life laid up for you, which the righteous Judge will give you. Wherefore, have patience a little while. Bear still your cross. Put up with the difficulties of thy way, for the end is almost in sight. "The way may be rough, but it cannot be long: So we'll smooth it with hope, and cheer it with song."

We will look, for a minute or two, into a matter, which is

The Failures Reported
 earning this joy. I think I hear somebody "It is all very well for you to tell us that vers are joyful, and have logical reasons ladness; but some of them are about as as can be, and create dulness in others." obliged to speak very carefully here, for I afraid that certain Christians give cause for objection.

Let me say to some of you who love to raise tions, What do you know about this joy? you unbelievers? Well, then, you are out ight: you are not competent to judge. The a of believers you do not know, and with joy you cannot intermeddle. You have no tual taste or discernment, and what judg- can you form? A genuine believer may e happy as the angels, and yet you may not y his joy, because you are not in the secret. as! some professors of religion are mere enders, these have no joy of the Lord. To y out their pretence, these persons even ine that it is necessary to pull a long face o talk very solemnly, not to say dismally. r idea of religion is, that black is the color eaven. But, dear friends, we cannot pre- hypocrites arising; it is only a proof that religion is worth having. It would not pay ody to be a hypocrite unless there were igh genuine Christians to make the hypo- s pass current. Therefore, do not say too h about hypocritical weepers, lest you slan- true men.

The Sad Christians.
 ext, remember that some persons are on- tionally sad. They cried as soon as they were ; they cried when they cut their teeth; and have cried ever since. Their spirits are low down, and when the grace of God gets their hearts it lifts them a great deal to g them up to a decent level of joy. Think hat they would have been without it. Many d have died in despair, if it had not been aith. The grace of God has kept them up, ey would have lost their reason. I am sor- ere should be persons who have bad livers, le digestions, or irritated brains; but there uch. Pity them, even if you blame them. y must not so pity themselves as to make xuse for their unbelief; but we must re- ber that often the spirit truly is willing, butlesh is weak.

Moreover, I would like to say a very pointed g to some people who charge the saints undue sadness. May you not be guilty of ing them so! There is an unkind, morose, ed, drinking husband, and he says, "My a religion makes her miserable." No. It is her religion, but her husband. You are gh to make twenty people unhappy: you y you are; and therefore do not blame the woman, if, when she sees you, the tear is er eye. Alas! when she thinks of your go- down to hell, and knows that she will be ed from you for ever, the more she loves the more sad she is to think of you. "Oh," some wild boy here, "my mother is wretch- I do not wonder;

I Should be Wretched.
 if you were my son. If any of you are liv- ngodly lives, it makes your parents' heart : to see you going headlong to perdition. Is t abominable that a man should make an- r miserable, and then blame him for being If you were but saved, how your mother's ould brighten up! If your father saw boy turn to the Lord, he would be as happy e birds in spring. Speak tenderly on this ter lest you accuse yourself.

you say that some Christians are unhappy, t you not also admit that many of them are y happy? I was once waited upon by an en- iast who had a new religion to publish. bers of people have a crack which lets in light, and this man was going to convert to his new ideas. After I had heard him, I , "I have heard your story, will you hear e?" When I talked to him of my lot and portion in the love of a covenant God, and the safety of the believer in Christ, he said, "Now, sir, if you believe all this, you ought to be the happiest man in the world." I admitted that his inference was true; but then I said to him, what rather surprised him, "So I am; and I am going to be more so all the rest of my life." Surely, we ought to rejoice abundantly, dear friends, for ours is a happy lot. "Happy are the people whose God is the Lord."

IV. I close by mentioning the arguments for abounding in joy. You cannot argue a man into gladness, but you may possibly stir him up to see that which will make him happy. First, you see in my text

A Permit to be Glad:
 "Let all that put their trust in thee rejoice." You have here a ticket to the banquets of joy. You may be as happy as ever you like. You have divine permission to shout for joy. Yonder is the inner sanctuary of happiness. You cry, "May I come in?" Yes, if by faith you can grasp the text, "Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice." "But may I be happy?" asks one. "May I be glad? May I? Is there joy for me?" Do you trust in the Lord? Then you have your passport;

Travel in the Land of Light.
 But the text is not only a permit, it is a pre- cept. When it says, "Let them shout for joy," it means that they are commanded to do so. Blessed is that religion wherein it is a duty to be happy. Come, ye mournful ones, be glad. Ye discontented grumblers, come out of that dog- hole! Enter the palace of the King!

We have here more than a permit and a pre- cept, it is a prayer. David prays it, the Lord Jesus prays it by David. Let them rejoice, let them be joyful in thee! Will He not grant the prayer which He has inspired by causing us to rejoice through lifting upon us the light of His countenance? Pray for joy yourself, saying, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." 'Abound in joy, for then you will behave best to those who are round about you. When a man is unhappy, he usually makes other people so; and a person that is miserable is generally un- kind, and frequently unjust. It is often dyspep- sia that makes a man find fault with his servants and wife and children. If a man is at peace with himself, he is peaceful with others. Get right within, and you will be right without.

The Seamy Side.
 Do you not know that if you are full of joy you will be turning the charming side of re- ligion where men can see it? I should not like to wear my coat with the seamy side out: some religionists always do that. It was said of one great professor, that he looked as if his religion did not agree with him. Godliness is not a rack or a thumscrew. Behave not to religion as if you felt that you must take it, like so much physic, but you had rather not. If it tastes like nauseous physic to you, I should fear you have got the wrong sort, and are poisoning yourself. Believe not that godliness is akin to sourness.

May some of you that have never rejoiced in Jesus Christ learn how to praise Him to day by being washed in the precious blood! You that have praised Him long, may you learn your score yet more fully, and sing in better tune henceforth, and for evermore! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Napoleon's Second Wife.*
 WHEN the empress of Austria was compelled to leave Vienna with her children at the ap- proach of the French under Napoleon, she had more the appearance of an exile than a sover- eign. She was very ill at the time, and scarce- ly able to support the jolting of her carriage, and she groaned continually, as much from her moral, as from her physical sufferings. "It is

* From The Happy Days of the Empress Marie Louise, by Imbert de Saint-Amand. Translated by Thomas Sergeant Perry. The description that the author gives of the days when the Austrian princess occupied the place from which the unhappy Josephine had been deposed, belies his title. They were not happy days for her, and could not be happy for her husband, Napoleon. They were days of short-lived splendor, and that was all. The book is a vivid and faithful description of a most interesting period of French history. Pp. 383. Price, $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

horrible," said Marie Louise, "to see her suffer so." It rained in torrents, and the thunder roared, as if to foretell all the misfortunes that were about to overwhelm the country. The roads, made still worse by the bad weather, were abominable. When the fugitives reached Buda, after a long and difficult journey, they were wet through, and nearly worn out with fatigue.

The illusions of the Imperial family were speedily destroyed by the harsh reality. Vienna surrendered May 12, after suffering severely. In a few hours eighteen hundred shells had fallen into the city. The streets were narrow, the houses high, and the populace crowded within the narrow fortifications, were terrified and infuriated at the sight of the damage caused by the shells, which started fires in every direc- tion. Who would have said to the Viennese who were hurling all manner of imprecations at Napoleon, the author of their woes, that in ten months later they would be singing the praise of this detested Emperor, and would be volun- tarily setting French flags in their windows as symbols of friendship? Marie Louise, herself, who wrote often to her father, had written as lately as April 25: "We have heard with delight that Napoleon was present at the great battle at Eckmühl, which the French lost. May he lose his head as well! There are a great many pro- phesies about his end, and people say that the Apocalypse applies to him. They maintain that he is going to die this year at Cologne, in an inn called the Red Crawfish. I do not attach much importance to these prophecies, but how glad I should be to see them come true!" These sen- timents, it must be confessed, are a singular preparation for the next year's wedding.

The Marriage to Napoleon.
 At the ceremony the Emperor seemed ab- sorbed. The Grand Almoner, after a deep bow to their majesties, intoned the Veni Creator and then proceeded to bless the thirteen pieces of gold and the ring. Napoleon and Marie Louise arose, advanced to the altar, and clasped their bared right hands. The priest then ad- dressed the Emperor, "Sire, do you acknow- ledge and swear before God and His holy Church that you take for your lawful wife her imperial and royal highness, Marie Louise, archduchess of Austria, here present?" "Yes, sir." Then turning to the Empress, "Madame, do you acknowledge and swear before God and His holy church that you now take for your lawful hus- band, the Emperor Napoleon, here present?" "Yes, sir." Do you promise and swear to show him the fidelity in all things which a faithful wife owes to her husband, according to God's holy commandment?" "Yes, sir."

The procession formed anew after the cere- mony, and retraced its steps. The Emperor gave the Empress his hand, and it was observed with surprise that in passing through the long gallery his face which had been so triumphant and joyous, no longer wore the same expression.

Last Interview with Napoleon.
 On December 12, 1812, the Empress went to her bed in the Tuileries, sad and ill. It was half-past eleven at night. The lady-in-waiting, who was to pass the night in a neighboring room, was about to lock all the doors when sud- denly she heard voices in the drawing-room close by. Who could have come at that hour? Who except the Emperor? And, in fact, it was he, who without word to any one, had just arrived unexpectedly, in a wretched carriage, and had found great difficulty in getting the palace doors opened. He had travelled incognito from the Beresina, like a fugitive, like a criminal. When he burst into his wife's bedroom, in his long fur coat, Marie Louise could not be- lieve her eyes. He kissed her affectionately and promised that all these disasters should soon be repaired; he added that he had been beaten, not by the Russians, but by the ele- ments. Nevertheless his decadence had begun; his glory was dimmed. Marie Louise began to have doubts of Napoleon. His courtiers con- tinued to flatter him, but they had ceased to worship him. A dark cloud lay over the Tuil- eries. The Empress had but a few more days to pass with her husband- . . . After Leipsic everything was lost; that was the signal of the death-struggle, which was to be long, terrible, and full of anguish. Europe listened in terror to the cries of the dying empire. But it was all over. The sacred soil of France was invaded. January 25, 1814, at three in the morning, the hero left the Tuileries to oppose the invaders. He kissed his wife and his son for the last time. He was never to see them again.

An Elephant Battery in India—The Morning Bath. (See page 405.)

DEACON FOSTER OFFENDED.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 6: "How much is a man of more value than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath day." (Matt. 12: 12.)

No one ever raised a question about Deacon Foster's piety. He never missed a Sunday service in any weather, and he was always at the prayer-meetings. It was quite a distance from his house to the church, but for some time the deacon walked it, having conscientious scruples about using his horse on Sunday. But his wife could not walk so far in the winter, and the deacon himself came near being fast in a snowdrift one very hard Sunday. So he thought it out, and determined that old Clay must work on Sunday, but the old horse should not be deprived of his Sabbath. He should keep the Jewish Sabbath. The deacon took care that every one should know of the arrangement, so that no one should charge him with inconsistency. So he had a good reputation with them that were without, as with them that were within the Church.

Perhaps, if the deacon had a fault, it was in being a little censorious. His boys said he was strict. One of them had become an infidel, and he declared that he was first prejudiced against religion by his father's harshness and narrow-mindedness. The deacon drove him from his home when he heard of his scepticism, and the boy had gone to New York to get his living. He was now doing well as a drummer for a dry-goods house, and sometimes came to his native place, but always avoided his father and his old home. Ministers who came to "supply" the pulpit at intervals when the regular minister was absent, said the deacon was captious. He criticized their doctrine, and told them that he had heard their text handled in a more spiritual manner. Members of the church, too, found that the deacon had a very quick eye for their shortcomings, and a caustic tongue in dealing with them on the subject. But the deacon's standard was high; there was no doubt of that, and he was a credit to the community.

"Doctor," he said one Monday morning, when he called on the minister, "I am afraid we have a case for church discipline on our hands."

"Oh, I hope not, Deacon," said the venerable dominie.

"Well, I should have dealt with it myself in a spirit of Christian candor," said the deacon, "but it seemed too serious. I thought the weight of your office would perhaps have more effect; but I think it must come before the church. I doubt if even a reproof from you will suffice."

"What is it, and who is it?" Dr. Duffield inquired.

"It is Brother Graham," said the deacon solemnly. "I noticed he was not at morning service yesterday. 'Forsake not the assembly of yourselves together,'" quoted the deacon.

"Perhaps he was visiting a sick boy," said the minister. "You know he has a large number of boys in his Bible class."

"I thought of that," said the deacon, "but he was not. No, sir; when I went to the hotel to feed my horse—I always do that myself so that no one shall have to work for me on the Sabbath day—I saw Brother Graham come out of the side door. He had not been drinking. There's no liquor sold there on the Sabbath. But he had been smoking. I smelt the fumes of tobacco on him. Now one of the Lord's people in a hotel, smoking on the Lord's day, instead of being at service—that, even you must own, is bad, Doctor, though you do make excuses for every wrong-doer."

"Scarcely that, deacon. I believe in the city that thinketh no evil and try to practice it, but I am a poor hand at making excuses for evil doers. Still, I think Brother Graham may have some good reason for what he did. I'll speak to him about it and hear his account."

"Better bring it before the church at once," said the deacon. "Nothing like decisive action when there is danger of reproach being brought on the name of the Lord."

But the minister thought not, and the deacon could not carry his point. He went home vexed and disappointed. When the dominie "saw" Brother Graham, probably some excuse would satisfy him, and this opportunity of making an example would be lost. It turned out so. The dominie told deacon Foster on the next Sunday that he had inquired into that matter and found Brother Graham's defence sufficient. The deacon shrugged his shoulders and opined that the Doctor had not been true to his duty as overseer of the Lord's flock.

After this the deacon avoided Brother Graham, and when they did meet, treated him with marked coldness. He expected that he would be asked the reason of the estrangement, but Brother Graham did not ask, having already heard the cause from the pastor.

There came a Sunday, some months afterward, when the deacon being at the evening service as usual, a man stepped lightly down the aisle to his seat, during the singing, he whispered something in his ear. The deacon seized his hat instantly and hurried out. He had not run so fast since his boyhood as he had when once outside the church. He took his way to the hotel, and before he reached it he could see the flames bursting out of the upper windows. People were hard at work carrying out valuables, and the firemen were busy attaching the hose. The deacon did not stay to watch them, but made his way to the stables which were near the burning wing of the building. He found the doors locked as usual, and knew that in the excitement there would be prospect of getting the key. But a heavy bar was leaning against the wall and with he belabored the door. It was difficult to get it in, and every moment the fire was getting nearer. He trembled for his horse and son.

The Elephants Ready for Breakfast—Waiting the Word of Command. (See page 405.)

"Let me try," said a voice at his elbow. The deacon surrendered the bar and the young arms of Brother Graham plied it with more effort. Old Clay was brought out almost stifled with smoke, but still alive, and was soon between shafts.

"Rather hard work for the Sabbath, Deacon," said Mr. Graham, putting on his coat.

"A work of necessity, sir," said the deacon, mindful of Brother Graham's unforgotten offense, "I am not willing that he should draw an inference from the work of rescuing old Clay in defence of his own conduct. The deacon was not in a hurry; for service was not yet over in the church and he had to wait for his wife. So Mr. Graham leaned against the side of the wagon and talked.

"I attempted a more momentous rescue here nine months ago, deacon," he said. "I spent the morning trying to rescue a man."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, he was an infidel staying in the hotel, and there was no getting at him any day but Monday. So I spent Sunday morning with him, in argument at first, and in prayer afterward."

"Smoking, too, I think," put in the deacon.

"Yes, I had a cigar with him, he liked it, seemed to think it companionable."

"Be ye not partakers—" began the deacon.

"Oh, I would not mind that, if I could reach him better that way. And God helped me to reach him. I believe he will become a Christian."

"Infidels are not often brought in; they are not worth arguing with," said the deacon. "You obviously wasted your Sunday morning and incurred reproach, too."

"But, deacon, the man will be saved; I am sure he will, and he is your son."

"My son!" exclaimed the deacon. "You think my son will be converted? The Lord be praised! I never hoped for that. And I blamed you about that very Sunday morning, and wanted you disciplined for Sabbath breaking! What must you think of me! I, who have made such exertions on Sunday to save my horse and wagon, to blame you when you were trying to save a man and that man my own son! God forgive me, I will never judge any man again."

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser,

(Continued from page 398.)

AN ORPHIC SPELL.

IN the rear car, Heritage set himself again to the study of his story, but it had lost its charm. He was experiencing the common effect which a vexatious personal incident has on the operations of the mind. The personal is so close to us, and when it wields the weapon of chagrin, or regret, or humiliation, it paralyzes the faculties and destroys the interest in the impersonal. Heritage found rising between him and the pages of his book, images of the past, and it was evident that a part of the retrospect at least did not tend to calm his perturbed spirits. He read a few more pages in the book that had stirred him so deeply, and then closed it with an impatient gesture, compelled to admit to himself that it had lost its interest. Yet at intervals a thought contrived to get itself into something like a coherent form.

"Yes," he thought, "the fatal flaw in this admirable story is, that it leaves the religious question, which seems to be its chief motif, in a painful state of vagueness. Nothing is settled and no new, or at least no satisfactory, light is thrown on the questions raised. The author, however, gifted otherwise, seems to have no definite faith. She has plenty of hinges 'to hang a doubt on,' but nothing on which to pin a belief. Her book will help to unsettle the faith of its readers in the Gospel.

The train dived into a tunnel at this point interrupting his ruminations.

"A work," he resumed, "that would point out the sure way to mental anchorage, and assurance, might be of incalculable service, if sufficiently well written, and might prove a sort of foil to these productions of a rationalistic drift. I have had a religious experience that would perhaps qualify me to give some counsel to those whose minds have become disquieted. At all events, I'm resolved to write a story.

Thus his thoughts rambled on, often diverted from the main theme by the changing scenery, the villages and towns through which he was whirled, and especially by the haunting memory of the young lady in the forward coach.

"I wonder whether she will be at the reunion," and he almost started to his feet at the thought. "How embarrassing that would be!"

The sun hung like a crimson glow in the west, just touching the tree-tops of the distant hills, and pausing to say farewell to the quiet landscapes, when the train swept into the town of Constans, where the Mount Morrill University was located. Heritage had been looking out of the window, and his pulses quickened as the stately classic college-buildings greeted his vision. There were the literary halls, where he had so often spoken, the musical conservatory, the gymnasium, and the divinity hall, standing apart from the main structure, all of them embowered picturesquely among the tall trees of the campus; and there, too, was the old dormitory, called "The Dorm," for short, where he had roomed, dug out his Greek and calculus, and played many of his college pranks. What a procession of memories passed before his mind at sight of the familiar grounds!

But he had little time for reminiscence, for the train soon came to a full stop at the station, and he pressed his way out of the coach. No sooner had his foot touched the platform than he found his hand in the warm clasp of his old classmate, Victor Detwold, now Professor of Greek in the university. The usual greetings, congratulations, and inquiries having been exchanged, Detwold hurried his friend to his hotel, saw him comfortably provided for, and then rushed off to attend to his other duties.

It was Monday, and the reunion was to take place on the following day and evening, so that Heritage had time to compose himself, freshen up his memory for his address, and take a stroll over to the college grounds.

It is sufficient to say that the Triennial Reunion of the Literary Athenæum was an enjoyable occasion, the address of Robert Heritage contributing largely, as all said, to its success. A banquet followed in the evening, and such a banquet—such a menu of viands both for palate and brain! Not till after midnight could the company break up and betake themselves to their lodging, tired and perhaps a little jaded.

"You will stay for Commencement, won't you?" inquired Professor Detwold, as he and Heritage were about to part at the latter's hotel.

"Oh, yes; I intend to stay the week, now that I am here."

"How does the old college impress you after your absence of—let me see—five years?"

"It is glorious, Detwold, glorious!" declared Heritage in his hearty manner. "It is grander than ever. I wish I could stay here always and enjoy the exhilaration of these intellectual tournaments. I love to breathe the atmosphere of college life. But," checking his enthusiasm, "it's growing late, Detwold; I won't detain you."

The Commencement exercises proper took place on Thursday. Early on the morning of that day the town was astir, and by eight o'clock a vast concourse of people were passing into the immense hall of the main college building, filling it to its utmost capacity. All were intent on hearing the graduating addresses, the climatic performances in the career of young collegians. The University Glee Club opened the exercises with a selection that made every heart throb with a delight that was almost painful, and feeling soared away on the wings of the Orphean enchantment.

Heritage secured a seat near one of the side aisles midway of the hall. He amused himself by studying the faces and demeanor of the young aspirants for oratorical glory, for he believed that they gave a clue to character. To one who has had some experience in wrestling with this incorrigible old world there is something pathetic about the gorgeous rhetoric, the sanguine hopes, and Utopian prophecies of college orations on Commencement Day. The young seers seem to behold the world lying plastic before them, ready to be moulded into forms divine by their agile hands, no Canaan from Pisgah's summit appearing more enchanting than the fair earth of their youthful conceptions. Ah! well, what matter? Why crush the opening buds of expectation? Certes disenchantment will come soon enough.

While the exercises were going on, Heritage was both amused and annoyed by three bright and clever, but rather over-rollicksome, girls sitting near him, who afforded themselves diversion by passing incisive remarks on the performances. While a young orator, whose elocution ran riot with his thought, was haranguing the inoffensive audience in a deep, leonine voice and in such pompous periods as Demosthenes never dreamed of using, one of the girls pronounced him, "an animated bass horn," while another rather sentimental young man, tall and slender, was likened to "a sighing telegraph pole." There was no reverence in these critics, but Heritage thought as he listened to their comments how much such frank criticism, with its caustic, pungent flavor has had to do with the educational culture of the nation, keeping us from ridiculous display, by a wholesome dread of woman's wit.

Near the close of the proceedings the venerable President announced the name of a young lady as the next speaker. As she came forward, Heritage glanced up, and was at once impressed by her appearance and manner. Here was a girl of a wholly different type from most of her compeers on this mimic stage. How modest and womanly she appeared as the sweet wild-rose hues clung to her cheeks! In a flutter of excitement Heritage picked up his programme, and looking opposite the title of her address, found that her name was Metta Chapman.

She was of precisely the right height for a woman, her admirer thought, being neither too short nor too tall. Her lithe, fawn-like figure, which she held prettily with a slight incline forward, was clad in those soft, neutral tints which reveal delicacy of taste, while they give no false glamour to natural beauty, but rather cause it to stand out in striking relief solely on its own merits. Indeed, as far as Robert Heritage was concerned, no artificial adornments were needed to enhance the loveliness, the charm, of the girl who stood before him. Her eyes, which were large and luminous and of a dark-blue cast, seemed to melt into a smile as she glanced over the audience, and it was that bewitching smile that melted the ice barriers that had for years environed the heart of our talented bachelor. He could not take his eyes from her face, which, he told himself, was a mean between the rotund, doll type and the shrunken, sharply chiseled type. When she uttered her first sentence in her sweet, soft voice, he felt her tones vibrating and tingling through every fibre of his being.

"What an exquisite voice!" he thought. "It reminds one of the old legends about the Lyre of Orpheus. And how simple and chaste her style is! What a contrast between it and the crude pompous diction of some of the other speakers! Obviously she is a girl of fine mould. Not an Undine by any means, and yet how innocent and natural she seems. She appears to be wholly unconscious too, of doing anything remarkable, and that's what lends such a charm to her performance."

Evidently the audience, too, at once detected the genuine ring of the young lady's tones, for from the first word to the last she held them captive by the Orphic spell of her magnificent voice. Nor was her address lacking in strength of thought. She had chosen some quaint musical theme, tracing its power in history, in nature in religion, and ending with an odd maidenly conceit about the "unheard melodies chiming in the meadow mist, the morning dew, the frost on the window pane, and the quaint Pythagorean fancy about the music of the spheres."

Heritage joined heartily in the eclat accorded the young lady at the close of her address. "I never felt so stirred in my life," he reflected. Then a new train of thought came: "After all, bachelorism isn't so very attractive. Well what am I mauling about? I thought I was proof against the most insidious wiles of the little god of love; but then I never expected him to transfix me with golden arrows. I must get Detwold to introduce me to that exquisite girl graduate."

While these thoughts were running through his mind, he watched Miss Chapman as she emerged from the ante-room, stepped lightly down the aisle a few paces, and then took a vacant seat by the side of a young man. Heritage saw at once that they were acquaintances. The young fellow congratulated her heartily, looking her affectionately in the eyes, scarcely able, it seemed to Heritage, to resist the impulse to give her a caress.

The couple were sitting only a short distance in front of Heritage, so that he had an opportunity of watching their movements and what he took for their pantomimic love-making. A throb of pain, perhaps of jealousy, went to his heart. It was a self-revelation; he had not for years believed himself capable of such a feeling, having been too busy to think about love. And now was he virtually becoming enamored of this fair college girl, and jealous of the young fellow by her side, who was obviously her lover.

It hurt him to see her lean affectionately over toward her companion. No doubt they were engaged, and perhaps the whole college knew it, but that was no reason why she should flaunt the fact of their intimacy before an audience composed largely of strangers. It hardly accorded with that sweet, winsome modesty she had evinced while on the stage.

"I cannot understand it," he reflected. "Why should she treat her lover so familiarly before everybody?"

During a pause of the speaking, and while an instrumental solo was being rendered, Heritage espied Professor Detwold coming down the aisle toward him. The Professor stopped when he reached Miss Chapman and shook her hand in hearty congratulation, and then moved on. Heritage made room for him by his side, and the two carried on a whispered colloquy for a few minutes.

"By the way," said Heritage, there was a young lady who acquitted herself exceptionally well."

"Which one?"

"Her name—let me see," pretending to consult the programme; "oh! yes; it was Miss Chapman."

"Oh! Miss Chapman. Yes, she's one of the brightest young ladies that the college has turned out; and just as modest and unassuming as she is gifted."

"She is beautiful, too. The fact is, I'm quite charmed with her. By the way, there she sits; you spoke to her as you came down the aisle. Who is the young man by her side?"

"Ha! Ha!" chuckled Detwold, "I believe you're half-jealous, Heritage. Dismiss your fears, old fellow; that's her brother."

"Oh! is it?" and Heritage heaved a sigh of relief.

The tension of his feelings was instantly relaxed. He looked gratefully at Professor Detwold, who felt no little amusement at the anxiety that his friend had shown in regard to the girl's companion, and twitted him about bachelor condition.

"Why, I should have thought you would married long ago, Heritage," he said. "What has happened that you are not? How about that infatuation of your college?"

"Detwold, please spare me," begged Heritage, the vermilion leaping to his face. "Don't mention that; it's an affair I am anxious to forget."

"I beg pardon. I didn't know you felt sensitive on that subject."

"Oh! there's no harm done, I assure you. But to come back to Miss Chapman—will you introduce me after the exercises are over?"

"With pleasure, sir; I shall be happy to help you form her acquaintance—and cultivate it, if you choose. I think she is still heart-whole, and Detwold left his friend, and went to attend to some duty in another part of the hall.

Heritage felt that afternoon for the first time in his life the thrill and pang of real love. Miss Chapman's displays of affection toward her brother after that young man's identity had been discovered, instead of lowering her in our bachelor's eyes, simply heightened the witchery of her charms, revealing a kind and loving nature. He did not put the thought of love from him. There was no reason, so far as he knew, for crushing it, for the girl was beautiful and good. Instead, therefore, of trying to exclude the feeling from his heart as if it were a foe to happiness, he made an attempt to analyze its character. He would not admit that he had fallen in love merely with a pretty face, or with sweet, engaging manners, although he could not ignore the potent influence of these elements. He contended that it was the nobility of mind shining from the girl's features that cast an enchanting spell over him.

Nor did he find reason to change his mind when, after the audience had been dismissed, Professor Detwold, true to his promise, introduced him to Miss Chapman and her brother. A gleam of recognition shot from the girl's eyes as she acknowledged the acquaintance, when she said something delicately complimentary of Heritage's address at the re-union evening before. At this juncture Professor Detwold, who was perhaps somewhat of a diplomat, broke into the conversation.

"Chapman," he said, addressing the young lady's brother, "I want you to help me with some of those pictures on the stage, which need re-arranging. Mr. Heritage can pilot your sister through the crowd."

Robert looked gratefully at the professor, and then with a dash of gallantry, such as he had not displayed since his college days, offered an escort to Miss Chapman, who accepted it with a modest blush. They walked together down the broad stairway, through the long hall, along the walks of the campus, and up the street.

(To be Continued.)

CHINESE SOLDIER'S WORK.

One of the most remarkable triumphs of the Gospel in China originated in a soldier's life. Mr. Law, of the China Inland Mission, who is laboring at Ku Cheng, says: "I must be nearly ten years ago that a native of this place, who was at that time a soldier in Shang Tung Province, met a native preacher with a lot of Bibles or parts of Bibles, and asked what they were, and presented with a new Testament in Chinese. This made a great impression on him and led him to believe. He left the soldier's life and came home here, and preached to his friends. Others believed, until there were nine in number anxious to become Christians. I believe, too, they met together for worship. At last they sent this native to Gan-King, the capital of the province, to ask a foreigner to come down and organize them. Up to this time, with the exception of this one man, I do not know any of them had ever seen a foreigner. He commenced a wonderful work, and in connection with this station there are sixty-nine communicants and ten instructors. They do not all reside in this place, but the work started from this place. An old gentleman, whose home is in Gang-shan, but owns some land here, came down years ago to receive rental, and heard of the doctrine. He is a scholar and a native, and was much opposed to the Gospel. He said that those who were Christians did not till his land. However, the Lord soon turned him into a lamb, and this man is now an earnest Christian and a zealous evangelist. A copy of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' got into his hands, and he read it out loud, and it was used of God to convince him of sin. He attended the worship, when the others knelt down he was told to kneel down unless he liked, but he would not kneel down, and his voice was soon heard ringing with God."

COALHEAVER'S LAST GLASS.

A BRAVY stalwart man rose at a mission meeting recently in response to an invitation to testify. He said: "Some time ago, while working in the coal pits, I broke my leg. I was taken to the hospital, and being cruelly treated there until I was able to go out on a pair of crutches, I was sent out to the best I could on them. I was going to reform my life, and resolved to turn a new leaf, and never touch another drop of whisky again. I was still weak in my leg, walking about tired me, and the men were heavy, so I took myself into a room just to have one last glass, but I more than one, and stayed there until the bartender got tired of me, as he always was when the money runs out, and turned me out into the street. The policeman came past and took me to the station, where I spent four months' imprisonment. That was my last attempt to reform in my own strength. But how different when I came to know the Lord Jesus, and asked Him to take my wicked heart and give me a new one, and I for heavenly things. He gave me strength to combat all my temptations, and especially to pass the grog shop, which I could do before, and never could have done in my own strength. What Jesus did for me, He will do for all who trust Him."

SEARCH FOR A WANDERER.

An anxious mother a short time ago visited the Rev. J. Roman, an earnest evangelist of Scotland, and besought his help on behalf of her son. She said that there had been a quarrel between the young man and his father, resulting in the former leaving the home and saying he would never return. She knew he had gone to Glasgow and feared he had joined the army, as he had threatened to do. "She wished to know," says the Rev. J. Roman, "If I would not, as a great favor, make enquiries about him. I went to the rendezvous in the Trovigate of Glasgow, and there asked a tall recruiting sergeant for the young man of whom I was in search. He could not say whether he had seen him there, but took me into a room, and showed me the names of all the young men who had enlisted that day. I glanced over the list, but the name I sought was not there. I felt relieved, but the sergeant told me that young men very frequently enlisted under a false name, and advised me to go on the army doctor, at whose office I should find a description of all the recruits. I went there, but evidently the young man had not been there. There was nothing for it but to return and tell the sorrowing mother that I was unable to find any trace of her boy. I had reached the railway station to take my train, when suddenly I found myself face to face with the young man. Going up to him, I put my hand upon his shoulder and said, 'Come home with me; I have been searching for you.' 'I shall not, sir,' was the firm reply. 'But your father has commissioned me to ask you to return.' He is very troubled, and your mother is unwell with anxiety on your account; do come home.' 'Is that so?' he asked. 'Are you sure my father wishes me to return?' 'Yes, I am sure,' I answered. 'Then I will go with you,' he replied, and we went back together. I have found in my efforts to lead men back to God that the same argument seldom fails. Nothing moves them more surely than the assurance that God desires not the death of a sinner, but rather that he return and live."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

WINNOWN SONGS.

FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.
By IRA D. SANKEY.
Already adopted for use by the Chautauqua Assembly, also N. Y., N. J., and other State S. S. Conventions. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If sent by mail, add 5 cents per copy.
Biglow & Main, The John Church Co., New York & Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

THE ESTEY ORGAN Co.
I have been in business 50 years. Suppose they have sold one fiftieth of their organs each year, and that they received for each organ sold the first year one cent; for those sold the second year two cents each; the third year four cents each, and so doubling the price each year, they would have now received in all $268,847,054,433,378.50.

(The arithmetician who figured this states that if Adam and Eve had undertaken to count this large number, working day and night, at the rate of 500 each minute, until Cain and Abel were ten years old, and they had then helped to count up to the present time, counting together 1,000 every minute, it would yet take over 500,000 years to complete the job.)

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts.
If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEething." SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.
Sample Vial "RUBIFOAM" sent free by E. W. HOYT & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is a peculiar medicine. It is carefully prepared from Sarsaparilla, Dandelion, Mandrake, Dock, Pipsissewa, Juniper Berries, and other well-known and valuable vegetable remedies, by a peculiar combination, proportion and process, giving to Hood's Sarsaparilla curative power not possessed by other medicines. It effects remarkable cures where other preparations fail.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best blood purifier before the public. It eradicates every impurity, and cures Scrofula, Salt Rheum, Boils, Pimples, all Humors, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Indigestion, General Debility, Catarrh, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Complaints, overcomes that tired feeling, creates an appetite, and builds up the system.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Has met peculiar and unparalleled success at home. Such has become its popularity in Lowell, Mass., where it is made, that whole neighborhoods are taking it at the same time. Lowell druggists sell more of Hood's Sarsaparilla than of all other sarsaparillas or blood purifiers. Sold by druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.
100 Doses One Dollar

EVERY MOTHER
Should Have It in The House.
Dropped on Sugar, Children Love to take JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINTMENT for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cramps and Pains. Relieves all Summer Complaints, Cuts and Bruises like magic. Sold every where. Price 35c. by mail; 6 bottles Express paid, $2. L. S. JOHNSON & CO., BOSTON, MASS.

P. D. & S. Pens
SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS!
Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

HIRES'
25c HIRES' IMPROVED 25c
ROOT BEER!
IN LIQUID. NO BOILING OR STRAINING EASILY MADE THIS PACKAGE MAKES FIVE GALLONS.

ROOT BEER.
The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world. Delicious and Sparkling. TRY IT.
Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.
C. E. HIRES, PHILADELPHIA.

LADIES!
Use Only
BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING on your Boots and Shoes.
Sold by all Dealers.

"Beauty without neatness is a hook without a bait." Fair women should make their houses look fair with

SAPOLIO.
Try a cake in your next house-cleaning.

FRUIT DIET is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address: FOWLER & WELLS CO., 77 Broadway, New York City.

METAL CEILINGS.
BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores, and Residences. ARTISTIC
H. S. NORTHPOR, 18 Rose Street, New York.

W. S. WYSE, DEAR SIR: I was a sufferer from kidney disease for several years, and made every effort to obtain relief but failed in every instance until I procured a bottle of Wyse's New Remedy. I took half of a bottle, which to my great delight relieved me of all the troublesome symptoms in a very short space of time.
I am so much improved that I consider myself out of all danger, if not entirely cured of the disease.
JAMES S. BARRON.
329 West 22d Street, New York.

TESTIMONIALS.

From AMOS J. CUMMINGS, member of Congress; Ex-Senator ALBERT D. AGGETT; Ex-Police Commissioner DEWITT C. WHEELER, and others. Sent free by mail.

WYSE'S
NEW REMEDY
FOR

DISEASES OF THE KIDNEYS AND LIVER.

WYSE'S NEW REMEDY
Has become celebrated for the successful treatment and cure of the following diseases:
Diabetes, Bright's Disease, Brickdust Deposits, Mucous Inflammation of the Kidneys and Bladder, Pain in the Back, Weak Kidneys, Retention of Urine, Gleet, Gravel and all diseases affecting the Urinary Organs.

WYSE NEW REMEDY COMPANY,
PROPRIETORS,
157 W. 23d St., New York.

For sale by all druggists. Sent by express on receipt of One Dollar. Mention this paper.

20 YEARS OF SUCCESS.

Without loss to investors a good reason for buying the Debenture Bonds and Mortgage Loans of the
AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO.
Assets, $2,000,000.00. Highest rate of interest consistent with the choicest security. Pamphlets free, address,
E. S. ORMSBY, A. L. ORMSBY, Vice-President, H. E. SIMMONS, President.
150 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. CITY.

IDLE
Invested to yield a present income of from 6 per cent to 8 per cent with one half the profits.
MONEY

UNION INVESTMENT COMPANY,
Capital, - - $1,000,000.
KANSAS CITY, MO.

7 per cent. investment interest semi-annually.
The direct obligation of the Company secured by business property and recommended by prominent business men and bankers of Kansas City. Send for circulars with full particulars.
W. P. RICE, Pres. } Union Investment Co.
O. F. PAGE, Treas. }

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY.
DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.
No one using a Chart or Square can complete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Skirts, Garments and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine.
Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.
THE McDOWELL CO., 6 West 14th Street, New York City.
We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.
VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA
The Original--Most Soluble.
Ask your Grocer for it, take no other.

MEN WANTED.
Great inducements. Outfit free. Address, J. AUSTIN SHAW, Nurseryman, Brooklyn, New York.

A LADY WANTED in every Town to sell WOMAN'S HAND BOOK. Just issued. Quick Sales. Big Pay at Home. Circ'lrs Free. E. B. TREAT, Pub., New York.

"I AM WITH YOU ALWAYS."

'Tis sweet to read the promise He hath given
To cheer our hearts along the pilgrim way,
But sweeter far to know its blest fulfillment,
And humbly walk with Jesus day to day.

To walk with Jesus! who shall tell the gladness
Of those whose daily life the Master shares?
Who hear His voice, so full of love and pity,
And rest on Him their burdens and their cares.

And this is mine—the joy of knowing Jesus,
And walking in the sunlight of His smile;
Mine is the peace that floweth like a river,
Deeper and broader growing all the while.

No more a transient guest my Saviour cometh,
To bless me but awhile and then depart;
But with me now He evermore abideth,
And with His own glad presence fills my heart.

Sometimes, when busy with my daily labor,
Yet thinking of the mighty love He bore,
Some precious promise unto me He giveth,
Of-read, perhaps, but never mine before.

I know not why He gives His choicest blessings
To one so undeserving of His love;
But, since He calls, with willing feet I hasten, Content and glad to hear Him say, "Well done."

Content to walk in paths of His own choosing,
Since He will hold my hand along the way;
Content to know that I am journeying homeward,
And brighter grows the pilgrim's path each day.

—Selected.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.
will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

"All run down" from the weakening effects of warm weather, you need a good tonic and blood purifier like Hood's Sarsaparilla. Give this peculiar medicine a trial. Sold by all druggists.

TERSE and TIMELY.

Diabolos and His Demons.

By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 20 cents.
A Scriptural exposition of an important subject.
Most suitable for the present time. Should be read, pondered, considered, and consulted by all classes. Demonology is an alarming fact. No person should read of Satan's agencies and remain indifferent. There is great curiosity for the supernatural, and in this book such will find food for reflection.

The Spiritual Man.

By Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents.
$5.00 per hundred.
A Biblical Expository Lecture delivered at one of the Northfield conventions under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody.
"This pamphlet contains important teaching as
to the natural and spiritual—the man born of the flesh, and the new man in Christ Jesus."—The Christian (London).

The Royal Priest.

As typified in Melchizedek and Aaron. By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents
each. $5.00 per hundred.
Melchizedek has always been one of the mysterious characters in the Old Testament. His life is seen in its true light when applied typically, as is done in this pamphlet.
Sent post-paid to any address on receipt of price.
Address, ALBERT NEEDHAM, Publisher,
Manchester, Mass.

CARMEL SOAP is made only from sweet Olive Oil by a Mission Society in Palestine. Being absolutely pure and possessing the emollient properties of Olive Oil, it is unsurpassed for the Toilet and Bath, and superior to all other soaps for the Teeth and Hair.
It is the only perfectly safe soap for the NURSERY and Invalids. If your druggist or grocer does not keep it, send 10 cents for sample cake to the Importer,
A. KLIPSTEIN, 52 Cedar St., New York.

"MY MISTAKE," by A. J. Anderson (formerly a Christian Scientist). Price 5 cts. in paper; 10 cts. in cloth. Address Mrs. E. M. WATKINS, 723 Park Ave. New York. The proceeds of the sale of this book will be devoted to a Home in this City for Fallen Girls. Every one should read it, and particularly those who are under the influence of such an error.

RIDLEYS'

Grand Street,

NEW YORK.

COVERING ENTIRE BLOCK.

7 FLOORS OCCUPIED ENTIRELY By Us.
2,500 Employees—85 Departments Filled
With Seasonable and Desirable Goods.

LARGEST ASSORTMENT, LOWEST PRICES

TRIMMED MILLINERY

Reduced to About Half Price.

EXTRA GOOD BARGAINS

Silk and Jet Capes

Millinery Novelties. Silks, Satins, Velvets, Ribbons, Laces, Trimmings. Hosiery, Men's Furnishing Goods,
Ladies' and Misses' Suits, Wraps, Dress Goods, Lace
Mitts, Lisle and Silk Gloves, and Shoes.
House-furnishing Goods, Carpets, Matting, Furniture.

Special Bargains in Dress Robes.

Each Robe contains 9 yards 40-inch wide material, and 4½ yards wide and 4½ yards narrow embroidery,
at $1.50 the Robe, well worth $3.00.
Ladies' Suits, Wraps and Travelling Garments—very low prices, Trunks in all sizes, from ordinary packing Trunks to finest Sole Leather Trunks.
Valises, Club Bags, Satchels, etc.

Outdoor Games of All Kinds

Fishing Rods and Tackle, Artificial Bait, etc.

Our Assortment will Always be found more complete than in any house in the city, and the prices will show a material saving.

WILL MAIL FREE

On application, a copy of our

FASHION MAGAZINE

Giving a complete Illustrated Price List of our entire stock.

ORDERS BY MAIL

PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO.

EDWARD RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand Street.

56 to 68 ALLEN STREET

59 to 65 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

EVERYBODY WANTS

Many Mistakes Mended—3000 Errors in English corrected. 12mo. 1.00
Bible Student's Cyclopaedia. 12mo. 1.50
Young Man's Difficulties with His Bible. 1.00
By Dr. Faunce. 1.00
A Pastor's Thought on Living Themes. 1.00
By mail on receipt of price.
TIBBALS BOOK COMPANY.
Send for Catalog. 26 Warren St., New York City.

Guaranteed and legal Investments a specialty.
All marketable Bonds, Shares, Debentures, Mortgages, Certificates bought, sold, exchanged. Reports on Properties, Negotiations. Collections here and abroad. Best current rates guaranteed.
SAMUEL R. MACLEAN, 39 Broad St., N. Y., and London.

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills.
BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

The great success of "Onyx" dyed hosiery is due entirely to its superior quality, and the fact that it does not stain the feet or garments, and that it will withstand the effect of repeated washings as well as perspiration.

We confidently recommend the "Onyx" to our customers as the best article for purity of dye and wearing quality ever offered to the public. It is made from Ingrain Yarns and is absolutely fast black.

Over five million pair have been sold.

Lord & Taylor.

Broadway & 20th St. N. Y.

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"

"Retrograde" Seamed Mitts.

THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Dealers.

"A thoroughly wise and sensible handbook for sudden emergencies, sickness, and accidents, or until the doctor arrives."

Now ready, in neat cloth binding, 12mo size.
Price 50 Cents.

HOME DOCTORING:

A Guide to Domestic Medicine and Surgery.
WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.

By W. B. KESTEVIN, M.D., F.R.C.S.

* Its five tersely written chapters give explicit and clear descriptions of accidents, diseases, and symptoms, alphabetically arranged; poisons and treatment; management of sick-room, nursing, diet, etc.; medicines, their properties, uses, and doses; with Index.
Plain explanations and comprehensiveness make this an invaluable little handbook to have in the house.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price by the publishers, FREDERICK WARNE & CO.
3 COOPER UNION, NEW YORK.

CHANCE FOR ALL

To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect
Tea. A TRIAL ORDER OF
3½ pounds of Fine Tea, either
Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpow-
der, Young Hyson, Mixed, English
Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent
by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of tea
you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 81 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

SHORTHAND. Private instruction by practical verbatim reporter. 20 years' experience.
No failures. Situations guaranteed. Book and Circulars Free. FRANK HARRISON, Stenographer, 239 Broadway, N. Y., or 721 Broad St., Newark, N. J.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly taught by mail or personally.
Situations procured all pupils when competent end for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oswego, N. Y.

BOUNDING BILLOW

ON THE SEA,

or the pure Mountain Breezes will soon invi-sage. Make your leisure twice the pleasure by taking along our entertaining music.

(If you have no Guitar, Mandolin, Banjo, Flute or Violin, call or write for lists of fine instruments at our store, J. C. HAYNES & Co., 93 Co-street, Boston.)

OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION
best of the music of 19 operas. Price, $1.50 ranged for Piano.

YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COL-LECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces
$1.00.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano.
Beautiful Melodies, finely arranged. Price
Vol. 2 of Miss Eleanor W. Everest's ALBU-SON'S. 12 first-class Songs by the best

COLLEGE SONGS. New, enlarged edition. 200,000 sold. Price 50 cents.

OLD FAMILIAR DANCES. For the 100 of them. Easy, and as merry as they 50 cents.

FOR MUSIC FESTIVALS.
THE ATLAS. By Carl Zerrahn. 20 Choruses. Sacred and Secular. Most quite new. $1.

Any book mailed for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, E
C. H. DITSON & Co., 867 Broadway, New

PIANOS UNIVERSAL

$150 to $1500
ESTAB. 1859. INCORPORATED
PRICE They Lead the World
Sent for trial in your own home.
ABSOLUTELY PERFECT
Guaranteed
Years.
Sold Direct
to families. No Middlemen.
Cat. Free.
DON'T BUY
A POOR PIANO!
MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N. Y. $35 to $45
ORGAN

FOUND.

A positive cure
matism; remov-aching, soreness,
ing, lameness
form of rheumtism from the internally. D. F. Coles Rheumatic Remedy, N. J. 50c. and $1.00 a bottle. Ask your druggist for you. Sold by C. N. CRITCHFORD, 115 Fulton

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADEROL

Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
AUTOGRAF
OF
Stewart Hartshorn
THE GEN
HARTSHORN

RUPTURE CUR

with our Improved Elastic Truss worn night and day, retains the rupture under the exercise or severest strain. Send for pamphlet IMPROVED ELASTIC TRUSS
822 & 824 Broadway, Cor. 12th St., New York

HOW TO BUILD A HOUSE

If you are thinking about a house you should send my new book containing specifications for 25 houses from a rooms up, costing to $5,000. A book of great all who desire to build a house will suit you almost as well as paid $5 for a book. Sent by on receipt of 25 cents. A J. B. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 ROSE ST., New York

YOU CAN LAY BY $500 TO

a year by working for us. You in any surer or simpler way how you try. We furnish capital and pay those who work either whole or part time not required for answer. JNO. C. WINSTON Pubs., Philadelphia, Chicago, Kansas City.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "THE CH
IAN'S LEGI
102 sold in one church, 72 in one place of
W. J. HOLLAND, 107 Duane St., New York

STOUT

PEOPLE! WEIGHT PAIN
WITHOUT STARVATION
Treatise & instruction for
E. LYNTON, 19 Park Place, New York

DEAFNESS & HEAD NOISE

PECK'S INVISIBLE TUBES
CUSHIONS, Whispers heard fortable. Successful where all Remedies fail. Sold by only, 553 B'dway, New York. Write for book of p

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 27. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 2, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

OUR PICTURES FROM DAMASCUS.
 OAKS FOR SIN. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
 CHARLES ABBOT'S INVITATIONS. A Story of the S. S. Lesson.
 THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Belligerent Trout—A Mistake in a Bargain, Etc.

THE GREAT SUPPER. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
 OPENING OF THE FIFTH SEAL. By W. Haslam.
 The Mission Work in the Indian Territory—An Appeal in a Hotel—A Revival in a Reformatory, Etc.
 PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF REV. DAVID KERR CROSS, M. D., Medical Missionary in Nyassaland.
 PICTURE OF THE ISLAND OF HELIGOLAND.

THE ANTEDILUVIAN WITNESS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
 GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Luther's Friend Restored—Offer of Five Millions—Cruel Debtors, Etc.
 PICTURE OF SLAVE MARKET AT ZANZIBAR.
 WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)

PICTURES BROUGHT FROM DAMASCUS BY DR. TALMAGE.

1. A Carpenter's Shop in an Old Tree—2. A Nubian Negro—3. The House on the City Wall—4. The House of Ananias where Paul's Sight was Restored.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

CLOAKS FOR SIN.

"But now they have no cloak for their sin." John 15:22.
 Sin's Disguises—Necessary to its Success—Its Coverings Various and Changing—I. Official Prestige—A Sacredness in Office—Respect Due to It—Increases Responsibility—An Account to be Rendered—II. Elegance of Manner—Courtesy a Christian Duty—Cannot Atone for Moral Defects—The Test in the Day of Account—III. Profession of Religion—Profession After Conversion Required—Wolves Among Sheep—IV. Outward Morality—Will not Pay Back-Debts—V. Exalted Social Position—Sin in Homes of Splendor—VI. Orthodoxy—A Visit from a Drunkard—The Cleansing Robe that Does Avail—The Mosaic in the Wall.

Sin is always disguised. Decked, and glossed, and perfumed, and masked, it gains admittance in places from which it would otherwise be repelled. As silently as when it glided into Eden and as plausibly as when it talked to Christ at the top of the temple, it now addresses men. Could people look upon sin as it always is—an exhalation from the pit, the putrefaction of infinite capacities, the ghastly, loathsome, God-smitten monster that uprooted Eden and killed Christ, and would push the entire race into darkness and pain—the infernal charm would be broken. Before our first parents transgressed, sin appeared to them the sweetness of fruit and the becoming as gods. To Absalom it was the pleasure of sitting upon a throne. To men now, sin is laughter, and permission to luxurious gratification. Jesus Christ in my text suggests a fact which everybody ought to know, and that is that sin, to hide its deformity and shame, is accustomed to wearing a cloak, and the Saviour also sets forth the truth that God can see straight through all such wrappings and thick-nesses. I want now to speak of several kinds of cloaks with which men expect to cover up their iniquities, for the fashion in regard to these garments is constantly changing, and every day beholds some new style of wearing them, and, if you will tarry a little while, I will show you five or six of

The Patterns of Cloaks.

First, I remark that there are those, who being honored with official power, expect to make that a successful cloak for their sin. There is a sacredness in office. God Himself is king, and all who hold authority in the world serve under Him. That community has committed a monstrous wrong which has elevated to this dignity persons unqualified either by their ignorance or their immorality. Nations which elevate to posts of authority those not qualified to fill them will feel the reaction. Solomon expressed this thought when he said: "Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is a child and thy princes drink in the morning." While positions of trust may be disgraced by the character of those who fill them, I believe God would have us respectful to the offices, though we may have no admiration for their occupants. Yet this dignity, which office confers, can be no apology for transgression. Nebuchadnezzar, and Ahab, and Herod, in the day of judgment, must stand on the level with the herdsmen that kept their flocks, and the fishermen of Galilee. Pope, and king, and must give an account to God, and be judged by the same law as that which judges the beggar and the slave. Sin is all the more obnoxious when it is imperial and lordly. You cannot make pride, or injustice, or cruelty sacred by giving it a throne. Belshazzar's decanters could not keep the mysterious finger from writing on the wall. Ahab's sin literally hurled him from the throne to the dogs. The imperial vestments of wicked Jehoram could not keep Jehu's arrow from striking through his heart. Jezebel's queenly pretension could not save her from being thrown over the wall. No barricade of thrones can arrest God's justice in its unerring march. No splendor, or thickness of official robes can be a sufficient cloak of sin. Henry the Eighth, Louis the Fifteenth, Catharine of Russia, Mary of England—did their crowns save them? No ruler ever sat so high that the King of kings was not above him. All victors shall bow before Him who on the white horse goeth forth conquering and to conquer.

President, and Governor.

Elegant Manners.

Again: Elegance of manners cannot successfully hide iniquity from the eye of God. That model, gentlemanly apostle, Paul, writes to us: "Be courteous." That man can neither be a respectable worldling nor a consistent Christian who lacks good manners. He is shut out from refined circles, and he certainly ought to be hindered from entering the church. We cannot overlook that in a man which we could hardly excuse in a bear. One of the first effects of the grace of God upon an individual is to make him a gentleman. Gruffness, awkwardness, implacability, clannishness, are fruits of the devil; while gentleness and meekness are fruits of the Spirit. But while these excellences of manner are so important, they cannot hide any deformity of moral character. How often it is that we find attractiveness of person, suavity of manners, gracefulness of conversation, gallantry of behavior thrown like wreaths upon moral death. The flowers that grow upon the scorice of Vesuvius do not make it any less of a volcano. The sepulchres in Christ's time did not exhaust all the whitewash. Some of the biggest scoundrels have been the most fascinating. If there are any depending on outward gracefulness, and attractiveness of demeanor with any hope that because of that God will forgive the sin of their soul, let me assure them that the divine justice cannot be satisfied with smiles and elegant gesticulation. Christ looks deeper than the skin, and such a ragged cloak as the one in which you are trying to cover yourself will be no hiding in the day of His power. God will not in the judgment ask how gracefully you walked, nor how politely you bowed, nor how sweetly you smiled, nor how impressively you gestured. The deeds done in the body will be the test, and not the rules of Lord Chesterfield.

Again: Let me say that the Mere Profession of Religion

is but a poor wrapping to protect a naked soul. The importance of making a public profession of religion if the heart be renewed cannot be exaggerated. Christ positively, and with the earnestness of the night before his crucifixion, commanded it. But it is the result of Christian character, not the cause of it. Our church certificate is a poor title to heaven. We may have the name and not the reality. There are those who seem to throw themselves back with complacency upon their public confession of Christ although they give no signs of renewal. If Satan can induce a man to build on such a rotten foundation as that, he has accomplished his object. We cannot imagine the abhorrence with which God looks upon such a procedure. What would be the feelings of a shepherd if he saw a wolf in the same fold with his flocks, however quiet he might seem to lie, or a general if among his troops he saw one wearing the appointed uniform who nevertheless really belonged to the opposing host. Thus must the heavenly Shepherd look upon those who, though they are not His sheep, have climbed up some other way and thus must the Lord of hosts look upon those who pretend to be soldiers of the cross while they are His armed enemies. If any of you find yourselves deficient in the great tests of Christian character, do not, I beg of you, look upon your profession of religion as anything consolatory. If you have taken your present position from a view that you have of Christ and your need of Him, rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory and clap your hands for gladness, but if you find yourself with nothing but the name of life, while dead in trespasses and sins, arouse before the door is shut. That gilded profession—the world may not be able to see through it, but in the day of divine reckoning it will be found that you have no cloak for your sin.

Furthermore: Outward morality will be no covering for the hidden iniquity of the spirit. The Gospel of Christ makes no assault upon good works. They are as beautiful in God's eye as in ours. Punctuality, truthfulness, almsgiving, affection and many other excellences of life that might be mentioned will always be admired of God and man, but we take the position that good works cannot be the ground of our salvation. What we do right cannot pay for what we do wrong. Admit that you have all those traits of character which give merely worldly Respectability and Influence.

you must acknowledge that during the course of your life you have done many things you ought not to have done. How are these difficult matters to be settled? Ah, my friends, we must have an atonement. No Christ, no salvation. The great Redeemer comes in and says, "I will pay your indebtedness." So that which was dark enough before, is bright enough now. The stripes that we deserve are fallen upon Christ. On His scourged and bleeding shoulders He carries us up over the mountain of our sins and the hills of our iniquities. Christ's good works accepted are sufficient for us but they who reject them, depending upon their own, must perish. Traits of character that may make us influential on earth will not necessarily open to us the gate of heaven. The plank that will be strong enough for a house floor would not do for a ship's hulk. Mere morality might be enough here but cannot take you through death's storm into heaven's harbor. Christ has announced for all ages, "I am the way, the truth and the life, him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." But pitiable in will be the condition of that man, though he may have given all his estate to benevolent purposes and passed his life in the visiting of the distressed and done much to excite the admiration of the good and the great, if he have no intimate relation to Jesus Christ. There is a pride and a depravity in his soul that he has never discovered. A brilliant outside will be no apology for a depraved inside. It is no theory of mine but an announcement of God, who cannot lie, "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified." "Open the door of heaven and look in. Howard is there, but he did not secure his entrance by the dungeons he illumined and the lazzarettos into which he carried the medicines. Paul is there, but he did not earn his way in by the ship-wrecks and imprisonments and scourgings. On a throne overtopping perhaps all others, except Christ's, the old missionary exclaims: "By the grace of God I am what I am."

The Day of Accounts

High Social Position.

Again: Exalted social position will be no cloak for sin. Men look through the wicket door of prisons, and seeing the incarcerated wretches exclaim, "Oh, how much vice there is in the world!" And they pass through the degraded streets of a city, and looking into the doors of hovels and the dens of corruption they call them God-forsaken abodes. But you might walk along the avenues through which the opulent roll in their flourishing pomp and into mansions elegantly adorned, and find that even in the admired walks of life Satan works mischief and death. The first temptation Satan wrought in a garden, and he understands yet most thoroughly how to insinuate himself into any door of ease and splendor. Men frequently judge of sin by the places in which it is committed, but iniquity is to God as loathsome as iniquity in rags and in the Day of Judgment the sins of Madison Avenue and Elm Street will all be driven in on herd. Men cannot escape at last for being respectably sinful. You know Dives was clothed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously every day, but his fine clothes and good dinner did not save him. He might on earth have drunk something as rich as champagne and cognac, but at last he asked for one drop of water. You cannot trade off your attractive abode here for a house of many mansions on high and your elegant shade groves here will not warrant you a seat under the tree of life. When Go drove Adam and Eve out of Eden, He showed that merely living in a garden of delights and comforts will never save a man or a woman. By giving you so much earthly luxury and refinement, He intimated that He would have you enjoy yourselves, but He would not have you wrap yourself up in them as a cloak to hide your sins. God now walks in your garden as He did in Eden, even in the cool of the day, and He stands by your well as He did by a well in Samaria, and He would make your comfort on earth a type of your rapture in heaven.

Orthodoxy.

Furthermore: Mere soundness of religious belief will not hide our iniquities. There are men whose heads are as sound as Jonathan Edwards or John Wesley, whose hearts are as rotten as Tom Paine's or Charles Guiteau's. It is important that we be theoretical Christians. It is utterly folly in this day, for a man to have no reference for any one form of faith, when it is so easy to become conversant with the faith of the different sects. An intoxicated man staggered into my house one night begging for lodging. He made great pretensions to religion. I asked where he went to church. He said: "No-where; I belong to liberal Christianity." But here are those who never become Christians because their obstinacy prevents them from ever taking a fair view of what religion is. They are like a brute beast in the fact that their greatest strength lies in their horns. They are combative, and all they are ever willing to do for their souls is to enter an ecclesiastical fight. I have met men who would talk all day upon the ninth chapter of Romans, who were thoroughly helpless before the fourteenth chapter of John. But here are those who, having escaped from this condition, are now depending entirely upon their soundness of religious theory. The doctrines of man's depravity and Christ's atonement and God's sovereignty are theoretically received by them. But,

Alas! There They Stop.

is only the shell of Christianity containing no evangelical life. They stand looking over into heaven and admire its beauty and its song, and are so pleased with the looks from the outside that they cannot be induced to enter. They could make a better argument for the truth than a thousand Christians who have in their hearts received it. If syllogisms and dilemmas and sound propositions and logical deductions could save their souls, they would be among the best of Christians. They could correctly define repentance and faith and the Atonement, while they have never felt one sorrow for sin nor exercised a moment's confidence in the great Sacrifice. They are almost immovable in their position. We cannot present anything about the election of Christ that they do not know. The avowed described the fate of such a one in His parable: "And that servant which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to His will, shall be beaten with many stripes." Theories in religion have a beauty of their own, but if they result in no warmth of Christian life it is the beauty of horned and feldspar. Do not call such coldness and hardness religion. The River of Life never freezes over. Icicles never hang on the eaves of heaven. Soundness of intellectual belief is a beautiful cloak, well woven and well cut, but in the hour when God shall demand our souls it will not of itself avail to hide our iniquities.

The Seamless Robe.

My friends, can it be that I have been unkind, and torn from you some hope upon which you are resting for time and eternity? Verily, I could be unkind if, having taken away your oak, I did not offer you something better. This is a cold world and you want something to wrap around your spirit. Christ offers you a robe today. He wove it Himself and He will now with His own hand prepare it just to fit your soul. The righteousness He offers is like the coat He shed to wear about Judæa, without seam from top to bottom. There is a day of doom. Coward would I be if I did not dare tell you this. There shall be a day of unutterable disappointment to those who have trusted in their official dignity, in their elegant manners, in their outward morality, in their soundness of intellectual belief. But I see a soul standing before God who once was thoroughly defiled. Yet look at him and you cannot find a single transgression anywhere about him. How is this, you ask. Was he not once a Sabbath breaker, a blasphemer, a robber, a perjurer, a thief, a murderer? Yes, but Christ hath cleansed him. Christ hath lifted him up. Christ hath rent off his rags. Christ hath clothed him in a spotless

Robe of Righteousness.

That is the reason why you cannot perceive his former degradation. This glorious hope in Christ's name is proffered to-day. Wandering and wayward soul, is not this salvation coming for, worth striving for? Do you wonder that so many with bitter weeping have besought it and with a very enthusiasm of sorrow cried for divine compassion? Do you wonder at the earnestness of those who stand in pulpits beseeching men to be reconciled to God? Nay, do you wonder at the importunity of the Holy Ghost who now striveth with thy soul? In many of the palaces of Europe the walls are mosaic. Fragments of shells and glass are arranged by artists and aggregated into a pictorial splendor. What! made out of broken shells and broken glass! Oh, yes; God grant that by the transforming power of His Spirit we may all be made a part of the eternal palaces, our broken and fragmentary natures polished and shaped and lifted up to make a part of the everlasting splendors of the heavenly temple!

For sinners, Lord, Thou cam'st to bleed,
And I'm a sinner vile indeed.
Lord, I believe Thy grace is free;
Oh, magnify Thy grace in me.

THE WORK AMONG THE INDIANS.

THE story of the founding of the mission in Lone Wolf's Camp in the Indian Territory has already been told in these columns. Lone Wolf himself invited the Rev. W. F. Re Qua to establish the mission, and has faithfully carried out his promise to give land for it and give it all the help of his influence. Mr. Re Qua placed it in charge of Mr. and Mrs. Lancaster, and they have devoted themselves to the work with true faith and consecration. Our readers will not forget that this is specially their work. They have nobly and generously contributed to keep Mr. and Mrs. Re Qua in the field, and this development of it is one of its most hopeful and substantial features. A correspondent, not connected with the mission, but living near it and having opportunity of seeing the value of its work, has sent us a letter warmly commending it, in the course of which he says:

"I live on the section of land in Greer County, Ind. Ter., that joins on the one on which the above mission is located, and am acquainted with the parties conducting it. In a piece published in your paper of April 9th, you state: 'It is impossible to recommend too strongly the claims of this work on the Christian public.' This I know to be true to the letter. Here is a semi-barbarous nation of people, groping in ignorance and darkness, beseeching help to get light and knowledge. The majority of the nation are anxious to learn the 'white man's road,' and to learn to travel therein.

"Mr. and Mrs. Lancaster have been here about eight months, and have received very little support, but they have faith in its final success. Mrs. Lancaster teaches the children in the school, and the girls learn how to sew and make their own garments. Mr. Lancaster shows the men how to plough and farm; sets their posts, and shows them how to put on the wire to enclose their land.

"Mr. and Mrs. Lancaster have been living in a tent for eight months, and praying and hoping for the means necessary to build them a house. Mr. Lancaster spent what little means he brought with him in erecting a stockade building, twenty feet square; he has the picket in the ground, and is waiting for the means to finish the building, so that he may winter in it with his little school. It is a pleasant and affecting sight to see him and his wife call together his scholars, and hold family worship. I have been present and have seen men form around them standing, and all look intently on the book while they sing some familiar old song and join in the singing with a zeal and confidence that is truly astonishing. I have heard the same songs in the excitement of protracted meetings, where the Spirit of God seemed to be moving among the people, but they never touched me so sensibly, and with such power before, as they did when I heard them sung by these Indian children. And when they all kneel, and Mr. Lancaster leads them in an earnest, but plain prayer, asking God to open the eyes of those that are under his charge, it seems that we are in the only bright place in this Nation of the Kiowas. Many who enjoy the comforts of a good home, and are surrounded with society and great blessing of Church privileges, and Christian communion with their friends, should feel it a privilege to assist these self-denying missionaries in this noble undertaking.

"Mrs. Lancaster has stayed alone several times, for one and two weeks, with no one with her except one or two squaws, while Mr. Lancaster was absent in some other part of the country on mission business. The self-denial, the genuine piety, the true faith and holy trust in God that inspires them should commend them to the Christian public, and soon command the means to make the mission an eminent success. The Indians are anxious to be taught how to support themselves; quite a number are farming this year, several raised crops last year, and in a few years they will be settled down in small communities, where the school and church will be the centre, and each family be in their own home, instead of wandering over the reservation."

All contributions should be in money, and be directed to W. D. Lancaster, Lone Wolf Mission, Quartz P. O., Greer Co., Ind. Ter.

AN APPEAL IN A HOTEL.

AN interesting conversion, the result of God's blessing on the personal appeal of a fellow guest in a hotel in Detroit, Mich., was described recently by Mr. Robert Tucker. "It was the story of his own conversion. 'Six months ago,' he said, 'I had come to the conclusion that there was no hope for me, that I was designed to live a life of intemperance, and had virtually decided that I would die a drunkard. There was a warm-hearted, Christian travelling-man stopping at the hotel where I was. I had met several men that day, whom I had not seen for years, and we had been drinking together. He was disgusted with me, but decided to stay around and catch me the next morning. He went at me in a Christian spirit, although I thought it rather rough. We were together Sunday, and early Monday morning he came to my room. I was not up and asked him when he knocked on the door, who it was and what he wanted? He said 'I want to see you before I go.' He came in, sat down beside me and said, 'Before I leave to go to Toledo, I want you to promise me you will never drink any more.' I promised him, and he dropped down on his knees and prayed for me. This was Monday morning. That day I met a man on the street who was a drinking man, and we both marched over to the Casino Tabernacle. After the sermon had been preached, they asked those who wanted prayers to come forward. Now, said he, 'Let's go forward.' We went forward and signed the pledge, something I had never done before. Then they asked us to kneel down. I felt I ought to do as they asked, and we knelt down together, and in less than fifteen minutes—I don't think it was more than that—I felt that God had spoken peace to my soul. Such a happy feeling came into my heart, and I felt as I have ever since, that I would never drink any more, and that I had given my heart to God. That was six months ago. Since that time, I have had such a desire in my heart to go for others, that I have devoted my afternoons, that is, about three hours, to going about the worst parts of my city, and it is wonderful how the Lord sends people along."

SCENES IN DAMASCUS.

(See Illustration on first page.)

A Site of Natural Beauty—An Elevated Plain Watered by Famous Rivers—Antiquity of the City—Its Reputed Founder a Grandson of Noah—Vicissitudes of its History—The Recent Massacre of Christians—Dr. Talmage's Visit to Damascus—Bigotry of the People—The Carpenter's Shop in the Tree—The House on the Wall From Which Paul Escaped—The House of Ananias—The Street Called Straight.

ON the first page this week will be found another group of Oriental pictures drawn from photographs in the collection brought from the Holy Land by Dr. Talmage. These four are from Damascus, which is probably the oldest city in the world.

The site of Damascus is the most beautiful in western Asia, if not in the world. It is a triangular plain 2,200 feet above the level of the sea, and about four hundred square miles in area. On the east it is sheltered by a group of conical hills, and from these flow the rivers which are the glory of Damascus. Abana, one of the rivers of which Naaman boasted (II. Kings 5: 12) when he was required by Elisha to bathe in the Jordan, is one of these. It is now called Barada. Rising high up on the western flank or Ante Lebanon it forces its way through the chain, running for some distance among the mountains, till suddenly it bursts through a narrow cleft upon the open country and diffuses fertility far and wide. In the midst of the plain is a vast stretch of deep verdure, walnuts and apricots waving above, corn and grass below; and in the midst of this mass of foliage rises, striking out its white arms of streets hither and thither, and its white minarets above the trees which embosom them, the city of Damascus. On the right, towers the snowy height of Mount Hermon overlooking the whole scene. The river Awaj which flows from Hermon is probably the ancient river Pharpar which Naaman boasted of.

The Antiquity of Damascus

is well established. Josephus says it was founded by Uz the grandson of Shem, the eldest son of Noah. Abraham's steward, Eliezer, who went on that memorable journey to find a wife for Isaac, was a native of Damascus. (Gen. 15: 2.) The Scriptures are silent about the city afterward, until the time of David, when in a war with its king, David captured the city, and put a garrison in it. (I Chron. 18: 5-6.) It afterward appears to have reverted to the ancient dynasty, for in Solomon's reign there was a king of Damascus who was an enemy of Israel. (I Kings 11: 25.) The kingdom of Syria of which Damascus was the capital, is frequently mentioned in the history of subsequent wars, and always in antagonism to the Jews. In the reign of Ahaz, the Syrians became allies of the northern kingdom of Israel, in opposition to the growing power of the Assyrians. They were beaten, and Damascus was taken. Ahaz, by submission to Assyria saved his own kingdom of Judah, but on humiliating terms. The influence of Damascus after this declined, and we find frequent reference in Isaiah, Jeremiah and Amos to its decay. It had a variety of masters during the next few centuries. It belonged in succession to the Egyptians, the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks and the Romans. Under the latter it had a revival of prosperity which was in full tide in New Testament times. It is now, like all that region, under Turkish Government. Rather might it be called misgovernment, and a conspicuous illustration of the fact is furnished by the recent history of this very city. In July, 1860, without the slightest opposition, if not with the connivance of the Turkish Governor, the bigoted Moslem population made a sudden onslaught on the defenceless Christians in the city, burned their houses, and slaughtered six thousand persons.

Dr. Talmage's Visit

to Damascus is thus described by Mr. L. Klopsch, who accompanied him: "Our first impression of the city, was an exceedingly favorable one, and the principal entrance to it is perfectly beautiful. Even in December the luxuriance of the foliage of the gardens, by which we passed toward the city, defies description, and the deep glades with their pretty houses, the roofs of which are below the level of the well-graded road, which is completely shaded by majestic trees, planted on either side, present a scene that an abler pen than mine might shrink from describing.

"Although the largest of the cities of Turkey in Asia, Damascus is likewise one of the dirtiest and most fanatical; and yet, in spite of its filth, it is very attractive. Its bazaars are wonderful, and contain the most beautiful fabrics in bewildering profusion. But shopping is not enjoyable, as in our American cities. The ladies of our party were spit upon, and frequently treated with other expressions of marked contempt, because they appeared unveiled on the streets. Even the Turkish women join the men in these demonstrations, and a visit to any of the shops was sure to draw a curious crowd. Another disagreeable feature of outdoor experience was the number of beggars who try to gain sympathy and alms by exhibiting deformities of all kinds, and specimens of elephantiasis, which causes limbs to swell to almost incredible proportions, and covers them with sickening, festering sores. The men so affected are to be seen at all the street corners.

"No Eastern city can boast of more minarets than Damascus, and five times daily the cry resounds from each, 'God is God, and Mohammed is His prophet,' which constitutes a call to prayer to all faithful Moslems.

"We remained in Damascus three days and then left for Beyrout, where we found many friends, as it is the most Christian city in Asia, with its American college and other institutions. Dr. Talmage preached, and we had a pleasant time in seeing the excellent work being done by our countrymen in the school and among the people."

The Illustrations.

One of the strangest sights in the city to a western traveller is the old hollow tree (depicted in panel No. 1), in which a carpenter has established his shop, and which is so large that he finds plenty of room for his work. In Damascus, too, was found the Nubian negro who was willing to be photographed in all the bravery of a new striped robe. He was a fine stalwart specimen of humanity, of remarkable intelligence and a force of character that is expressed in his face. His portrait occupies panel No. 2, on the first page. The house on the wall, a picture of which is in panel No. 3, is the object to which the Christian visitor turns with the greatest interest. The house pointed out as the one from which Paul escaped (Acts. 9: 25, and II. Cor. 2: 3: 33) is one that certainly might have been used for the purpose. Though implicit confidence cannot be placed in the traditions which identify existing buildings with notable events, the character of the house and its situation, tend to substantiate the claim in this case. It must have been from such a house, forming a part of the city wall, that Paul was lowered in a basket, while the soldiers of the governor held the gates of the city, and searched for him within the walls.

The House of Ananias

is no less interesting in its associations. A picture of the edifice which tradition identifies as the one occupied by the disciple who instructed Paul after his miraculous conversion, (Acts 9: 10-16) appears in panel No. 4, of the first page illustration. No Christian man can look on that place and imagine the possibility of its having had Ananias for a tenant, and not feel deep emotion. The scene rises before his mind's eye. The humble disciple has heard the summons from God to go to the persecutor Saul, and instruct him in the Christian faith. He can scarcely believe his ears, and as he issues forth from this house his heart must have been full of wonder. None but the Divine voice could have sent Ananias on such a mission. He knew Saul by reputation, knew the purpose that had brought him to Damascus, and to go to him voluntarily must have seemed like courting imprisonment and death. Yet Ananias gave the assurance of God that Saul is seeking the light, and he goes out joyfully to open his blind eyes and to let the light into his soul. Never from any house on earth did man come forth on a mission so momentous to the World's future as there came forth from that house in Damascus on that day.

The street called "Straight" is also pointed out. It does not appear in recent times to have deserved its name, whatever it may have done in the days when Paul lived in it in the house of Judas: but of late improvements have taken place, obstructions have been removed and now it is as nearly straight as an Oriental street can be made. Three or four spots—one of them a Christian cemetery—are identified with the scene of Paul's conversion, but of those claims there is more reason for doubt. All that we know is that it was somewhere outside the walls of the city, and probably on the Jerusalem road.

CHARLES ABBOT'S INVITATIONS.A Story of the S. S. Lesson for July 13.

"I WISH you would authorize me to propose your name for church membership, Charles," said Dr. Carleton, as he strolled homeward one Sunday afternoon after school, with Charles Abbot, one of his teachers.

"I will think of it, Doctor," said the young man. "There are difficulties in the way that I can't explain. I am trying to see my way through them. If I can do so in a few weeks I will ask you to propose me."

"Why not let me do it on Thursday at the church-meeting. I have not a single new member to propose, and I should like to have you. Could you not give me a general idea of your difficulty? Perhaps I could help you."

"I am afraid not, Doctor," said the young man. It involves another person's confidence, and it would be dishonorable even to hint it."

"Well, I won't press it, but I would advise you to read what Christ said about making a profession. It is necessary to acknowledge Him before men."

"Yes, I know. I certainly intend joining the church, but it had better stand over for a while. Better for the church and better for me."

"I cannot understand you, Charles," said Dr. Carleton. If there is any sin in the way, it is better not to join us. But that involves a more momentous question. Sin will keep you out of heaven, and if you are not right with God, it would only make matters worse to take upon you the name of Christ. Get that right first. Remember if you do see your way to confide in me, I shall be glad to help you as far as I can."

"Thank you, Doctor, I know that. If I can I will come to you; but I fear I must fight my battle alone."

The two parted here, and Dr. Carleton went home to pray for his young friend, and Charles Abbot went to his room to think the matter out. He had often tried to do so, but never to a satisfactory conclusion. He was weak morally and he had fallen. The old conflict between the two natures had been going on within him and the higher nature had been defeated. The lower nature had been insubordinate, and in a moment of severe temptation it had shaken of control and run into sin. The next day he had been miserable, but the evil could not be undone. One thing he was determined on; it should never occur again. But it did occur. The lower nature had tasted the sweets of victory and there was no power within him to restrain it now in its exultant state. So the evil went on. He continued teaching in Sunday-school, continued reading his Bible, and praying for strength; but with a renewal of temptation he would fall. He hoped that in some way circumstances would change, so that he might be kept out of temptation, but he had not the moral courage to bring those circumstances about. He would not retire from Christian work, but he would not identify himself more closely with it, lest exposure might come. He believed in the truths of the Christian religion, and lived them in his life, with that one exception. He hoped that exception might be removed, and then his life would square with his conscience.

and then he would come out openly for Christ. This afternoon, again, he came to the same conclusion—he must wait.

"Are your difficulties removed yet, Charles?" Dr. Carleton inquired a year later. "I hope you mean to have a Christian home?" He had during the previous week officiated at the marriage of his young friend, and had a shrewd suspicion that the ceremony put an end to the difficulty about which they had spoken that Sunday afternoon.

"I think I will wait a little longer, doctor," said Abbot. "There are so many things I must see to now. It is a serious thing to be married and I must give all my attention to business for time. We have had some heavy losses and at the same time I thought I would postpone the marriage till we had tided over the crisis, but that might have caused talk, and done mischief financially. As soon as we are out of the wood, and see daylight with meeting our notes, I shall ask you to propose my name to the church."

"Better do it now, Charles. You do not mean to do anything dishonorable."

"Well, if we should have a financial failure will be better for the church not to have it said that one of the partners is a member."

"I don't think so. The church would not suffer. Very upright and honorable men experience business reverses, and recover."

"No, I do not want to bring reproach on the church. Wait awhile, doctor."

Dr. Carleton left the neighborhood soon after his conversation to take charge of a New York church, and had no further opportunities of appealing to his friend. Twenty years passed since the two had met, when one day, Dr. Carleton heard some one call his name on Broadway. He turned and saw a tall, portly gentleman, whom he did not recognize.

"You have forgotten me, doctor," the gentleman said. "I suppose I have changed more than you have. Your hair is white now, but you are the same man you were twenty years ago. Do you not remember Charles Abbot?"

"Why, certainly. My eyes are not so good as they used to be."

"I have come to live in New York," said Abbot. "I hope we shall see you often. We are pretty well fixed now. I went into the oil speculation and have made money. I am out of business now, though I go down to Wall Street rather often, and do a little speculating still. Mr. Abbot and the girls wanted to get into society, or I should have settled down in the old place. Still, now I am here, I like New York. Come and see us," and Abbot handed the doctor his card.

"You know the Abbots, do you not, doctor?" said one of his people to him shortly afterward. "Mr. Abbot said he knew you."

"Yes, Mr. Abbot was connected with my first church. Not a member of it, but a promising young man."

"They are having a disagreeable experience here. They seem to have thought their wealth would admit them into society, and they are finding out their mistake. I was at a reception last night where the whole family were. They had managed to get an invitation somehow, but they will never get another. Their gross vulgarity and purse-pride, especially of the ladies, disgusted every one, and they were miserable, too. They have nothing in common with good society. They did not understand the conversation. They were thoroughly out of their element."

Dr. Carleton made several efforts to meet his old friend, but failed. At last, however, he received an urgent summons from him and went once. He found him seriously ill, with little hope of recovery.

"It is too late now, doctor," he said when the clergyman asked him about his soul. "I might have come to Christ years ago, when you first spoke to me, but not now. I thought of it after I came home from one of your grand New York receptions. The whole thing flashed upon me. I was not of that set, and it was clear to them and ourselves. When I thought about it, I saw it was the same with me in religion. If I could go to heaven, I should be miserable there. I am of the world, worldly. I gave myself to the world and put off, and put off, until my whole soul was eaten up. I am lost utterly. I wanted to tell you about it; but I am past your help."

Dr. Carleton spoke of the transforming power of the Holy Spirit and assured the despairing man that through that power he could be fitted to enter heaven. But Abbot said, no, it was impossible, and in spite of the clergyman's arguments he persisted. "It is in the nature of things," he said. "I am one of those of whom God has said, 'None of those men who were bidden shall taste of my supper.' I must go to my own place. I refused the invitation too many times, and now it is too late." And he died in that belief.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Belligerent Trout was Disarmed by an Operation recently. A journal devoted to natural history warns keepers of aquariums against introducing California trout among their fishes. It states that the owner of a famous aquarium noticed that his smaller fishes were being hurt. He watched them and found that the injuries were inflicted by a Californian trout which he had placed among them not long before. The fish was of a quarrelsome vicious disposition and bit at its companions at every opportunity. He decided to kill the trout, but was reluctant to do so. He therefore tried to render it harmless. Procuring a pair of pincers he took the trout from the water and extracted its teeth taking care not to injure the fish. It appears that the teeth of trout are not needed for mastication but are used only for seizing and holding its prey. In an aquarium where the fishes do not have to seek their food, the teeth could be dispensed with. The trout was no worse off without them and the other fishes were saved from molestation. The trout appears to be well in health since the operation. Probably it retains its vicious disposition though it is restrained from indulging it. That is all the law can do with vicious men. The divine method is more radical. It changes the disposition. (1 Cor. 6:11.)

The Plea of a Mother Saved a Convict from prison in New York on June 23. Early this month a little boy fell into the East River and would have been drowned if a man had not promptly jumped off the dock and rescued him. The occurrence was reported in the newspapers, with the name and address of the man who rescued him. It happened that the police had been looking for that man for some time, on a charge of burglary, and when they read his address in the newspaper they promptly arrested him. He was tried last week and convicted. Before sentence was passed, the mother of the child he had rescued appealed to the judge for mercy, and said that if the judge would suspend sentence, a friend of hers would give him employment and a chance to reform. The judge was greatly moved. After consideration he said, "I will not send you to prison, as you risked your life, to save another life and so showed there is some good in you. In consideration of this woman's plea I will suspend sentence." The prisoner's crime is not forgiven, and if he misconducts himself he may still have to answer for it, for a good deed cannot atone for an evil one. That fact is not realized by those who hope to get to heaven by their good works. Only through the merits of the Saviour can men be saved, and subsequent holiness of life is required of them. (Ezek. 33:13.)

The Discovery of a Mistake in a Bargain Astonished a litigant in a New York court last week. He made a purchase in May last, from the Dock Department of the city, of certain rights in a bulkhead which was used by oystermen. The purchaser himself was an oysterman, but had quarrelled with the other men engaged in the trade. When the bulkhead was put up for sale they tried to buy it, but he bid against them and bought it at a higher price than they were willing to pay. On taking possession, he turned the lease over to a hardware merchant, and ordered the oystermen who had floats anchored to the bulkhead to remove them. They might land all the boats they wanted there by paying the legal rate of wharfage, but they must not block the bulkhead. It was his property, and he proposed to do business there himself. In reply, the oystermen informed him that a special Act of the Legislature had set apart the bulkhead for their use, and it could not be withdrawn from them. Then the purchaser appealed to the Dock Department and was told that the oystermen were right. All that he had purchased was the right to collect and retain all rentals which might accrue for its use and occupation. He had made the mistake of supposing that he had purchased the bulkhead and could use it for any purpose he chose. None but oystermen could use it, and if he drove them away, he would have to let the bulkhead stand idle. This was an unpleasant hearing, and he has now appealed to the courts. A similar mistake is often made as to other kinds of property. Men say, "Can I not do what I will with my own?" They forget that property has its duties as well as its rights, and that an account will have to be rendered to Him "who giveth the power to get wealth." (Deut. 8:18.)

A Tattooed Memorial Secured a Man a Funeral and a grave in a cemetery in New York last week. An unknown man dropped dead in Eighth Avenue on June 17. He seemed to have been very poor, for in the pockets of his shabby clothes there was not a cent. His description was published in the newspapers, and among other details, mention was made of a tattoo mark on his right arm. It represents a tomb overhung by the branches of a weeping willow. Below was the inscription, "In memory of my mother." Nothing was known of him; but one thing was clear, he had once had a mother whom he loved. The body was sent to a station-house and the next day would have been buried in Potter's Field at the expense of the city, if a merchant had not interposed. He asked permission to pay the cost of a decent funeral for the man in a cemetery. He did not know him, but he, too, had lost his mother, and the memory of her had been enshrined in his heart for many years. He felt a brotherhood with the man whose love of his dead mother was displayed in the tattoo marks, and desired to do a brother's part by him. If every Christian felt that the love of Christ, common to him with other Christians, constituted a bond of brotherhood, with its claims upon him, how much hardship and pain would be relieved! (Mark 9:41.)

An Objection to Prayer as an Effort to Exercise undue influence was raised some time ago in the courts of Kansas. In the course of the reminiscences of a distinguished member of the bar of that State, he recalled a case in which he had been engaged. After the jury had given in their verdict, it came out that a prayer had been offered in the jury-room. One of the jurors proposed that before the case was discussed, Divine guidance should be sought. His proposal was accepted, and he was deputed to offer the prayer. When the facts became known, the lawyer of the defeated litigant tried to have the verdict set aside, on the ground that the prayer was an irregular and illegal proceeding and was calculated to exert undue influence on the jury. It appeared, however, that the juror had not prayed for the success of either side to the suit, but merely for wisdom and discretion. If the verdict was the result of the prayer being answered, the inference was evidently not creditable to the lawyer and his client. In any case, the juror deserved praise for his faithfulness and courage. If we may judge by the verdicts often given in our courts we should say that it is very seldom that prayer is offered in the jury-room, or if it is, it is not answered. "Evil men understand not judgment: but they that seek the Lord understand all things." (Prov. 28:5.)

Volume XII., of the Christian Herald, Containing the numbers for 1889, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, 1887, and 1888 are also for sale. None are on hand prior to 1884.

THE OPENING OF THE FIFTH SEAL.

By Rev. W. Haslam.

The Tribulation Culminating—The Martyrs Waiting Accessions—Universal Worship Demanded for Antichrist—The Penalty of Refusal—The Penalty of Compliance—The Palm Bearing Multitude—Had to Wash Their Robes—Their Victory—The Sealed Voices—The Angel's Oath.

THE opening of the fifth seal (Rev. 6: 9-18), marks a change in the progress of the narrative of future events. Under the previous seals, men have suffered the judgment of God for their worldliness and ambition; under the fifth seal they are persecuted by men for righteousness sake.

When the fifth seal was opened by the Lamb, we do not read that there were any earthquakes or voices calling attention to the act. It was in the presence of the glorious throng in heaven. The Apostle says, "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held: and they cried with a loud voice, saying, how long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" (Rev. 6: 9, 10.) So these saints of God have gone through sore trial and a great fire of persecution. They willingly laid down their lives for the Word of God and for the testimony. They are the great army of martyrs mentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews, of whom the world was not worthy. (See Heb. 11.)

Opened in Silence

The Beast or Antichrist, and the False Prophet had then issued their edict to persecute the saints who would not bow down and worship the golden image which had been set up. This time the image is not set up in the plains of Dura, but in the very Temple of God which is in Jerusalem. The edict will go forth as before, commanding all peoples, nations, and languages, to bow down to the image which the great king has set up. All men will be required to bow down, on pain of something more terrible than the burning fiery furnace. On the other hand, another edict will be issued and proclaimed by an angel of God "saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the Beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, he shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God,"

Great patience and endurance will be necessary in order to "endure to the end;" and without doubt this will also be provided by God's grace for His suffering saints. These are predicted by the Master. A great multitude which no man can number from all parts of the world will be put to death, and they will willingly choose this rather than bear the mark of the Beast or bow down to his image. From this and other tokens we see how universal will be the reign and dominion of this great monarch, Antichrist. All over the world his power will be known and felt. His decrees will be promulgated and enforced by telegraphs and other rapid methods of communication.

The Days of Trouble

The commands which are given will be transmitted and spread abroad to all parts. Any refusal to obey them will be readily reported—and then the edict of punishment! There will be implying that the Gospel of the Kingdom has been by this time preached for a witness to all nations. Like the two witnesses who were martyred and taken up into heaven, we may suppose that this martyred multitude will be taken up also and clothed in white: they will be associated with the martyrs who are waiting for them.

Martyrs All Over the World:

In the seventh chapter of Revelation we read that "a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." Such was the declaration of praise and triumph with which the palm-bearing multitude announced their arrival into heaven.

The four Beasts or Living Creatures, and the twenty-four Elders, take no part as yet in this welcome, although they are present. One of the Elders, however, calls the Apostle's attention to the new-comers and says to him, "What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of the great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." (Rev. 7: 13-15.)

What shall we say of this brilliant and privileged throng, so innumerable and so blessed? They have borne the brunt of cruel battles on earth; and they have stood to their testimony, even unto the death—that Jesus Christ is the true Messiah. Put to death under Antichrist, they have been translated into glory. The white robes they wear imply that they are glorified, like the four-and-twenty Elders and the other martyred saints. They have for while the Living Creatures are upon and about the throne, and the Elders are sitting around it, they stand before the throne, upon the sea of glass like unto crystal. They come upon the scene also after the others have been there some time with Christ. They have a history and a place peculiarly their own.

Not the Same Degree in Heaven;

They were saved, as we are, by faith in the blood of Jesus; but for the glory they have now attained they had to wash their robes in the blood of the Lamb. To us is given freely the robe of justification, which needs no washing, the "best robe" (see Luke 15: 22). It is a robe which cannot be made better—the same to all eternity. It cannot be washed and made white; for it is white with the righteousness of God.

These saved ones, however, under the Gospel of the Kingdom, have to work and to do for themselves what has been fully and freely done for us. Notwithstanding, they are before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in the Heavenly Temple. He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them, and manifest His Divine Presence with them. He shall overshadow them with the fulness of His joy; and "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more." (Rev. 6: 16.) This is as much as to say that they had known hunger and thirst on earth for His sake. They had borne the scorching heat of the sun in the day of their conflict. All that is past now, and duly acknowledged. The Lamb whom they loved recognizes that love and manifests His love toward them. Now, enthroned, He shall feed them with heavenly food, and lead them to living fountains; and God Himself shall manifest His love and compassion for their sufferings, and shall wipe away forever their tears. We see once again in a glorious and triumphant vision. "And I saw," says the Apostle, "as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the Beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb." Here they are singing because God is about to pour out the vials of His wrath upon Antichrist and his followers, who had so cruelly persecuted them.

The Palm-bearing Multitude

After the slaughter of the saints in the Great Tribulation, it would appear that the wickedness of men, and especially of the great King of men, was come to the full. God will bear with man no longer. Now it is for Him to rise up and punish the ungodly.

The Awful Vengeance

and tremendous wrath of God which are to be displayed will be ushered in by a remarkable and majestic vision. The Apostle says, "And I saw another Mighty Angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon His head, and His face was as it were the sun, and His feet as pillars of fire."

The Mighty Angel with the rainbow round His head is none other than the Lord Jesus Himself. He is come to bring unrighteousness and wickedness to a close, and to finish "the mystery of God." He is come "to make an end of sins."

This Angel is represented as standing upon the sea and upon the earth, to imply that His solemn errand is to Gentiles and to Jews. Lifting up His hand to heaven, He swears by the Creator of heaven, and earth, and sea, that time (or delay) should be no longer. That is to say that the patience of God is exhausted, His long forbearance has come to an end; and now must begin His terrible judgments. His enemies are to be disarmed, and the power which had been delegated to them be taken away from them forever. The Apostle was forbidden to reveal or write the words which the seven thunders uttered; nor are we told what is the subject matter of the little book in the Angel's hand.

The precise time at which these judgments are to begin we cannot do more than conjecture. We may suppose that the persecution of the saints in

The Great Tribulation will last Three Years.

This persecution, it will be remembered, is to commence in the middle of the last week of years—that is, three years and a half after Antichrist makes his covenant with many of the Jews. Then will he cause the sacrifice to cease, and the "abomination of desolation" to be set up. Three years from this time will bring us to within half a year from the end. The terrible events which are to happen under the trumpets and vials, need not take six months. It will be a short work of judgment. We are told that "for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." (Matt. 24: 22.)

Most fearful and dreadful days will they be! Earthquakes shall shake the earth, and the heavens shall at one time pour out fire to destroy the earth and the things that are therein, and at another time they will be darkened. Besides this, actual sufferings will be inflicted upon man and beast. These events will be the preparation for the finale, when the seventh angel will sound and the "mystery of God" shall be fulfilled. Then the Lord Himself shall come in Person, together with His saints.

A JOKE ON A PHILANTHROPIST.

AN impressive lesson was unwittingly given to one of our philanthropists recently. It was given in the form of a joke, but it was a lesson which he says he shall never forget. The philanthropist in question is Mr. W. F. M. Round, a man whose efforts on behalf of discharged prisoners have led to the reclamation of hundreds of abandoned criminals. He has pleaded frequently their claims on the sympathy of the followers of Him who was the Friend of publicans and sinners, and he was made feel how much they need that sympathy. He says: I was going up the Hudson with an English friar who is a great wag, and he had even got so far that he could perpetrate and understand an American joke. He was walking up and down the boat and I was reading. I saw him talking with this group and that, and finally, when I had finished my paper, I went to the edge of the boat and saw a group, who were looking out at the scenery. I volunteered to tell them something about the places along the shore, and they jumped away from me and left me standing there alone. Presently I heard some men talking about the tariff and I joined in the conversation, and if every man had been an icicle, he could not have turned a colder shoulder. I walked off to another part of the boat, not understanding it at all. Then came walking up to me an old man with silvery hair and an honest face, and he came up in such a kind fashion and took my hand in his, that I could not refuse him. He said, "My friend, you have had a very hard life, haven't you?" "Well," I said, "I don't know about the average, I think." He looked disappointed and dropped my hand and, presently, he took it again and said, "Now I want to do you good. Tell me when you took your first wrong step." "Well, really, it was so long ago and I have taken so many since, that I don't believe I could tell." He went away and, finally, he came back and brought a little tract, "A word to ex-convicts!" He said, "Read th-

It may do you good." It was one I had written myself. I went across the cabin to ask my friend what was the matter, and I found him doubled up with laughter. He had been going from group to group and pointing me out as one who had been in every prison and jail in New York State. Well, brethren, there was a laugh in it, but God in His wisdom knowing the work He had for me to do, taught me a lesson by it. He permitted me just to taste such a cup of bitterness and loneliness, that I shall never look unto the face of a discharged prisoner, but I shall always remember the coldness with which I was regarded by that group of men."

THE GREAT SUPPER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for July 13; Luke 14: 15-24; Golden Text Luke 14: 15.

He Saviour in the Pharisee's House—His Work There—Christ's Rule of Hospitality—A Pious Remark—Inward Carnality—The Invitation to the Supper—Many Bidden—How it is Given—What it is to Make Excuse—What it Involves—The Excuses Offered—Business—Marriage—The Report of the Servant—A Compelling Power—The Awful Word.

It was a Sabbath day, and Jesus, probably by invitation, entered into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread. There was plenty of work for the Master to do in that Pharisee's house. He had a message for the guests. Human nature, in all its miserable littleness, was manifesting itself in their choosing the chief rooms, each for himself. Every one thus asserting himself as some one who was of importance. There was only One present who had intrinsic dignity enough to refrain from this petty strife; it was Jesus Himself, who received not honor from men (John 5: 41), and as man, by the very fact of this freedom from the same spirit, He had power to point out to them that the path of honor as well as wisdom was to take the lowest place.

No one was forgotten by Jesus. Unoccupied with Himself, He was completely at His Father's disposal. He had a message to His host, an unexpected, unwelcome, but a never-to-be-forgotten message, one which, if Christians lived according to the Bible, would have transformed the customs of society from selfish to unselfish, from human to divine. "When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy rich neighbors (poor neighbors may be called); lest they also bid thee in, and a recompense be made thee."

Is it Possible

For eighteen hundred years this has been the written rule of God's kingdom for dinner and supper parties, and that, in face of so clear direction, men who profess and call themselves Christians do not so much as dream of obeying it? Who is there among outward professors who, in sending out invitations, kneels in first to ask God to remind him of any who he is likely to bid him again, so that he may avoid giving them an invitation? Who fears to be lenient again, and that a recompense be made? Is it not the usual plan, even among Christians, to invite those who are likely to return the invitation? Is it not the very few who, as stewards of God, invite only those who are invited for God's sake, and for His works, sake their souls and bodies, or in those of others. How few, when they make a feast, invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind! How few see that, in hospitality, as in all else, they are called to be witnesses of God, and to do as He does to us, having no other reason for doing it but because it is like God. As we expect on earth some return for what we give, we are not "children of the resurrection" (Luke 20: 36). They who live in the self-atmosphere of "this present evil age" (Gal. 1: 4, R. V. Marg.), cannot wait for their reward after the resurrection of the just, "Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward." (Matt. 6: 16.) They have it now, instead of in the great after. Oh, if men would but understand eternal life, really lived down here, makes all its calculations for eternity, they could afford to forego present recompense, because God's faithfulness is such a reality to them. To seek anything for ourselves in the present life is beneath the dignity of our vocation; by the blood of Christ we are separated from the life of self. He died for us, "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves" (II. Cor. 5: 15), the power which blood-bought souls have over the enemy is that they love not their lives unto the death (Rev. 12: 11), that is, they do not seek what is due to them, what suits them, what honors them, what pleases them, but they live for "Him which died for them."

When "one of them that sat at meat with Him heard these things, he said unto Him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God." A but the all-seeing eye of Jesus read the heart of the speaker, tried him in the balances and found him wanting. The parable which follows was addressed to this one individual, as though the Lord would say to him, Wilt thou be there? There are unspiritual people who are in the habit of making just such remarks, with which they seek to cover over the real worldliness and carnality of their hearts. They little know how a spiritual mind detects the unreality at once, and how painful it is to see one who does not know how to put off the shoes from off his feet (Exod. 3: 5), tread thus irreverently on holy ground.

Pious and Appropriate Remark,

"Then said He unto him, a certain man made a great supper and bade many." Whatever other parables may signify, this one is a clear invitation to come "without money and without price," without condition, and without preparation of any kind, to a welcoming and loving Saviour. Every call of God's Holy Spirit, from our earliest years, every conscious touch of God in our lives before we are converted, is this bidding, this call on the part of God, to sinful, unworthy man, that he should come to Jesus, and be saved. Every one has been thus bidden who is conscious that he is not living as he ought to live, and he cannot rid himself of the responsibility. There is at one time or another a consciousness in the heart of every unsaved sinner that all is not right between him and God, and this is the bidding to the feast, which is really the work of the Holy Ghost, although He does not appear as the Agent. He has come to "reprove the world," the unsaved, "of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (John 16: 3), and who dares to say He does not do His work? But a time comes when the Holy Ghost brings a pressure to bear upon souls; it is, not only come, but, come now; difficulties are met, and the call of God declares, Come, for all things are now ready, God is waiting for you, salvation is waiting your acceptance, eternal life is waiting your willing, free choice. An answer must be given, it is an awfully decisive moment, there can no longer be a hiding away in supposed neutrality, you have gone too far, and God has gone too far, to draw back. Immortal soul, you must come, or you must be responsible throughout an endless eternity for wilfully refusing your own soul's salvation. "And they all with one consent Began to Make Excuse."

From what would sinners be excused? From reconciliation with God? What then? Do they love their rebellion best, and ask God to His face to excuse them for continuing to rebel? Excused from receiving a free pardon? What is this but to say, "We intend to continue in sin; We love our sins too well to part with them, and we are willing to run the risk of eternal death rather than be forced to part with them by the position of obligation in which a free pardon would place us. But we want to be on good terms with God, we may want His mercy in a dying hour; we would like to be excused! What an outrage against every sense of honor, of uprightness, of gratitude, is this! and yet it is the true position of every soul who consciously and wilfully rejects Jesus.

What were the excuses? Senseless, shallow, groundless, vain. One said, "I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it; I pray thee have me excused." The bargain had been made, he had the title deeds of the land, all his survey of it would not secure it more than it was secured already, and this over anxiety for that which was his already, was going to rob him of a friendship which he could ill afford to lose. And you sinner, what are you saying? "I must needs, I must look after my business in these times of competition. I must provide for my family. I must keep up my position. I must look after my health. I must needs do all this. And is there no I must for eternity? Is there no "I must see that my relations are right with God, that I am truly living to His glory, that no sin of the past or present comes between Him and me? Men ignore the claims of their Creator, who formed them for Himself. (Isa. 43: 21.) They forget what the blood of Christ has done for them. Is it thus men requite the love stronger than death, which bore their sins? Is it possible that for a few acres of land, a few oxen, a new house, a newly-married wife, a banker's account, a speculation in the money market,—is it possible that for these things men throw away the offer of companionship with God for ever? For these things, which occupy, wear, fret, worry, but never satisfy; will men reject the dignity of becoming sons of God? For the shallow, fleeting honor of a few fellow worms of earth, will men become degraded for an endless eternity? And men complain that it is hard of God to condemn for ever, those who for a whole lifetime deliberately refuse the offers of God's grace! Do they not judge themselves to be "unworthy of everlasting life (Acts 13: 26), and can God force it upon them? The excuses become

More and More Bold.

The first said, "I must needs go;" the second, "I go;" the third, "I cannot come." Every rejecter of God's grace makes the downward path easier for the rest.

"So that servant came and shewed His Lord these things." Who is that Servant sent of God to bid souls come to Him? Preachers, tracts, circumstances, may be His instruments, but it is ever the same Agent, the Holy Ghost, who brings men in contact with Jesus. He "shows His Lord these things." What is the report He gives of you? Does the Holy Ghost bear witness in heaven that you want to be excused? "The Master of the house was angry." It is no light thing for God to be angry. There comes a time when God treats the rejection of Christ by a sinner as final. The Master said to his servant, "Go out quickly,"—and it was not now to the formerly bidden guests, but "into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind,"—just those whom He calls us to invite to our houses, just those hopeless and lost ones, the drunkard, the outcast, the heathen. And the Holy Ghost is doing this work while I write, and while you read these words. To the hopeless He sends hope; to the broken, those who have learned their nothingness, those who have nothing and are nothing in the world, He sends a compelling message of love, that they shall fill His house. Once the servant returned to say His work was accomplished, all that could be found in the streets were gathered, "and yet there is room." His second mission was to "the highways and hedges," with the addition, "Compel them to come in." God bless every earnest soul to whom He gives by the Holy Ghost this compelling power.

One last awful word God speaks in this parable to the Christ-rejecter. To all who have become acquainted with the Word of God without obeying it, to all who have become members of Christian churches without being really saved, to all who have been content to pray in a way to satisfy their own consciences, without any real contact and communion with God,—to all who have learned the truths of the Gospel without being personally saved by them, God sends this fearful message, "For I say unto you, that none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper."

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

THE following letter came to me through the United States Mail:

"DEAR SIR: I do not believe much that you preach, but I am certain that you believe it all. To be a Christian I must believe the Bible to be true. I do not believe it. I go to hear you preach because you preach the Bible as I was taught it in my youth by a father who, like yourself, believed what, in the capacity of a preacher, he proclaimed. I have been for thirty-five years anxious to walk in the path my mother is treading, confident in her simple faith. I have lived to see my children's children, and the distance that lies between me and my real estate in the graveyard cannot be very great. At my age it would be worse than folly to argue simply to confound, or dispute merely for the love of wrangling. I feel my breath growing shorter, my steps more tottering, and I am lost in the wilderness."

After stating many difficulties in the 9th chapter of Romans, he says:

"I pray morning, noon, and night, because I am afraid not to pray. What shall I do that I have not done so that I may see clearly?"

(Signed) ONE OF THE CONGREGATION."

This letter excites all my sympathies, for I have been in that quagmire, and I know how deep it is. A man may get into a morbid state of mind and may believe anything or disbelieve anything. A student of Dr. Witherspoon came and said: "I believe everything is imaginary. I myself am only an imaginary being." Dr. Witherspoon said to him: "Go down and hit your head against the college-door, and if you are imaginary and the door is imaginary it won't hurt you." When a car gets off track you may find it next minute upside down or in splinters.

I notice there are no slurs at religion in this letter—the first letter of the kind I ever saw. The first thing a man generally does after turning his back upon Christianity is to spit in the face of Christ by caricaturing religion. But this letter is respectful and reverential.

I congratulate the author of it on the fact that he had a pious parentage. While we want something stronger than our mother's apron-strings to save us, it is a grand thing to have had a good father and mother. A profligate broke forth, weeping, and said: "Oh, that tear of my mother that fell on my hand one night when I lay in the trundle-bed!" A man never gets over having been prayed for. He is apt to come around all right. I congratulate the author of the letter on being the son of a minister. It is a wrongful impression that minister's children are worse than others. Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, says that in the biographies of one hundred clergymen he finds they had one hundred and ten sons who were clergymen, and you know that to be a clergyman means at least piously inclined. Religion in the parsonage, where this man was brought up, was a happy religion. Some day all these conversations and prayers and preachings and blessed memories will charge upon his soul and capture it in five minutes for Christ. That old Christian father, gone into glory, will yet greet this unbelieving son.

In this letter you ask me for counsel, and I give it. In one part of your letter you show that your chief study of the Bible has been in the ninth chapter of Romans. My advice is that for six months you stop reading other portions of the Bible and read only the evangelists Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. "But is not all Scripture given by inspiration of God, and profitable?" Yes, so are all the medicines in the apothecary-shops good and useful; but they all have different uses, and are to be administered in different circumstances. There are aloes and arsenic and opium and Peruvian bark—all good in their places; but in one condition of the system this medicine may cure you, and in another it will kill you. Now, I say that the ninth chapter of Romans, which is glorious tonic to a strong Christian, is to you, in your present condition, arsenic. And, if you don't stop taking it—at any rate in such large quantities—it will kill you. You have asked me to prescribe; and now in the name of the Great Physician, I ask if you will take the prescription? In your present spiritual invalidism you cannot digest strong meat. You can take nothing but the "sincere milk." How dare you risk yourself now in the ninth chapter of Romans? You go out to contend in that field where strong Christians of forty years' standing have been confounded. In other words, the first time you take a musket in your hand you try a Waterloo. The devil has had his way with you long enough. He has robbed you of the peace of a whole lifetime, and is now trying to strangle your immortality.

You say you have been advised by Christian people to sacrifice on this subject your reasoning faculty. I give you no such wretched counsel. Hold your argumentation in reserve. The infantry march into the fight on the plain. The batteries are on the hill, and will in due time be unlimbered. So go into this discussion with your heart. Hold your logic and argument in reserve for a later period of the conflict. Before you get through your earthly battles you will need not only minie rifles, but columbiads.

Does not this letter tear off all the gloss and fascination of scepticism? There is a time in a young man's life when he thrusts his finger in the armhole of his vest tosses his head and gives a Byronic laugh at Christianity, or asks Tom Paine's questions about the serpent in Eden, or the miraculous conception of Jesus Christ. But it is a good deal easier to get lost in the jungles than to get out of the woods. Scepticism mauls a man to death. It is a Hindoo hook thrust into the flesh to swing its victim in the air. The wretch dying of smallpox, half tended in the hospital, is not so much to be pitied as the man who has caught this vile, polluting, agonising distemper of the soul. Take my right eye, yea, take both eyes, and leave me in midnight all my earthly days, rather than blast my vision of that Gospel truth which is my comfort for time and my hope for eternity.

Will not parents be comforted in the loss of their little children when they read of those who have grown up to reject Christ notwithstanding early religious training? Better for us to put the forms of our little ones down when the infernal archer cannot strike them. How softly lies the sod on the breast, compared with the pressure of a destroyed spirit. Better have the little hands closed in death around the flowers that a playmate sends in, than to have them open for pulling down the last hope of a ruined world.

A BEE IN THE BONNET.

SOMEONE sent me a newspaper with a list of several ministers who have become insane. The newspaper having a marginal note desiring me to explain. I have no capacity to demonstrate the certain cause of such clerical dementia, but we may imagine several reasons for such disaster. Perhaps they may have lost the balance through a large number of begging letters. They may by every mail have been solicited for money that they did not possess. They may have been violently charged with niggardiness for postponing immediate response. For instance on my table a pile of letters from western Sunday-schools, who want a new library from a young man who needs a new suit of clothes; from a woman in Pennsylvania, who says her husband is unable to support her; from England, Ireland, and Scotland, asking for help in the building of chapels—a heavy rain of applications that is enough to set any man's brain afloat; and I imagine that some of the persons spoken of in that newspaper were mentally swamped in that way. Another possible cause for the seeming epidemic of insanity among the clergy may be the demands of lecturing committees who want you to go and speak on behalf of their church or Young Men's Christian Association, and who persist in having you go after your telling them it is impossible. They break through all your established habits of privacy. They wake you up after you have gone to bed, or stop you in the street with their long yarn of necessities. If that will not make a minister crazy, nothing will. I present another possible cause for the series of intellectual collapses spoken of in the newspaper and aforesaid, in the exorbitant and unreasonable demand for impossible pastoral services. They may have been confused by the attempt to attend three funerals at the same hour, five miles distant from each other. Being able to go to but one of the three, of course the other two families will feel that they have been outrageously neglected. They will write sharp letters, talk profusely throughout the congregation, and possibly, leave the church in a dudgeon. The attempt of a minister to be in three places at once will naturally divide and shatter his intellect. I do not know that the above causes worked in the unfortunate case referred to, but I only assign them as sufficient cause of aberration. I am not surprised, like my correspondent, that there are so many lunatic ministers, but rather amazed that there are so few. It is a matter of congratulation that, under the pressure, there are so many clear-headed clergymen.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The First Estimates of the Populations According to the Census returns have now been made. They are probably not exact, but the opinion that they will undergo is not likely to be any large change in them. It appears that there are now as many millionaire cities as there are in Europe. New York is still first on the list with a population of 1,627,227; Chicago has in the past decade from the fourth to the third place with 1,088,000; and Philadelphia has moved from the second place to the third with 849,499. The largest figure below the million is that of Brooklyn which is 806,583. She was fourth on the list, though since 1880, when she held the third place, she has added 20 to her population. The record for the country, so far as it has been received, is a marvellous, widely distributed growth, surpassed in the history of any nation.

Rejection of the Proposed Free Coinage Silver by the House is, as was expected, defeated. By a vote of 152 to 135 the House decided to non-concur in the Senate's amendments. A sectional line was again clearly marked in the analysis of the vote. Twenty-three Republicans voted for free coinage and twenty-two Democrats against it. The explanation of this split in party lines is found in the geographical situation of the States from which the members come. It is possible that the bill will now be dropped through a failure of the two houses to agree; but if the Conference Committees do succeed in effecting a compromise, it will probably be on the basis of Secretary Windom's plan. In that case the purchase of silver may be increased to four or five millions a month, and certificates issued against it be redeemable in gold. That would be an advantage if the Secretary is at the same time relieved of the obligation now resting upon him to coin two million dollars every month. The increase in the value of silver will also be gratifying to the holders of silver in Congress and the country.

The Distinct Endorsement of Ballot Reform The Republican Convention in Illinois is a striking sign of the times. The convention has strongly recommended the enactment of the Australian system of voting, "with its improvements and safeguards as the experience of other States, where it has been adopted and tested, may suggest." It may be said that the Conventions of other States make a similar avowal, and before a long time has passed, possibly before the next Presidential election, the reform will be in force throughout the country. It should be understood that the worst class of politicians have to lose, and the best class all to gain by the system. It makes intimidation next to impossible and it renders bribery so uncertain that it will fall into disfavor. When the voter has his vote free from the supervision of the agent of the man, who gives the bribe, there is no security but the voter's honor that has voted as he was paid to vote. Bribers understand this, and they will place little reliance on the honor of a man who would sell his vote. Every man anxious for the purity of elections should urge the adoption of the Australian system in his State.

The Herculean Labor of Purifying New York's Municipal government has been undertaken by the meeting of representative citizens at which a committee was appointed to select candidates for the various offices to be filled at the next election. The meeting was held on June 24 at the Windsor Hotel and the call, which was for those who were interested in the reform of the city government, was answered by the attendance of over a hundred and fifty men of a variety of business interests, a variety of social grades, a variety of religious beliefs, and all stripes of politics. The movement is practically the result of the resolutions recently made before the committee of the Legislature, which were most discredited to those who have of late controlled city politics. A resolution of the meeting calls upon all citizens, irrespective of their national politics, to unite in the discharge of common civic duty, to the end that the fair fame of our city be cleared, its business interests be fostered, and the physical, mental, and moral welfare of our whole people be cherished." The results of this movement will be deeply interesting. A prominent journal identified with the ruling faction sneers at the movement as "a clergymen's campaign" and intimates that the interference of clergymen in politics is not wanted. It is true that it is not wanted by the politicians of New York. But it may be needed badly. At any rate, it has come and as the clergymen are disinterested and their interference is on the side of righteousness and purity it deserves the support of all Christian citizens. That support will be needed; for the whole force of the saloon and disorderly and corrupt elements will be marshalled against it.

The New Constitution of Brazil, Formally Promulgated last week, is based on the model of that of the United States. The President alone is to be responsible to the nation. The Ministers are replaced by Secretaries of State, who are answerable to the President alone. Parliament will consist of a House of Representatives and a Senate. The powers of these two bodies will be of a purely legislative character, and an adverse vote by either chamber will not entail a change of ministry. A new House of Representatives will be elected triennially, and a new Senate every nine years. The President's term of office will be six years. The first Presidential election by Congress is fixed for November.

A Revolution in San Salvador is Reported to have taken place. The President, Gen. Menendez, is dead. It is stated that his death was due to heart disease, and was precipitated by excitement caused by a personal conflict in the Executive mansion, between Gen. Martinez, commander of the government forces in the Capital, and Gen. Marcial, in which the latter was killed. Suspicions are, however, entertained that he was assassinated. He had been President since 1885 when he succeeded President Zaldivar. A provisional government has been formed with Gen. Guirola at its head. There was some fighting after the death of Marcial in which twenty-three persons were killed, but the cable despatches state that order has been restored. The dead President was an ardent advocate of a Central American union, and it is believed that his advocacy of the project, and the fact that he had been nominated for re-election led to the revolution.

The Old Quarrel Between the Czar and the Sultan developed an acute stage last week by the presentation of an ominous note from the Russian to the Turkish government. It suggests the intention of the Czar to actively interfere in the Balkans. The note declines the request of Turkey for a further delay of six months in the payment of the war indemnity due from Turkey, and demands immediate payment. The note declares that in the event of refusal Russia reserves the right of taking all necessary measures to compel payment. The first turn of the screw was given by a demand, ostensibly by Bulgaria but really by Russia, for an extension of the religious liberty of Bulgarians in Turkey and also for a recognition of the Bulgarian government. It is expected that this action will lead to a proclamation of the independence of Bulgaria under a prince who will be agreeable to Russia, with the absorption of Macedonia into Bulgaria.

The English Government has Yielded to the protests of the friends of Temperance, and has withdrawn its proposal to compensate liquor dealers for the extinction of licences. This is a decisive defeat; for the government has a large and compact majority in Parliament. It is due to the strong feeling manifested by the churches and temperance societies throughout the country. The government learned that many of its supporters, on whose subservience it can generally count, were placed in an embarrassing position. They would have to choose between voting against the government or losing their seats at the next election. The government, therefore, realizing that defeat was possible, and that even if victory were gained it would involve unpleasant consequences in the future, decided to withdraw its measure. Soon after the decision was announced a monster petition was presented from the liquor dealers, asking that the measure be passed.

The Epidemic in Spain Proves to be True Asiatic Cholera. The government commission, appointed to investigate it, can however find no trace of its importation. It appears to have been produced by dormant germs left from a previous visitation. The prevailing heat and humidity are congenial conditions for the development of such germs. This fact should inculcate more than usual care on the part of health inspectors in all ports, as the germs may be unwittingly carried by Spanish ships to other countries. It is gratifying to learn that the strict cordon established around the infected province has thus far prevented the spread of the disease. It is also subsiding in Valencia itself. Since the epidemic appeared, there have been 196 cases and of these no less than 113 proved fatal.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Revision Committee appointed by the Presbyterian General Assembly will hold its first meeting in Pittsburgh in October.

The Rev. John Hall, D. D., is going to Ireland as a delegate to the Jubilee Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church, at Belfast, from the General Assembly.

Bishop Potter preached at Pier 6, East River, New York, at the outdoor station of the Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society, for Seamen on June 19. All about the pier the waters are thronged with canal boats.

Rev. J. B. Dales, D. D., of the Second United Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, celebrated on June 17 the conclusion of the fiftieth year of his pastorate. The church presented him with a purse of $5,000.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon has just renounced claim to a fortune which had been left him. The testator had left some needy relatives, so Mr. Spurgeon generously gave up all title to the property, giving trustees power to deal with it for the said relatives.

The delegates of the Christian Arbitration and Peace Society to the approaching Peace Congress, in London, will sail July 3, on the Normannia. Among them are Dr. George D. Boardman, of Philadelphia, Dr. T. S. Hamlin, of Washington; Dr. Julius E. Grammer, of Baltimore, and Dr. Philip S. Moxom, of Boston.

Rev. Sam Jones's meetings, at Richmond, Va., were the most important ever held in that city. The Norfolk Virginian says that at one meeting in the Tabernacle fully three thousand persons listened to the preacher, and as many came who were unable to get inside the building. The same journal estimates that not less than a thousand persons were converted at the meetings.

Mrs. Re Qua's many friends will rejoice to learn that she has recovered from her recent severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism. She took her case to the Lord and experienced speedy healing. A fresh supply of her popular work, "Stones for the Temple," is now on hand and that, with her new work "Ziona," may be had from her at McAlester, Ind. Ter. The proceeds of the sale are devoted to the mission among the Indians.

The distribution of foreign missionaries in the chief missionary fields is reported to be as follows: China has an ordained missionary to each 733,000 of population; Siam, one to each 600,000; Corea, one to each 500,000; India, one to each 350,000; Africa, one to each 300,000; Japan, one to each 215,000; Burmah, one to each 200,000. The record for Africa does not include the Soudan; where it is believed there is not more than one missionary to five million persons.

The recent convention of Christian Endeavor Societies at St. Louis, exceeded anything before recorded, in enthusiasm. Fully eleven thousand were present at the sessions of the last evening of the convention; nearly seven thousand in the Music Hall of the Exposition Building where the convention was held, and four thousand in the five overflow meetings which were held at the same hour in different churches. Texas, Arkansas and several other Southern States were represented for the first time at this convention.

Dr. L. W. Munhall will conduct the Third Annual Interdenominational Conference for Bible study at Ocean Grove, in August. The meetings will continue from August 6 to 10. Among those who have promised to attend and participate are Dr. Brooks, of St. Louis; Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston; Dr. Nathaniel West, of St. Paul; Dr. Erdman, of Asheville, N.C., and Prof. Moorehead, of Xenia, O. The unanimous testimony of those who attended the former conferences is that they were spiritually and mentally helpful in a high degree. Further particulars may be obtained from Dr. Munhall, Station G, Philadelphia, Pa., or of the Camp Meeting Association.

THE ANTEDILUVIAN WITNESS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house, by which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Heb. 11: 7.

Contrasted with Enoch—Enoch a Type of Raptured Saints—Noah a Type of the Two Witnesses—I. Faith His First Principle—Faith the Acorn of the Oak of Holiness—In Ordinary Life—In the Threatening of God—In the Improbable—Through a Long Life—Even to Separation—II. Fear His Moving Force—Not Slavish Fear—Expected the Day of Vengeance—III. Obedience the Fruit—Obeyed Exactly—Carefully—At All Cost—In Spite of Scorn—IV. The Results that Came.

THE apostle could not avoid mentioning Noah; for in him faith shone forth eminently. He has placed him in due order of time after Abel and Enoch; but he had also another reason for the arrangement. These three ancient believers are declared in Holy Writ to have pleased God. Of Abel, it is said that God testified of his gifts. Enoch, before his translation, had this testimony, that he pleased God: and Noah "found grace in the eyes of the Lord." Again, it was meet that Noah should follow close upon Enoch, as one of two who are described as having "walked with God." "Enoch walked with God: and he was not: for God took him:" and we read in the sixth chapter of Genesis, verse eight, that Noah also "walked with God." These two spent their lives in such constant communion with the Most High that they could be fully described as walking with God. Oh, that we may, through almighty grace, be so pleasing unto the Lord that we may abide in fellowship with Him!

In Evil Days.

We may take pleasure in thinking of Noah as a kind of contrast to Enoch. Enoch was taken away from the evil to come: he saw not the flood, nor heard the wailing of those who were swept away by the waterfloods. His was a delightful deliverance from the harvest of wrath which followed the universal godlessness of the race. It was not his to fight the battle of righteousness to the bitter end; but by a secret rapture he avoided death, and escaped those evil days in which his grandson's lot was cast. Noah is the picture of one who is the Lord's witness during evil days, and lives through them faithfully, enduring unto the end. It was his to be delivered from death by death. The ark was, so to speak, a coffin to him: he entered it, and became a dead man to the old world; and within its inclosure he was floated into a new world, to become the founder and father of a new race.

In Enoch we see a type of those of God's people who go home peacefully before the last closing struggle. Ere the first clash of swords at Armageddon, such Enochs will be taken from the evil to come. But in Noah we see those who will engage in the conflict, and bear themselves bravely amid backsliding and apostasy, until they shall see the powers of evil trodden under their feet as straw is trodden for the dunghill. The fire-flood will devour the wicked, and only the righteous shall inherit the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Let these few words stand as the preface to my discourse; and now let us carefully consider Noah's faith, trusting that the Holy Spirit may bless its teaching to our own souls.

I. First, notice that in Noah's case

Faith Was the First Principle.

The text begins, "By faith Noah." We shall have to speak about his fear—being "moved by fear"; we shall also remember his obedience, for he "prepared an ark to the saving of his house." But you must take distinct note that at the back of everything was his faith in God. His faith begat his fear: his faith and his fear produced his obedience. Nothing in Noah is held up before us as an example, but that which grew out of his faith. To begin with, we must look well to our faith. May I pass the question round these galleries, and put it to you also in this vast area? Have you faith? Let each one hear the question in the singular number. "Hast thou faith? Dost thou believe on the Son of God? Art thou resting in the promise of a faithful God?" If not, thou art nothing as to spiritual things.

Notice, First, that Noah believed in God in his ordinary life. Before the great test came, before he heard the oracle from the secret place, Noah believed in God. We know that he did, for we read that he walked with God, and in his common conduct he is described as being "a just man, and perfect in his generations." It is a great thing to have faith in the presence of a terrible trial; but the first essential is to have faith for ordinary every-day consumption. Hast thou faith in God as to thy daily bread? Hast thou faith as to thy children and thy house? Hast thou faith about thy trade and business? Hast thou faith in the God of Providence?—faith in the God who answers prayers? Is it habitual with thee to roll thy burden upon the Lord? If it be not so with thee, what wilt thou do when the floods break forth? Faith will not come to thee all of a sudden, in the dark night, if thou hast shut it out all the bright days. Faith must be a constant tenant, not an occasional guest. I have heard of Latter-day Saints, and I do not think much of them: I far more admire

Every-Day Saints.

Note, next, that Noah had faith in the warning and threatening of God. If he had not believed the threat, he would not have prepared an ark, and so would not have received the promise. Men do not prepare an ark to escape from a flood unless they believe that there will be a flood. I charge you who profess to be the Lord's not to be unbelieving with regard to the terrible threatenings of God to the ungodly. Believe the threat, even though it should chill your blood; believe, though nature shrinks from the overwhelming doom; for, if you do not believe, the act of disbelieving God about one point will drive you to disbelieve Him upon the other parts of revealed truth, and you will never come to that true, childlike faith which God will accept and honor. "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark."

Furthermore: Noah believed what seemed highly improbable, if not absolutely impossible. There was no sea where Noah laid the keel of his ark; I do not even know that there was a river there. He was to prepare a sea-going vessel, and construct it on dry land. How could water be brought there to float it? O mad old man! How canst thou play the fool on so huge a scale as to build a three-decked vessel of vast dimensions where no waters can ever come? Yet he was bidden of the Lord to do it, and he was persuaded that the Lord's command involved no blunder. The floods would fill the valley, rise up the hills, and prevail above the tops of the mountains. He believed all this, although it did seem an unlikely thing. That faith which believes in the probable is

Anybody's Faith:

Even publicans and sinners can so believe. The faith which believes that which is barely possible is in better form; but that faith which cares nothing for probability or possibility, but rests alone in the Word of the Lord, is the faith of God's elect.

At times you and I are assailed as to our faith in the Bible, by people who say, "How do you make that out? It is in the Scriptures, certainly, but how do you reconcile it with science?" Let your reply be—We no longer live in the region of argument as to the Word of the Lord; but we dwell in the realm of faith. We are not squabblers, itching to prove our superiority in reasoning, but we are children of light, worshipping our God by bowing our whole minds to Him. It is our ambition to be great believers, rather than great thinkers; to be child-like in faith, rather than subtle in intellect.

Note well, that Noah believed alone, and preached on though none followed him. There were no other believers, if you except his wife and his sons and daughters. There were eight in all; but I am afraid that some of these rather believed in father Noah than in the living God.

Noah believed through a hundred and twenty solitary years! It was a long martyrdom. Life is quite long enough for the trial of faith. Yonder dear friend has been praying for last six months, and the Lord has not heard him, and he begins to doubt whether the Lord does hear prayer at all. You are not much like Noah. You can hardly believe for one hundred and twenty days. "Alas!" says one, "I have prayed for my husband these twenty years. It is a long time to wait; but what would you do with a hundred added on to it? Years more! Noah's faith more mature, and not more feeble. This grey father of the age went on with preaching, went on with His intercession, without a doubt, waited for God in His own time to justify His servant before the eyes of men." Once more: Noah from the whole world. See Noah and his family entering the ark! I do not think I should have selected the ark as a place of residence, my nor would you have chosen to live in a place pitched within and without with pitch, with only one door and one window to it, with a great menagerie of birds, and beasts, and reptiles inside it. Whether that window ran round the top just under the roof, so as to light into the whole structure, I cannot tell. I have no doubt that the jeering world said, Noah, "Well, old man, you have built a prison for yourself, and the sooner you go inside and shut yourself in the better; for we have had enough of your preaching!" When the great man and his family went in, and the Lord shut the door, they were dead to the world. No days professors have not faith enough to do alone. They want two or three doors in the back of the ark, so that they may slip out every now and then, and do a little pleasuring with the world, and then glide back again and look like saints. As to being shut in with God and separated from the world—religious and irreligious—how few will endure it! How little is it heard of that cry—"Come out from among them, and be ye separate!"

Believed Even to Separation

II. Secondly, Fear was the moving force. Faith was the living principle, but for the text puts it, "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear." Faith moulded him, but fear moved him. How was this? "I thought," says one, "that perfect love casteth out fear." Yes, of a certain sort; but there is another which perfect love embraces and nourishes. Noah had no evil fear. He had not a selfish fear: he was not afraid of God as a culprit afraid of a judge, or a convict of the hangman. He knew whom he believed, and was persuaded that He had a favor toward him. Noah had not a careless fear, as some here have. Fear, say, "We never shall be saved, and therefore would be useless to care about it. We may as well gather the rosebuds while we may. There is no heaven for us hereafter, let us make the best of the present." No, Noah was a witness against such sensual carelessness. He so lived, that fear came upon him, and that made him act as God bade him. Beware of unbelief which enables you to trifle; for trifling with eternal things leads to the suicide of the soul.

Fear Was the Moving Power;

The Nature of His Fear.

What kind of fear was that of Noah? Noah had a loyal reverence of God. He considered how God could be so long-suffering. When it was revealed to him that God was about to destroy the whole race from off the face of the earth by a flood, he said to himself, "I thought He would." Who among us would be so afraid of God, that the provocations inflicted upon Him by our guilty race? What sin deserves this earth! Oh, the wrath to come! How awful will the judgment be! It has not come yet, it may not come for years; but, when the Lord begins to deal with men in justice, how will that day burn as an oven! "Who may abide the day of His coming?"

Thirdly, Obedience was the gracious fruit. Faith and fear together led Noah to do as God commanded him. When fear is grafted upon faith, it brings forth good fruit, as in this case.

Noah Obeyed the Lord

How often does the Scripture say, "We did Noah"; according to all that God commanded him, so did he! See again and again, Noah did according unto all that the Lord commanded him. Those who have faith in God will show it by a holy fear, which makes a man zealous to leave nothing undone which is commanded of the Lord, and to add nothing of worship to the perfect law of God. "Whatever he saith unto you, do it;" was the wisdom of the Virgin. Obey the Lord with all your mind and all your heart, in the way of faith, if you would find salvation.

Noah obeyed the Lord very carefully. God said to him, "Make an ark;" and we read in Genesis thereto that he prepared an ark. There was careful preparation, and not hurried, restless activity. He prepared the right materials; he prepared the different parts so as to fit together: he prepared his mind, and then prepared his work. In seeking the Lord, let us cherish our best thoughts. Men are never right by accident, nor obedient to the Lord by chance; preparation of heart is wanted, and this the Lord must give. Alas! I fear some of you will lose eternal life, for you trifle about it.

The Cost.

Noah obeyed at all costs. To build the huge vessel called "the ark" must have cost Noah a great deal of money and labor. He could not get everybody to work at the absurd task of building a vessel on dry land. As they would laugh at his workmen would be sure to demand extra pay. Possibly he had to pay double wages to every wright employed on the ark. The patriarch was content to sink all his wealth in this singular venture. It was a poor speculation—so everybody told him; and yet he was quite willing to put all his eggs into that basket. God had bidden him build, and he would, feeling that the Divine command insured him. Dare we do the same? Noah went on obeying under daily scorn. The men of that generation mocked him. He went on and preached to them; but many would not listen to him, for they thought him mad. Those who did listen to him said to each other, "He is building a vessel upon dry land: is he sane? We are scientific, and therefore we know how absurd his preaching is; for none ever heard of the world being drowned by a flood." They despised his warning "an old wives' fable," and he himself was "an old fossil." Doubtless he was a frequent subject of sarcastic remark. For his scorning of many he went on obeying God: he stuck to the lines on which God had placed him, and he could not be turned to the right hand or to the left.

Results Came.

And now I come to my last point, upon which hear me patiently. Results did not fail to come. One hundred and twenty years preaching and no converts remaining! One hundred and twenty years building a ship, and yet no ark to float it! One hundred and twenty years warning people that God is about to destroy the world, yet no flood! Surely, the good man's life is a failure. No doubt wise folks said of him, "He is a good old man, but he is uncharitable, and he has become an alarmist." Some style him a pessimist, others say, "He is a bigot"; others, again, affect to deplore that the good man has made such a great mistake, and is wasting his influence under a delusion. I hear fine gentlemen saying, "Do not take much notice of that old gentleman. No doubt he is a very good man, but at the same time he is only one, and his views are very peculiar. He has gone on chopping this logic for one hundred and twenty years, and the world is not drowned yet: it is really too ridiculous." Thus would they speak at the preacher of righteousness; but Noah knew what he was at, and was not silenced. All he did was simply to repeat his warning, and go on with his ship-building.

What did come of it? The first result was, he was saved and his house. Oh, that God would give to every preacher of righteousness this full reward—Himself and His house! Even if in your own house you find your worst foes, hold on, and never doubt. Do not come down a step or two as to holiness, nor seek a lower platform upon which to meet more cordially an ungodly world. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and in the power of the ever-blessed gospel. That is the one business of your life; and I believe that if you have faith in the Lord as to your family, your beloved shall be given you.

The next result was, that He condemned the world. Read, "By which He condemned the world." Ha! ha! ha! they said, "we judge the old man to be out of his mind." But he was their judge. The merriest jest that flashed forth at the banquet of wine was pointed with a sarcasm about old Noah and his dry-land ship; but all the while he was solemnly judging and condemning that ribald world. The Lord had made him serenely bear

Witness Against Iniquity;

yes, and even to sit on the throne and condemn the world. When the floods began to rise, and the door was shut, how the sight of the ark condemned them! I can imagine, when the water began to get knee-deep, there would be frightened ones around the ark door; but it could not be opened, since God had shut it. When the ark began to float, some of them fled to the sides of the mountains; and what a condemnation the sight of the floating ark was to them! Noah could not help them then. The day in which they might have entered was gone by.

The last thing Noah earned by his faith was this, he became heir of the righteousness which is by faith; for God said of him, when he bade him come into the ark, "Thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation." God declared him righteous; not righteous by his works, although his works, following upon his faith, proved him to be righteous; but righteous by his faith. He believed God, and found grace in the eyes of the Lord. God honored his faith, and he condemned the world. He lived when the rest perished; he was secure in his ark when the myriads were sinking in the deluge: he became "heir of the righteousness which is by faith" when others were condemned. May God make us all so, and unto His name shall be the glory through Jesus Christ our Lord! Amen.

A REVIVAL IN A REFORMATORY.

At the last convention of Christian workers at Buffalo, N. Y., Mr. W. H. Howland described the remarkable origin of a remarkable work, in the Female Reformatory at Toronto. He said: "We had among our prisoners a poor colored woman, and I found out on inquiry that she had been sent in unjustly. She had given hospitality to one of her own color in all kindness, a woman who had committed crime, and the police, in their undistinguishing way, took them both, and both were sent to the Reformatory. That woman, from the time she came in, was a blessing. She got into the hospital, and there she worked with those poor sick souls. She used to come to talk to me and pray, and she said some of the sweetest things in her prayers. They linger in my ears now. One day she came and said, 'Brother, I want to tell you I love your work here. It is a beautiful work and the Lord is blessing it, and is saving these poor women, and it is all good, and I want to tell you something. There is nothing you haven't got in this place that you want.' I said, 'Well, Mother, what is it?' She said, 'I will tell you; it is the Holy Ghost. You want the Holy Ghost right down from heaven.' I said, 'You pray for it.' She said, 'Yes, I am praying.' I had more faith in her prayers than I had in my own.

"They sent me word that week that there were two girls, who had professed conversion, and that others were joining with them and that there was a very extraordinary feeling. I went up Friday, but it was after seven, before I got there, and it was against the rules of the institution to have visitors later than that time. The door was closed. If you are going to work in an institution, never break a rule. They sent me out word that there were sixteen or seventeen who had joined these girls, and they could not understand it. On Sunday morning, when I got there they said, 'We want you to stay for an after-meeting.' The regular Sunday school closed at 10:30. 'We want you to meet these girls. There are about twenty-two of them.' I said I would be very glad to stay, and went down and pretty nearly all the girls came in to the number of sixty or seventy, and I had nothing to do in that meeting. I want to tell you, a great part of these were old and hardened cases, and they certainly hadn't knowledge of anything. You know how hard it is to get respectable people to pray. They sang and prayed and they worked and exhorted, and it went on for two hours, and there were fifty-six conversions before the meeting was over."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Luther's Friend Restored.*

There is nothing in reason, nothing in common sense, nothing in the word of God to set aside the belief, that now, from time to time, God will in answer to prayer, raise up a man from sickness to perfect health. It is told that when Myconius lay apparently dying, he wrote a letter to his friend Luther, who, after reading the letter, immediately fell on his knees and began to pray: "O Lord, my God! no, thou must not take yet our brother Myconius, to thyself; thy cause will not prosper without him. Amen." And after praying thus he rose up, and wrote to his sick brother, "There is no cause for fear, dear Myconius; the Lord will not let me hear that thou art dead. You shall not and must not die. Amen." These words made a powerful impression on the dying Myconius, and aroused him in such a manner that the ulcer in his lungs discharged itself, and he recovered. "I wrote to you that it would be so," answered Luther to the letter which announced the recovery of his friend.

An Offer of Five Millions.

A friend of mine who at the time could have drawn his cheque for twenty millions of dollars, once offered me five millions of dollars to meet the appeals made upon me for money, if I would give him a guarantee that that, divided up among those whom I knew to be needy, and those who knew me would end all applications. He was a shrewd man; he knew that I knew that if I had all the money in all the banks and vaults in America, it would not achieve that result; that when it came to be known that I had money to distribute, in would set the world howling after me. There must be at least forty millions of people in America who want a little more money for something else. Now in such a case as this each person must regulate his outlay wisely, and never give anything, and never do anything, simply to get rid of the solicitors.

Cruel Debtors.

The crying sin against the rich in every large city is the sin of keeping back the hire which belongs to the laborers; and this is probably committed oftener by Christian women than by Christian men. Among us the sin consists in postponing, as a small matter, a small debt to the poor man: a messenger, a porter, a laundress, or some dependant. Among our ladies, the little bill of the dress-maker or the milliner is little only to the debtor, not to the creditor. The poor working woman has an old mother, or a helpless brother to support. Her rent has to be paid exactly at the hour. No grace of time is granted to her, as it is to a man whose rent is twenty thousand dollars a year. She must pay her rent, or have her baby's cradle or her other little furniture put out on the side-walk.

*From The Gospel of Common Sense, by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL. D. This Gospel is based on the epistle of James, and in expounding it and illustrating its teaching with incidents from daily life, Dr. Deems has the advantage of profound scholarship and a wide experience of the defects produced among Christian people by a one-sided view of the religion of Christ. Pp. 322: Price $1.50; Published by Wilbur B. Ketchum, 13 Cooper Union, New York.

Rev. David Kerr Cross, M. D.

Heligoland Recently Ceded to Germany by England.

On Saturday night she must pay for the meat and the flour that have been bought during the week, or she and her loved ones must fast through Sunday, and fast on until her rich sister, who wears the work produced by weary fingers, and sometimes wet with bitter tears, shall think of her little bill and pay it. Oh, my sisters, this is a crying sin of this day. In this great city in which I am writing, last Sunday, hundreds of ladies swept magnificently into the house of God, and quietly sat in the pews under the preaching, and went out to sumptuous dinners, and rested delicately for their afternoon's siesta on soft couches, while their poor laboring sisters were compelled to stay from church because some little bill was not paid. And that little bill was not paid on Saturday because when the poor work-woman called, the debtor was chatting pleasantly with some flattering friend, and sent word to the poor woman to come again; or had gone riding into the Park, and forgot to leave the amount which she promised should be paid on Saturday. If any Christian man or woman shall read this passage on Sunday when he owes fifty cents, or a dollar, or two, or three, or five dollars, anything under ten dollars, to any man or woman known to be poor, let him close this volume at this page and go out, Sunday as it is, and hunt up his little creditor, and pay that little bill, lest the angel of death come upon him this day, and he go to the judgment-seat with this corroding sin eating in upon his moral nature. Let him make no hypocritical defence that it is Sunday. Sunday? Why better than any prayer that you can offer in the closet, at the family-altar, or in the church, would be this deed of simple justice. Your debt of twenty-five thousand dollars down on the exchange can stand over until to-morrow, but the hire of the laborer which you have kept back cries! And the cry hath entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts.

Two Typical Oars.

Two gentlemen were one day crossing a river in a ferry-boat. A dispute about faith and works arose, one saying that good works were of small importance, and that faith was everything, the other asserting the contrary. Not being able to convince each other, the ferryman, an enlightened Christian, asked permission to give his opinion. Consent being granted, he said: "I hold in my hands two oars. This, in my right hand, I call 'faith,' the other in my left, 'works.' Now, gentlemen, please to observe. I pull the oar of faith, and that alone. See the boat goes round and round and makes no progress. I do the same with the oar of works, and with the same result—no progress. Mark, I pull both together, we go on apace, and in a very few minutes we shall be at our landing place. So in my humble opinion" he added, "faith without works or works without faith, will not suffice. Let there be both, and the haven of eternal rest is sure to be reached."

DAVID KERR CROSS, M. D.

MEDICAL MISSIONARY IN NYASSALAND.

ONE of the most earnest champions of the victims of the slave stealer is Dr. Cross, whose portrait we give. He has been laboring for five years as a medical missionary at the north of Lake Nyassa, in Central Africa, and has witnessed some of the worst horrors of the slave raids. He says that when he came out of the market-place of Nanyema, after seeing men and women and children sold there, and after witnessing the cruelties practised in driving them there, by the Arabs, he felt as if he "had been in hell." He saw a woman in her prime sold for an old flint-lock musket. He has gone to Europe to tell his story in the hope of helping Cardinal Lavigerie's Congress to take effective measures for the suppression of the barbarities which are still going on.

Dr. Cross speaks in the highest terms of the capability of the natives for civilization. He says they are kind, fairly honest, brave, and vigorous. They manifest loyalty in a remarkable degree, and their gratitude for any service done them knows no bounds. There is a delicacy too in their conduct which we do not associate with our conception of savages. Dr. Cross mentions as an illustration of this that when his wife died, a company of chiefs came to his hut to sympathize with him. They came in the morning and sat the whole day with him without speaking or moving, and when the sun set, they softly and silently retired in the darkness. The missionary, whose grief was too deep for human comfort, says that this simple mute evidence of kindly sympathy affected him to tears, and won his sincere respect and esteem.

Dr. Cross was enlisted in the army of missionaries by his Sunday-school teacher, Dr. Black, of Glasgow. Dr. Cross was a boy in Dr. Black's class when the latter resigned to go to Africa, in the first company of medical missionaries to the Dark Continent. The boy venerated his teacher, and imbibed his spirit. He fitted himself for a college course and chose the department of medicine that he might go out to Dr. Black in Africa. All through his studies he did missionary work in the slums of the city, yet he graduated with high honors. Before his studies were completed Dr. Black was dead, but this did not deter the young man from following in his steps. He pressed on the more eagerly that he might take up the work of his beloved teacher. He and his young wife and two other missionaries reached the north shore of Lake Nyassa in 1885, and immediately commenced the labors. Dr. Cross is the only survivor of the four. One by one he laid them in graves dug with his own hands in that far-away land.

Dr. Cross has had the satisfaction of acting the part of peacemaker among the people. Doing what promised to be a sanguinary war offered his services in his medical capacity both sides, and was thus enabled to negotiate between them as a disinterested friend who both respected and loved. Before leaving his mission to Europe he completed the translation of the Gospel of Luke into the Nyassa language.

THE ZANZIBAR SLAVE MARKET.

(See Illustration.)

THE importance of Zanzibar as a key to Central Africa was recognized early in the era of exploration. What New York is to the United States, what Liverpool is to great Britain, Zanzibar is to equatorial Africa. In his first expedition Stanley made it the base of operations, and went there again in 1879 to organize his second expedition. It lies on the East coast of Africa about seven degrees south of the equator. It is one of the chief markets, and the seat of the government, are on the island of Zanzibar, but the adjacent country on the mainland is also under the Sultan's dominion, and is also called Zanzibar. It is at this point that the caravans from the interior strike the coast, and from there the explorers Burton, Grant, Stanley, Cameron, and others, hired their carriers, and set out on their expeditions, and to that place they returned, and came once more into communication with civilization. It was Stanley's first business in organizing the Congo Free State to establish a chain of stations extending from Zanzibar to Nyangwe and the lakes. Under the new arrangement with Germany and England, the latter country has acquired the right of "protecting" the Sultan of Zanzibar, which is one of the most valuable concessions granted her by Germany. The history of English rule in India shows how adroit she is in turning the office of protector to her own advantage.

The situation of Zanzibar was not likely to escape the attention of the slave-stealers. Their interest lay in making the road from the villages which they depopulated to the coast as short as

The Zanzibar Slave Market.

le. On the jour-
however short it e, many of their is died from e and exposure
e sun. Zanzi-as near and it
also convenient.
the dealers from Europe had commis-from the Turks
gyptians to sup-em with slaves.
e, too, ves-
ight be charter-carry away the booty to other
So Zanzibar became a mart mmerce in the traffic. The ef-of Germany and nd have largely essed this trade nzibar and un-ne protectorate ngland we may e it will not be
ed. The mark-ill now be bet-occupied by the
in ivory.

accompanying erepresents the market, as travellers saw it some twenty ago. It is still there, but it no longer pre-so animated a scene as it was then. It is an lar unpaved oblong space fifty yards long hirty wide. On three sides are the palm ed huts, in which the slaves were herded ot into condition for the market. On the side was the irregular stone building, ich the officials of the market and the s had their offices. The daily sale took place en three and five in the afternoon. The creatures were turned out into the open and stood or squatted around to be exed by prospective purchasers. Dealers of race in Africa and Arabia, with here and a Turk, would come into the market as s in civilized lands go into a cattle market, they examined the human commodity as little delicacy or consideration, as is a among us in the purchase of an ox or a
The men were required to run, jump, lift weights to show their strength and y, and it was a revolting sight to witness the eness with which the Arabs examined the en destined for the harems of Egypt and
a. Happily this inhuman exhibition no r exists, and the traffic is now carried on, smuggling, in secret, and in continual fear covery.

HELIGOLAND.

(See Illustration on page 428.)

cession of Heligoland by England to any, has caused considerable discussion th countries. It is something so new in h policy to surrender one of these little gholds, which dot the surface of the whole at, that the British people have taken alarm t should become a precedent. No nation rth has acquired possession of so many ls, and no other nation so appreciates the of having these stations in all seas, which as places of storage for ships, and may be ase of operations in time of war. Islands always been preferred, when they could be as being more easily defended by her Malta, in the Mediterranean, has been amense service to England in thts way.
the Suez Canal was cut, Gibraltar made the e sea a closed sea of which she held the n her guns mounted on impregnable rocks.
the Channel Islands she keeps a watch on ce. From Cyprus she menaces Turkey, n operate for her protection against Russia.
Hong Kong she can move against China.
West India Islands and especially Nassau serve her purpose in this hemisphere, and until now Heligoland (or the Holy land) was a menace to Germany.

The island is only forty miles from the mouths of the Elbe, the Eider and the Weser. It is extremely small—only one mile long and a third of a mile wide and two hundred feet high at its highest point. About five hundred brick and wood houses, a few hotels and a theatre comprise all its real estate, and there is a population of not more than two thousand, except when visitors from Hamburg, who go there for sea-bathing, are there. when it rises to five thousand. It has been in the possession of England for nearly a century and was acquired from Denmark. The joy manifested in Germany at the surrender shows how thoroughly it is appreciated, and there can be little doubt that the amicable settlement of the rival claims in Africa was materially assisted thereby.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser,

(Continued from page 414.)

A SPECTRE FROM THE PAST.

It wss so like old times to be walking over the familiar path, that Heritage could scarcely realize that so much had intervened since he belonged to the scene, and that now he was of it no longer.

"Your college days are almost over, Miss Chapman," he said, when they had gotten somewhat clear of the crowd.

"Yes; I'm sorry," she replied. "They have been very plersant, and it is hard to give up the associations of over four years. Still, I shall be glad to get home at last, and begin life in real earnest. College work seems only half play—except calculus, of course—didn't it seem so to you?"

"It seems so now, at all events," he returned.
"I look back to my college days with a feeling of happy regret, and sometimes think it couldn't have been myself who used to haunt these old grounds and literary halls, but must have been some one else. That is, I have almost lost my identity. Yes, a man's college days are the happiest of his life, the freest from care and responsibility."

"Still, 'life is real, life is earnest,' as the poet has it, and we can't expect to glide along forever on the smooth current," she said, gravely, in an intense way that gave an original flavor to the remark, commonplace as it was.

"Oh! you mustn't think," she went on, archly, "that I take a distressingly serious view of life. I should never choose care
and toil for their own sake. I only mean that where there is so much real sorrow
and so many calls for work, it would be wrong to lead merely a butterfly existence.
You said something like that in your lecture last evening—
only you expressed it more forcibly.

"I'm glad you have worthy views of life," he said. "Would it be presuming too much to inquire where your home is? You spoke about beginning life in earnest at your home, if I mistake not."

"My parents live in the town of Crawley,"
she answered.

"Why," he exclaimed, in genuine surprise. Crawley is only about fifty miles from Basserine and on the same line of railroad. I've been in your town several times."

"Are you the Mr. Heritage who spoke there on 'Delvers' about two years ago?"

He laughed and admitted that he was.

"I heard of it," she pursued, "through one of my correspondents, and the name fastened itself in my mind. It's a little odd, you know."

They walked on in silence a few steps, when he inquired: "I presume you are going home as soon as the Commencement exercises are over?"

"Yes, I expect to go to-morrow. I shall remain at home with my parents after that, as they are feeling a little lonely, both my brother and myself being gone. He has still another year at college."

"Perhaps we can go back to our own State together, as I intend to take the morning train."

"That will be very pleasant," she said, with a smile, that melting expression which he had noted before, coming to her lustrous eyes.

Before parting at the house where the young lady had her room, she invited him to stop on his way that evening and go with her and her brother to the concluding exercises at the college hall. He had just expressed his readiness to accept the courteous invitation, and was on the point of lifting his hat to say good-evening, when, as he turned, his eye fell on the figure of a tall, dusky-featured young woman, whose piercing orbs were fastened upon him with a kind of fascination, while a deathly pallor over-spread her face. She was only a few paces away, and as she drew near, Heritage, gave a start, and a flow of blood rouged his cheeks and made them burn. He could not help betraying these signs of embarrassment, which made him look at that moment more like a culprit than a man of honorable principles. The girl almost impaled him with her keen black eyes as she passed. It was the same girl whose entrance into the railway coach on the previous Monday had caused him so much disquiet. When she had gone by, he tried to recover his mental poise, but glancing uneasily at Miss Chapman, he found her looking up into his face with mute inquiry and surprise, as if she almost expected an explanation. However, that would have been out of the question, and so he lifted his hat, and bade her good-evening.

Thus the acquaintance between Robert Heritage and Metta Chapman began—an acquaintance, which, could they have looked into the horoscope of destiny, they would have seen was foredoomed to be fraught with an anguish as keen as the joy of its genesis, and the time came when both of them questioned whether Professor Detwold had really done them a service in bringing them together. Yet there may be truth in the poet's couplet:

"A mighty pain to love it is,
And 'tis a pain that pain to miss."

That evening he sat by her side in the hall listening to the closing addresses, and exchanging views with her on various themes of interest that he felt might afford a new clue to her character, or discover some avenue to her heart. Their friendship grew in ardor the next day as they journeyed together on the train, and when at last they parted, it seemed to be with mutual regret. Before saying good-by, however, Heritage had obtained an assurance from her that, if he would run down to Crawley occasionally, her parents and herself would be glad to have him call at their home.

When at last, late in the evening, he sat at his writing table in his own study, he felt that he had received a new impetus for his literary work, believing that the great love in his heart would impart fervor, flexibility and power to his pen. No experience of his life ever so enriched him, or set his thoughts to so high a key as his love for this pure and beautiful girl. She was his inspiration, his good angel, and strive as he would, he could not divorce her from the heroine of his story, although he resolutely delineated the character of his invention as a girl with dark-hazel eyes instead of dark-blue, and with black hair instead of auburn.

His self-imposed literary enterprise took so strong a hold upon him that he determined to seek some quiet summer resort, where, with a few books, and no interruptions, he could pursue his work. Before going, he took the train to Crawley, and visited Miss Chapman at her home. It was during this visit that he discovered the real earnestness of the girl's nature. While there was nothing obtrusive or in the least flavoring of cant in her religious life, he found that her whole being was permeated by the spirit of the Gospel, and that she was earnestly and sincerely devoted to the cause of Christ. This discovery filled him with a profound respect for her character. His own religious convictions were intense, and more than once had he succeeded in directing the wanderer into the sure way of truth. It was not, therefore in a perfunctory manner that, as he took her hand to say good-bye, he said: "God bless you, Miss Chapman, and keep you!" He wanted to add, "Until I come back to claim you for my own;" but it would have been premature to broach the subject of love at so early a period of their acquaintance.

He first went to Niagara Falls, standing with clasped hands and bowed head, in Prospect Park, before the awful, solemn cataract, with its agitated rush of waters and the incessant murmur and music of their anguish. Then he hurried to the sequestered resort on the shores of one of our northern lakes, which he had selected as a retreat, "far from the madding crowd," where he might meditate and write.

The forenoon of every day was given up to literary work, while in the afternoon he strolled out along the beach or rocky shore, listening to the sound of the splashing waves, or sat beneath the trees of the little park reading some work on theology, science or fiction, for inspiration. Yet most of the spiritual facts of his story were wrought out of his own experience, which was rich in material, and he only wove it into a fabric of invention for the purpose of reaching the same class of readers who, he feared, had been led astray by the recently published rationalistic or semi-rationalistic works of fiction. He did not veil his purpose—he was too honest for that—nor did he flaunt it, but aimed to tell a story, both for its own sake and for the sake of the truths he believed with all his heart, and therefore desired to teach.

It is unnecessary to describe in detail his literary methods. He wrote with a zest that he had never known before, and then revised his material with critical and scrupulous care, until, at the end of his summer vacation of three months, the offspring of his brain, a story of twenty chapters, lay before him complete, except that it needed a few finishing touches. Seemingly he had done rapid work, and yet it must be remembered that the story was not a long one, and that he had been able to write day after day without interruption.

September, with its golden haze upon the hills and its tinted forests, had come, finding Heritage again at his school duties in the city of Basserine. During the summer he had not forgotten to plan for the publication of his story in serial form. As soon as he returned to Basserine, he wrote to the editor of a prominent religious and literary weekly journal, of which he had been a careful reader for many years, describing the plan and purpose of the story, and asking for the privilege of sending his manuscript to him for examination. In less than a week an answer came, couched in formal, stereotyped phrases, and stating that the editor was already "overwhelmed with manuscripts, and could not, therefore, "look at" Heritage's "doubtless valuable work."

It was a keen disappointment, but nothing daunted, he wrote to several other journals of the same character, only to receive in due time the same answer of polite declination.

"This is becoming monotonous," he said to himself, a little indignantly, and then controlling himself, he added: "I ought to remember, though, that the road to authorship is a long and rugged one. I won't give up yet."

Finally, when the holidays were passed, an editor replied that he would examine the manuscript, although he could give Mr. Heritage no encouragement, for he had already on hand a large number of stories. In spite of the discouraging tone of the letter, the aspiring author sent his manuscript to New York that day, and then waited anxiously for a reply. The journal to whose editor he had submitted his story, was a paper of high literary quality, and he was most anxious to have it appear in so influential a periodical, as it would then reach a large circle of readers, many of whom were doubtless disturbed by doubts of the Bible as a revelation.

It was while awaiting the editor's decision that he found time to run down to Crawley, where he had visited several times during the autumn and winter. He had almost determined to ask Metta to be his wife on this trip, but still felt the timidity of true love when he sat with her in the cosy parlor that evening. It was a cold, blustering night and the wind, coming in fierce squalls, pounded spitefully against the house. Never had Metta seemed so fascinating as she did that evening. Her beauty and purity made him fearful of rejection—for who was good enough for such a girl?—and a certain memory of the past, in which he was conscious that he had not been wholly without reason for self reproach, made him feel unworthy of her, and held back the declaration that rose to his lips.

Noticing several journals on the centre-table, he scanned them a little eagerly and found to his delight that they were copies of the paper to which he hoped soon to become a contributor.

"I am glad to know that you read this excellent journal," he remarked.

"Yes; we have been taking it for a number of years," she replied. "It is quite a favorite with us."

"Well, there is—" he was just on the point of telling her there was a surprise in store for her, by the publication of his own story in the columns of that journal, when it occurred to him that he had better wait until it appeared, for it would be more truly a surprise.

At his hotel that night—he remained in Crawley until the next day—he upbraided himself for his lack of courage and made a resolve to call on Metta in the morning and learn his fate before returning home. Suspense was consuming him and destroying his power of concentrating his mind on his work. At ten o'clock the next day he made his way to her home where he found her in tears.

"Why, Miss Chapman! What has gone wrong?" he asked, anxiously, swallowing the lump that rose in his throat.

"One of my dearest friends, a classmate at college, is very sick, and has telegraphed me to come at once," Metta explained, her tears starting anew. "I must go on the first train. Oh if she only lives until I reach her!"

It was a terrible blow to the ardent lover, but suppressing his feeling of disappointment, he helped her to her train, and then taking her hand said, with ill-disguised emotion:

"I regret exceedingly that you are compelled to go. There was something I meant to say to you, but I shall wait until I see you again Good-by."

"Good-by," she whispered, laying her hand in his.

In a few hours Heritage had gone back to Basserine, where another bitter disappointment awaited him. As he stepped across the threshold of his library, his eye fell upon a small express-package that had been left for him during his absence, and when he had cut the string and torn off the outer wrappings, he found to his dismay that the manuscript of his precious story had been returned, without a line or message to explain the reason of its rejection.

Robert Heritage sank into his chair with a groan.

"Yes, it was unkind, it was positively unchristian to treat my work so discourteously," Heritage said aloud in his room, as he sat before his desk, in a rueful state of mind; "it was a mark of contempt not to write one word of explanation, though, of course, I couldn't expect the editor to give detailed criticism."

So violent was the recoil of this rejection of his manuscript upon his literary instincts, that when he took the story up to read it over, he had lost all its fascination; the style was round and angular, the thought vapid, and the conversations decidedly flat. An author's work never seems so absolutely worthless as when it meets with editorial rejection, and so Robert Heritage, in a paroxysm of repugnance, flung his manuscript into his desk, resolved to crush all his aspirations to authorship and devote himself wholly to the work of teaching.

But the literary instinct is not so easily rooted, especially if it has already acquired strength and depth by real, earnest work. Several weeks passed, and the manuscript still neglected and ignored, though not forgotten on the desk, and then there came a revival of literary enthusiasm, the immediate cause of which was the receipt of a sample copy of Weekly Reflector, a religious journal of wide fluence and high literary merit. Heritage had often seen it in the public reading-room and the news-stands, and had frequently read leading articles, but for some reason had never given attention to its general contents. Glancing over the columns, he noticed that, besides the so-called "heavier" articles, it published every week several short stories and the installment of a serial. Instantly a thrill passed through him, quickening his pulses and stirring all his literary fervor into a new life.

"Perhaps the Reflector would publish my story," he said to himself, excitedly. "If I take note, the story is germane to the character and purpose of the paper. Still, the editor has wrapped himself in so impenetrable an incognito, that I doubt whether a letter would ever reach his sanctum. Nevertheless, I shall write to him at once."

While waiting for the editor's reply, he again went over his manuscript, retouching it, rewriting many passages and even whole chapters, and changing the structure itself in many important respects. When he saw how imperfect it was and how many improvements were positively necessary, all his resentment toward the editor who had previously declined it, melted away, and he did not blame that literary censor for his unfavorable verdict.

(To be Continued.)

LOST INDIAN CHILD.

Gospel address by the wife of one of Barton Young's evangelists in Canada. The speaker related the story of a little girl, who had been placed in the mission. The little maiden could come the wandering habits that she had in her blood, and one day she went into the woods alone. As soon as she was missed, the evangelist organized a search for her, taking with him some Indians and then at the mission. The child went along the river-bank for ten or twelve miles, and then turned into the woods, where she found an old deserted tent of her father's. She made a fire of bush-wood, and cooked more bush-wood, upon which she lay down to sleep, not having tasted food for many days. The next day she awoke, in search of her father, but she felt sure could not be very far off. In the evening she wandered and called, the old man many miles away, and having found him, she went to the whole day in search of her father. The girl returned, fortunately, to her place to sleep. That night, she was awakened by the sound of guns; this was the Indians who accompanied my father to attract Jeannie's notice, but he was afterwards the mountains, the sound of guns, and came upon the child from the opposite direction, the one which she was seeking her father. He was, therefore, that he was at hand, and soon found her out, the trustful little girl settled herself again to sleep, and weary travellers came upon the tent and called her; when she was aroused to know who had come, she seemed very pleased, and was averse to food, having passed two days without any—a fair specimen of Indian endurance. So there are those seeking their heavenly Father, disregarding His will wander into the wilderness, in which they could never find Him. Missionaries and Christian workers have no more fitting occupation than to find these lost ones and guiding them to the way of peace.

some of the imitations and have sore hands and find your clothing going to pieces. Moral—use the original and best.

DO YOU WRITE?

The Nelligan Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. A perfect pen—as good as the best, except that no gold pen is used. Useful to office men, collectors, salesmen, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Sample sent to any address on receipt of price. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal discounts.

WM. E. PIAGET & CO.,
301 Broadway, New York.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS!
Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP"
FOR CHILDREN TEETHING. SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

HOW TO BUILD A HOUSE.

If you are thinking about building a house you should send 25 cents for my new book containing plans and specifications for 25 houses, all sizes, from a room's up, costing from $300 to $5,000. A book of great value to all who desire to build a house, and will suit you almost as well as if you paid $2 for a book. Sent post-paid on receipt of 25 cents. Address: J. B. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 ROSE ST., New York.

WINNOWN SONGS.

FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.
By IRA D. SANKEY.

Already adopted for use by the Chautauque Assembly, also N. Y., N. J., and other State S. S. Conventions. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If sent by mail, add 5 cents per copy. Biglow & Main, The John Church Co., New York & Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

EVERYBODY WANTS

Many Mistakes Mended—3000 Errors in English corrected. 12mo. $1.00
Bible Student's Cyclopaedia. 12mo. $1.50
Young Man's Difficulties with His Bible. By Dr. Faunce. 12mo. $1.00
A Pastor's Thought on Living Themes. 12mo. $1.00
By mail on receipt of price.
TIBBALS BOOK COMPANY,
Send for Catalog. 26 Warren St., New York City.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA
Appetizing—Easily Digested.
Ask your Grocer for it, take no other. [66]

3 MONTHS FOR 10c.

To secure at once for our popular magazine, NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING, THE GREAT-EST OF ALL HOME JOURNALS, 25,000 new subscribers AT ONCE, we will send it three months for only 10c. Regular subscription, $1.00. NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING is a full 8-page magazine, with a handsome colored cover each issue. It is complete on all home subjects, PRACTICAL COOKING, RECEIPTS, Kitchen and Dining Room, Home Decoration, Brics-a-Brac, Needle Work, Short Stories of Travel and Serials by our best authors, Historical Notes, &c. Subscribe now, as you will never have such an offer again. Address, National Housekeeping, 72 Cortland Street, New York City.

YOU CAN LAY BY $500 TO $1500
a year by working for us. You can't do it in any other or simpler way no matter how you try. We furnish capital and pay liberally those who work either whole or part time. Stamp not required for answer. JNO. C. WINSTON & Co., Pubs., Philadelphia, Chicago, Kansas City.

of doing a large wash with little or no rubbing. Consider how much longer your delicate summer clothing will last if not rubbed to pieces on a washboard. A saving is a gain. You'll be surprised and pleased with the cleanliness, satisfaction and comfort which comes of the use of PEARLINE. Simple—any servant can use it. Perfectly harmless—you can soak your finest linen and laces in Pearlline and water for a month, with safety. Delightful in the bath—makes the water soft. Perhaps you have been using

Pearline is manufactured only by JAMES PYLE, New York.

LADIES!

Use Only
BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING
of your Boots and Shoes.
Awarded highest honors at Phila., 1876; Frankfort, 1881
Berlin, 1877; Amsterdam, 1883
Paris, 1878; New Orleans, '84-5
Melbourne, 1880; Paris, 1889
and wherever exhibited.
Paris Medal on every bottle.
Beware of Imitations.

8 Per Cent. Dividends.

Free of Taxes.

NATIONAL BANK STOCK.

union INVESTMENT
CO.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

OFFERS $500,000 OF THE INCREASE OF CAPITAL

OF A

NATIONAL BANK
IN PORTLAND, OREGON.

$450,000 subscribed by the Officers, Directors and Business Men of Portland. $50,000 taken in Kansas City, Mo. Send for circulars with full particulars.

UNION INVESTMENT CO.

References:
American National Bank, Kansas City, Mo.
Kansas City Savings Bank and Safe Deposit Co.

20 YEARS OF SUCCESS.

Without loss to investors a good reason for buying the Debenture Bonds and Mortgage Loans of the
AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO.
Assets, $2,000,000.00. Highest rate of interest consistent with the choicest security. Pamphlets free, address, E. B. ORMSBY, A. L. ORMSBY, Vice-President, H. E. SIMMONS, President.
150 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. CITY.

IDLE

Invested to yield a present income of from 6 per cent to 8 per cent with one half the profits.

Send for circulars to
Wm. H. FARMER,
General Agent of the
WINNERS INVESTMENT
CO., 60 STATE STREET,
BOSTON, MASS.

MONEY

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on 10cts.
If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. For a DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Hot Weather

is the very best time to try Pyle's Pearlline. Then the wash is largest, and a saving of time and toil is best appreciated. Think

WHY DO MOTHERS

put stiff corsets on their growing children? We beg of you don't do it but be sure to buy

FERRIS' GOOD SENSE

CORSET WAISTS

THOUSANDS now in use. Best Materials throughout.

BEST for Health, Comfort, Wear and Finish.

King Buckle at Hip for Hose Supporters.

Tap-fastened Buttons—won't pull off.

Cord-edge BUTTON.

Holes—won't wear out.

FOR SALE BY Leading Retailers, or mailed Free on receipt of price, by

FERRIS BROS.

Manufacturers, 341 Broadway, New York.

MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO, Wholesale Western Agents.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY.

DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

Patented 1879-1885 1885-1886

No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments.

Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine.

Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.

THE McDOWELL CO., 6 West 14th Street, New York City.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

Ideal Felt Tooth Polisher.

ENDORSED BY LEADING DENTISTS.

NON-IRRITATING TO GUMS OR ENAMEL FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS

The Great CHURCH LIGHT

Frank's Patent Reflectors for Gas, Oil, or Electric, give the most powerful, softest, cheapest, and best light known for Churches, Stores, Banks, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular & estimate. A liberal discount to churches & the trade. Don't be deceived by cheap imitations. I. P. FRANK, 551 Pearl St., N.Y.

Established 1857

TYPEWRITERS.

Largest like establishment in the world. First-class Second-hand Instruments at half new prices. Unprejudiced advice given on all makes. Machines sold on monthly payments. Any Instrument manufactured shipped, privilege to examine. EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Wholesale prices to dealers. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

TYPEWRITER { 70 Broadway, New York.
HEADQUARTERS. { 144 La Salle St., Chicago.

A LADY WANTED in every Town to sell WOMAN'S HAND BOOK. Just issued. Quick Sales. Big Pay at Home. Circulars Free. E. B. TRENT, Pub., New York.

Peculiar

in many important particulars, Hood's is different from and superior to any other.

In combination, proportion and preparation, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses curative value of the best known of the vegetable kingdom.

In its medicinal merit, Hood's Sarsaparilla surpasses cures hitherto unknown.

In strength and economy—Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said "one dose one dollar." Medicines in larger bottles require larger doses, and do not give as good results as Hood's Sarsaparilla.

In its "good name at home"—there is no other Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell, where it is sold by all other blood purifiers.

In its phenomenal record of sales and other preparation has ever attained in so short a time. Do not be in any other preparation. Be sure to get druggists, $1; six for $5. Prepared only by J. C. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Doses One Dollar

JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT.
ESTABLISHED 1810.

Unlike any Other.

Used by an Old Family Physician. THINK OF IT.

over 40 YEARS in one Family.

Johnson & Co.—It is sixty years since I first had the now celebrated remedy for the common life—Johnson's Anodyne Liniment; for forty years I have used it in my family, and (by you) I regard it one of the best and most reliable that can be found, used internal or external, in all cases it is claimed to relieve or cure.

L.L.S. Dea. 2d Baptist Ch., Bangor, Maine. Should have Johnson's Anodyne Liniment in the house for Croup, Colds, Coughs, Colic, Cuts, Bruises, Cramps, Delays may cost a life. Relieves Summer Complaint, Stomachic, 3 cts. post-paid; 6 bottles for $1. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass.

Johnson's Anodyne Liniment.

LOVE'S OFFERING.

"Not your own, for ye are bought with a price."
—1 Cor. vi. 19, 20.

No more my own, Lord Jesus,
Bought with Thy precious blood;
I give Thee but Thine own, Lord,
That long Thy love withstood.

I give the life Thou gavest,
My present, future, past;
My joys, my fears, my sorrows,
My first hope and my last.

I give the love, the sweetest
Thy goodness grants to me;
Take it, and make it meet, Lord,
An offering for Thee.

Smile! and the very shadows
In Thy blest light shall shine;
Take Thou my heart, Lord Jesus,
For Thou hast made it Thine.

Thou know'st my soul's ambition,
For Thou hast changed its aim;
The world's reproach I fear not,
To share a Saviour's shame;

Outside the camp to suffer,
Within the veil to meet,
And hear Thy softest whisper,
From out the mercy-seat.

Thou bear'st me on Thy bosom,
Amid Thy jewels worn,
Upon Thy hands deep graven,
By arms of Love upborne;

Rescued from sin's destruction,
Ransomed from death and hell,
Complete in Thee, Lord Jesus,
Thou hast done all things well!

Oh, deathless love that bought me!
Oh, price beyond my ken!
Oh, Life that hides my own life,
E'en from my fellow-men!

Now fashion, form, and fill me
With light and love divine;
Thus one with Thee, Lord Jesus,
I am forever Thine!

—Anna Shipton.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

The tortures of dyspepsia and sick headache, the sufferings of scrofula, the agonizing itch and pain of salt rheum, the disagreeable symptoms of catarrh, are removed by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

SCARING A DRUNKARD.

At one of Dr. Pentecost's services in Scotland last February, among the testimonies was one describing a conversion which originated in a joke. A man who had received a religious training fell under the power of intoxicating liquor. He became so completely its slave, and was so seldom sober, that even the men who drank with him began to realize that if he did not quit he would soon fill a drunkard's grave. A few of them, in the double hope of having fun and giving the man a wholesome fright, plotted a scare for him. They lived in a mining district, and some of the men were miners. One night they found their man lying dead drunk by the roadside, and lifting him gently, they carried him, not to his home, as they had been in the habit of doing, but to the pit mouth, and fastening him securely in the cradle, they lowered him to the bottom, where they speedily joined him. At the bottom of the coal-pit there was a large fire kept burning to give an impetus to the currents of air, and promote ventilation. Near this fire they laid the intoxicated man, then left him. In a short time the heat began to arouse him, and turning uneasily on his side, he caught sight of the fire, and it had the desired effect. At once he was fully awake, and partially sobered. He sat up, and to his slowly returning senses, the sombre darkness of the pit, and the lurid, leaping flames of the fire, casting strange, fantastic shadows around, had only one meaning: he was in hell. As this terrible thought took hold of him, one of his companions appeared from a passage, his face blackened, and flourishing a torch. Seeing the victim awake, he gave a wild whoop, and was answered by unearthly yells, and there was a noise of hurried footsteps and the rattling of tools, which the scared man thought were chains. He fell on his knees and begged for mercy, his face a picture of awful terror. The joke had gone far enough, and the jokers thought it wise to stop lest the man be scared to death. They accordingly revealed themselves, and the victim was relieved. But the fright had done its work. As soon as he was drawn up out of the pit, he went straight to the minister of the church which his wife attended, and did not rest until, through faith in Christ, he was no longer in fear of perdition.

A CHINESE SCOFFER CHANGED.

In a letter recently received from Mrs. Simpson, of Ying Toeng, in China, she relates the following incident of the Holy Spirit's power: "My housekeeper's eldest daughter came to spend four days with us not long ago. The first two days, one would have thought she was possessed by an evil spirit. In every possible way she tried to hinder us from having worship. She laughed at her mother and sister for praying, and would not join us in anything. On the third night, however, after her mother and sister were asleep, she took hold of my hand and asked if I would teach her about Jesus. I was afraid she was not in earnest and told her so, but she said she was, and wanted to repent and go to heaven. I explained to her the outlines of the Gospel, and taught her one verse of 'Jesus loves me,' and then engaged in prayer and asked her to repeat the words after me, which she did. She seemed a good deal broken down, and next morning she woke me up early to tell her a line which she had forgotten. She was an earnest and anxious learner, and now is a candidate for baptism."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

TERSE and TIMELY.

Diabolos and His Demons.

By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 20 cents.
A Scriptural exposition of an important subject. Most suitable for the present time. Should be read, pondered, considered, and consulted by all classes. Demonology is an alarming fact. No person should read of Satan's agencies and remain indifferent. There is great curiosity for the supernatural, and in this book such will find food for reflection.

The Spiritual Man.

By Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents.
$5.00 per hundred.
A Biblical Expository Lecture delivered at one of the Northfield conventions under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody.
"This pamphlet contains important teaching as to the natural and spiritual—the man born of the flesh, and the new man in Christ Jesus."—The Christian (London).

The Royal Priest.

As typified in Melchizedek and Aaron. By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents each. $5.00 per hundred.
Melchizedek has always been one of the mysterious characters in the Old Testament. His life is seen in its true light when applied typically, as is done in this pamphlet.
Sent post-paid to any address on receipt of price.
Address, ALBERT NEEDHAM, Publisher, Manchester, Mass.

New York City, 21 East 14th Street.
METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. The most select musical school in the United States. Exceptional advantages: Voice, Piano-forte, Organ, Violin, Harmony and Languages. Successful musicians and eminent teachers comprise the faculty—all actually employed at the Conservatory. Prominent among them are: Dudley Buck, Albert E. Parsons, Director Pianoforte Department, Harry Rowe Shelley, Louis Arthur Russell, George M. Greene. Applicants without musical talent not accepted. Send for circular. H. W. Greene, Gen'l Mgr. C. B. Hawley, Musical Dir.

Guaranteed and legal Investments a specialty. All marketable Bonds, Shares, Debentures, Mortgages, Certificates bought, sold, exchanged. Reports on Properties, Negotiations. Collections here and abroad. Best current rates guaranteed. SAMUEL R. MACLEAN, 39 Broad St., N. Y., and London.

RUBIFOAM
A PERFECT LIQUID DENTIFRICE
DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED.
ITS USE INSURES
BEAUTIFUL
CLEAN TEETH
Price 25 cents
E. W. HOYT
& CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.

OUR MIDSUMMER STOCK-TAKING SALE OF SILKS,

In our Departments on the Main Floor and in the Basement, will commence on Monday, June 23, and continue until July 3.

Seasonable and desirable assortments of Silk Fabrics will be offered, daily, at prices that are designed to secure a complete disposal of our Spring and Summer Stock before the Inventory.

Ladies desiring such fashionable and useful Fabrics as Washing Silks, India and China Silks, Surahs, Louisiennes, in both Plain and Fancy, Black and Colored Silks, Velvets, etc., will find this a very interesting opportunity.

James McCreery & Co
Broadway, cor. Eleventh St.,
NEW YORK.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY
ESTAB. 1859. INCOR. 1877
PRICE They Lead the World!
Sent for trial in your own home.
Sold Direct to families. No Middle-men.
ABSOLUTELY PERFECT
DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!
Cat. Free.
MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N.Y.
$150 to $1500
$35 to $500
ORGANS

How many murmur at their surroundings who might brighten them by the use of SAPOLIO.

Sapolio is a solid cake of Scouring Soap used for all cleaning purposes. Try it.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
CHANCE FOR ALL
To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 3½ pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

TRUITT'S VEGETABLE LOZENGE.
The Great Cure for Dyspepsia. You can eat anything you wish and at same time be cured. 50c. a box. Druggists or by mail. J. F. TRUITT, Man'fr, Bridgeport, N. J.

RIDLEYS
Grand Street,
NEW YORK.

SUMMER BARGAIN SALE
Desirable New Goods
PRICES VERY LOW

Outdoor Games of all kind, Fishing Tackle, Trunks, Valises, Hand Satchels, all sizes and Housefurnishing Goods, Matting, Carpets, Furs, etc.

Good Bargains in Dress Goods, Robes, Linens, Med and untrimmed Hats, Men's and Boy's Shirts and Clothing.

300 Ladies' White Lace SUITS.

Trimmed Embroidery and Tucks, all sizes, worth $6.00.

500 Misses' Well Trimmed Suits, in Gingham, suckers and Cambrics, 95c.; worth $1.75.

Bathing Suit

200 Ladies' Blue Flannel Bathing Suits, $1.75; $3.00; all sizes.
1,000 Ladies' Blazer Jackets and Outing Coats $1.25, $1.75—much below price.

Out of Town Residence

And Sojourners in the Country can have all entrusted to us by mail, filled with promptness and on application, copy of our Fashion Magazine, Price List, which will be found a valuable aid.

WILL MAIL FREE

EDWARD RIDLEY & SON
309, 311, 311½ to 321 Grand Street
56 to 68 ALLEN STREET
59 to 65 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"

"Retrograde" Seamed Tea
THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Grocers.
GARFIELD TEA Cures Constipation and Sick Headache.
Free samples at all druggists or 319 W. 45th St.

FRUIT DIET is the best food for the use of fruits of all kinds in all cases of indigestion and biliousness. Address FOWELL WELLS CO., 77 Broadway, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

XIII., No. 28. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WORK IN THE HOT-BEDS OF VICE IN NEW YORK. Picture of a Meeting in the Margaret Strachan Home and Portraits of Superintendents.
 POWER OF TESTIMONY. Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Beatrice, Neb.
 BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Perilous Down a Mountain, etc.

THE FIRST RAPTURE. By George H. Pember, M.A.
 TAKING UP THE CROSS. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
 Driven to Christ—A Demented Husband Restored—A Chinaman's Conscience—A Revival in Persia—Converts Among the Marathi—A Convert's Dilemma, etc.
 LOUISE BLACKIE'S CROSS. A Story of S. S. Text.
 GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: The World's Homage, etc.
 PICTURE OF THE BROTHERS' MEETING HOUSE.

THE TENDER HIGH PRIEST. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
 PORTRAIT OF MISS PHILIPPA G. FAWCETT, the Victor in the Cambridge Examinations.
 A PICTURE OF DR. TALMAGE AND SHEIKH AMONG THE RUINS OF SAMARIA.
 WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)

RECLAMATION OF UNFORTUNATE WOMEN IN NEW YORK—A NIGHT MEETING IN THE MARGARET STRACHAN HOME.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

Preached at an open-air service at Beatrice, Neb.

THE POWER OF TESTIMONY.

"We are witnesses." Acts 3: 15.

Scientific Predictions Falsified—The Impossible Achieved—Railroads and Steamboats in Evidence—The Proof of Testimony—Three Propositions—
I. The Religion of Christ Able to Convert a Soul—Witnesses from Heathendom—Reformed Drunkards—II. Able to Comfort—Bereaved Households—Where the World Fails as a Comforter—III. Able to Sustain the Dying—The First Sight of a Funeral—Father's and Mother's Deathbeds—Tranquillity of a Nervous Woman—An Appeal to Experience—Madame Sontag's Magnanimity.

In the days of George Stephenson, the perfect of the locomotive engine, the scientists proved conclusively that a railway train could never be driven by steam-power successfully and without peril; but the rushing express trains from Liverpool to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to London, have made all the nations witnesses of the splendid achievement. Machinists and navigators proved conclusively that a steamer could never cross the Atlantic Ocean; but no sooner had they successfully proved the impossibility of such an undertaking than the work was done, and the passengers on the Cunard, and the Inman, and the National, and the White Star lines are witnesses. There went up a guffaw of wise laughter at Professor Morse's proposition to make the lightning of heaven his errand-boy, and it was that the thing could never be done; but now all the news of the wide world, by Associated Press put in your hands every morning and night, has made all nations witnesses. So in the time of Christ it was proved conclusively that it was impossible for Him to rise from the dead. It was shown logically that when a man was dead, he was dead, and the heart and the liver and the lungs having ceased to perform their offices, the limbs would be rigid beyond all power of friction or arousal. They showed it to be an absolute absurdity that the dead Christ should ever get up alive; but no sooner had they proved this than the dead Christ arose, and the disciples beheld Him, heard His voice, and talked with Him, and they took the witness-stand to prove that to be true which the wisecracks of the day had proved to be impossible; the record of the experience and of the testimony is in the text: "Him hath God raised from the dead, whereof we are witnesses."

Proved Conclusively

Now, let me play the sceptic for a moment. "There is no God," says the sceptic, "for I have never seen him with my physical eyesight. Your Bible is a pack of contradictions. There never was a miracle. Lazarus was not raised from the dead, and the water was never turned into wine. Your religion is an imposition on the credulity of the ages." There is an aged man moving over yonder as though he would like to respond. Here are hundreds of people with faces a little flushed at these announcements, and all through this assembly there is a suppressed feeling which would like to speak out in behalf of the truth of our glorious Christianity, as in the days of the text, crying out, "We are witnesses!"

The Weapons of Conflict.

The fact is, that if this world is ever brought to God, it will not be through argument, but through testimony. You might cover the whole earth with apologies for Christianity and learned treatises in defence of religion—you would not convert a soul. Lectures on the harmony between science and religion are beautiful mental discipline, but have never saved a soul, and never will save a soul. Put a man of the world and a man of the Church against each other, and the man of the world will in all probability get the triumph. There are a thousand things in our religion that seem illogical to the world, and always will seem illogical. Our weapon in this conflict is faith, not logic; faith, not metaphysics; faith, not profundity; faith, not scholastic exploration. But then, in order to have faith, we must have testimony, and if five hundred men, or one thousand men, or five hundred thousand men, or five million men get up and tell me that they have felt the religion of Jesus Christ a joy, a comfort, a help, an aspiration, I am bound as a fair-minded man to accept their testimony. I want just now to put before you three propositions, the truth of which I think this audience will attest with overwhelming unanimity.

The first proposition is, We are witnesses that the religion of Christ is Able to Convert a Soul.

Christ's Gospel may have had a hard time to conquer us, we may have fought it back, but we were vanquished. You say conversion is only an imaginary thing. We know better. "We are witnesses." There never was so great a change in our heart and life on any other subject as on this. People laughed at the missionaries in Madagascar because they preached ten years without one convert; but there are 33,000 converts in Madagascar to-day. People laughed at Dr. Adoniram Judson, the Baptist missionary, because he kept on preaching in Burmah five years without a single convert; but there are 20,000 Baptists in Burmah to-day. People laughed at Doctor Morrison, in China, for preaching there seven years without a single conversion; but there are 25,000 Christians in China to-day. People laughed at the missionaries for preaching at Tahiti fifteen years without a single conversion, and at the missionaries for preaching in Bengal seventeen years without a single conversion; yet in all those lands there are multitudes of believing, rejoicing, consistent Christians to-day.

But why go so far to find evidence of the Gospel's power to save a soul? "We are witnesses." We were so proud that no man could have humbled us; we were so hard that no earthly power could have melted us; angels of God were all around about us, they but one day, perhaps it was at a Methodist anxious seat, or at a Presbyterian catechetical lecture, or at a burial, or on horseback, a power seized us, and made us get down, and made us tremble, and made us kneel, and made us cry for mercy, and we tried to wrench ourselves away from the grasp, but we could not. It flung us flat, and when we arose we were as much changed as Gourgis, the heathen, who went into a prayer-meeting with a dagger and a gun, to disturb the meeting and destroy it, but the next day was found crying, "Oh, my great sins! Oh, my great Saviour!" and for eleven years preached the Gospel of Christ to his fellow-mountaineers, the last words his dying lips uttered on earth being, "Free grace!" Oh, it was free grace!

Could Not Overcome Us;

There is a man who was for ten years a hard drinker. The dreadful appetite had sent down its roots around the palate and the tongue, and on down until they were interlinked with the vitals of body, mind, and soul; but he has not taken any stimulants for ten years.

What Did That?

Not temperance societies. Not prohibition laws. Not moral suasion. Conversion did it. "Why," said one upon whom the great change had come, "sir, I feel just as though I were somebody else!" There is a sea-captain who swore all the way from New York to Havana, and from Havana to San Francisco, and when he was in port he was worse than when he was on the sea. What power was it that washed his tongue clean of profanities, and made him a psalm-singer? Conversion by the Holy Spirit. There are thousands of people in this assemblage to-day who are no more what they once were than a water-lily is a nightshade, or a morning lark is a vulture, or day is night.

Now, if I should demand that all those people here present who have felt the converting power of religion should rise, so far from being ashamed, they would spring to their feet with more alacrity than they ever sprang to the dance, the tears mingling with their exhilaration as they cried, "We are witnesses!" And if they tried to sing the old Gospel hymn, they would break down with emotion by the time they got to second line:

"Ashamed of Jesus, that dear Friend
On whom my hopes of heaven depend?
No! When I blush, be this my shame:
That I no more revere His name."

Again I remark that "we are witnesses of
The Gospel's Power to Comfort.

Parents are here who are willing to testify to power of this Gospel to comfort. Your son has just graduated from school or college and going into business, and the Lord took him. Your daughter had just graduated from young ladies' seminary, and you thought she was going to be a useful woman and of long life, but the Lord took her, and you were tempted to say, "All this culture of twenty years for nothing!" Or the little child came home from school with the hot fever that stopped not the agonized prayer or for the skilful physician, and the little child was taken. Or the babe was lifted out of your arms by some quick epidemic, and you stood wondering why God ever gave you that child at all, if so soon He was to take it away. And yet you are not repining, you are not fretful, you are not fighting against God. What has enabled you to stand all the trials? "Oh," you say, "I took the medicine that God gave my sick soul. In my distress I threw myself at the feet of a sympathizing God; and when I was too weak to pray, or to look up, He breathed into me a peace that I think must be the foretaste of that heaven where there is neither a tear, nor a farewell, nor a grave. Come, all ye who have been out to the grave weep there—come, all ye get up off your knees. Is there no power in the Gospel to soothe the heart? Is there no power in this religion to quiet the worst paroxysm of grief? There comes up an answer from comforted widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness, saying, "Ay, ay, we are witnesses. When a man has trouble the world comes to him and says, 'Now get your mind off this; go out and breathe the fresh air; plunge deeper into business.' What poor advice! Get your mind off it! When everything is upturned by the bereavement, and everything reminds you of what you have lost. Get your mind off it. They might as well advise you to stop thinking. You cannot stop thinking, and you cannot stop thinking in that direction. Take a walk in the fresh air! Why, along that very street, or that very road, she once accompanied you. Out on that grass-plot she plucked flowers, or into the show window she looked, fascinated, saying, 'Come see the pictures.' Go deeper into business? Why, she was associated with all your business ambition, and since she has gone you have no ambition left. Oh, this is a clumsy way when it tries to comfort a broken heart. I build a Corlear's engine, I can paint a Raphael 'Madonna,' I can play a Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony as easily as this world can comfort a broken heart. And yet you have been comforted. How was it done? Did Christ come to you and say, 'Get your mind off this; go out and breathe fresh air; plunge deeper into business?' No. There was a minute when He came to you—perhaps in the watches of the night, perhaps in your place of business, perhaps along the street—and He breathed something into your soul that gave peace, rest, infinite quiet, so that you could take out the photograph of the departed one and look into the eyes of the face of the dear one, and say, 'It is all right, she is better off; I would not call her back. Lord, I thank thee that thou hast comforted my poor heart.'

Comforted Souls,

In the Final Hour.

Again: I remark that we are witnesses of the fact that religion has power to give composure in the last moment. I never shall forget the first time I confronted death. We went across the corn-fields in the country. I was led by my father's hand, and we came to the farmhouse where the bereavement had come, and we saw the crowd of wagons and carriages; but there was one carriage that especially attracted my

Jewish attention, and it had black plumes. I said, "What's that? what's that? Why those black tassels on the top?" and after it was explained to me, I was lifted up to look upon the right face of an aged Christian woman, who three days before had departed in triumph; the whole scene made an impression I never forgot. In our sermons and in our lay exhortations are very apt, when we want to bring illustrations of dying triumph, to go back to some distinguished personage—to a John Knox or a Harriet Newell. But

I Want You for Witnesses.

I want to know if you have ever seen anything that makes you believe that the religion of Christ can give composure in the final hour. Now, in the courts, attorney, jury, and judge will never admit mere hearsay. They demand that the witness must have seen with his own eyes, or heard with his own ears, and so I am critical in my examination of you now; and I want to know whether you have seen or heard anything that makes you believe that the religion of Christ gives composure in the final hour.

"Oh, yes," you say, "I saw my father and mother depart. There was a great difference in their death-beds. Standing by the one we felt more veneration. By the other, there was more tenderness." Before the one, you bowed perhaps in awe. In the other case you felt as if you could like to go along with her. How did they feel at that last hour? How did they seem to act? Were they very much frightened? Did they take hold of this world with both hands as though they did not want to give it up? "Oh, no," you say; "no, I remember as though it were yesterday; she had a kind word for us all, and there were a few mementoes distributed among the children, and then she told us how and we must be to our father in his loneliness, and then she kissed us good-by and went asleep calmly as a child in a cradle."

What Made Her so Composed?

Natural courage? "No," "mother was very nervous; when the carriage inclined to the side of the road, she would cry out; she was always rather weakly." What, then, gave her composure? Was it because she did not care much for you, and the pang of parting was not great? "Oh," you say, "she showered upon us a wealth of affection; no mother ever loved her children more than mother loved us; she showed it by the way she nursed us when we were sick, and she toiled for us until her strength gave out." What, then, was it that gave her composure in the last hour? Do not hide it. Be frank and let me know. "Oh," you say, "it was because she was so good; she made the Lord her portion, and she had faith that she would go straight to glory, and that we could all meet her at last at the foot of the throne."

Here are people who say, "I saw a Christian mother die, and he triumphed." And some one else, "I saw a Christian sister die, and she triumphed." Some one else will say, "I saw a Christian daughter die, and

She Triumphed."

Now, all ye who have seen the last moments of a Christian, and give testimony in this cause for trial. Uncover your heads, put your hand to the old family Bible from which they used to read the promises, and promise in the presence of high heaven that you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. With what you have seen with your own eyes, and with what you have heard with your own ears, there is power in this Gospel to give calmness and triumph in the last exigency? The response comes from all sides, from young, and old, and middle-aged: "We are witnesses!"

You see, my friends, I have not put before you to-day an abstraction, or chimera, or anything like guess-work. I present you affidavits of the best men and women, living and dead. Two witnesses in court will establish a fact. There are not two witnesses, but thousands of witnesses—on earth millions of witnesses, and in heaven a great multitude of witnesses that no man can number, testifying that there is power in this religion to convert the soul, to give comfort in trouble, and to afford composure in the last hour. If ten men should come to you when you are sick with appalling sickness, and say they had the same sickness, and took a certain medicine, and it cured them, you would probably take it. Now, suppose ten other men should come up and say, "We don't believe there is anything in that medicine." "Well," I say, "Have you ever tried it?" "No, I never tried it, but I don't believe there is anything in it." Of course you discredit their testimony. The sceptic may come and say, "There is no power in your religion." "Have you ever tried it?" "No, no." "Then, avaunt!" Let me take the testimony of the millions of souls that have been converted to God, and comforted in trial, and solaced in the last hour. We will take their testimony as they cry, "We are witnesses!"

The New Star.

Some time ago Professor Henry, of Washington, discovered a new star, and the tidings sped by submarine telegraph, and all the observatories of Europe were watching for that new star. Oh, hearer, looking out through the darkness of thy soul to-day, canst thou see a bright light beaming on thee? "Where?" you say; "where? How can I find it?" Look along by the line of the cross of the Son of God. Do you not see it trembling with all tenderness and beaming with all hope? It is the Star of Bethlehem.

"Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Death-struck, I ceased the tide to stem,
When suddenly a star arose—
It was the Star of Bethlehem."

Oh, hearer, get your eye on it. It is easier for you now to become Christians than it is to stay away from Christ and heaven.

A Prima Donna's Kindness.

When Madame Sontag began her musical career she was hissed off the stage at Vienna by the friends of her rival, Amelia Steininger, who had already begun to decline through her dissipation. Years passed on, and one day Madame Sontag, in her glory, was riding through the streets of Berlin, when she saw a little child leading a blind woman, and she said, "Come here, my little child, come here. Who is that you are leading by the hand?" And the little child replied, "That's my mother; that's Amelia Steininger. She used to be a great singer, but she lost her voice, and she cried so much about it that she lost her eyesight." "Give my love to her," said Madame Sontag, "and tell her an old acquaintance will call on her this afternoon." The next week in Berlin a vast assemblage gathered at a benefit for that poor blind woman, and it was said that Madame Sontag sang that night as she had never sung before. And she took a skilled oculist, who in vain tried to give eyesight to the poor blind woman. Until the day of Amelia Steininger's death, Madame Sontag took care of her, and her daughter after her. That was what the queen of song did for her enemy. But, oh, hear a more thrilling story still. Blind immortal, poor and lost, thou who, when the world and Christ were rivals for thy heart, didst hiss thy Lord away—Christ comes now to give thee sight, to give thee a home, to give thee heaven. With more than a Sontag's generosity He comes now to meet your need. With more than a Sontag's music He comes to plead for thy deliverance.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The World's Homage.*

WHATEVER else many of us believe as to Jesus, the Saviour, all men believe in His thorough humanity. The orthodox world has often failed to make full practical recognition of His humanity, through an exclusive attention to other views of His person and work; and the modern historical spirit has been a benefit to orthodoxy by bringing out His human character and life as a vivid reality. Jesus of Nazareth, the Founder of Christianity, stands before us to-day as one of the definite personages of human history. The leading facts of His career, the chief peculiarities of His teaching, the distinctive traits of His character, are now really beyond dispute. And the excellence of His character, its high and peerless excellence, is now recognized not only by Christians of every type, and by many Jews, but by persons holding almost every form of unbelief. Time was, even in the modern centuries, when some men of talents and culture reviled Him as an impostor or fanatic, as did some of the blinded Jews who were His contemporaries. But there is hardly a man in the whole world who would speak thus to-day. Even persons who allow themselves to ridicule the Bible, and the God whom it describes, are unwilling now to speak lightly of Jesus; and if in rare cases a man attempts to hint possible and slight defect, he seems to do so with reluctance, and turns quickly away to join the chorus of eulogy. Robert Browning, in a letter published since his death, cites several utterances of men of genius as to the Christian faith, and among them one from Charles Lamb. "In a gay fancy with some friends, as to how he and they should feel if the greatest of the dead were to appear suddenly in flesh and blood once more—on the final suggestion: 'And if Jesus Christ entered this room?' Lamb changed his manner at once, and stuttered out as his manner was when much moved: 'You see if Shakespeare entered we should all rise; if He appeared we should kneel.'" Such reverence is not a mere result of Christian education, of Christian literature and art and usages; it will be felt by any person of susceptible nature who will thoughtfully read one of the Gospels at a sitting.

* From Jesus of Nazareth, by Rev. John A. Broadus, D. D., LL. D., President of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. This excellent little volume contains the three famous lectures which the eminent Southern divine gave on Christ's Personal Character, Ethical Teachings, and Supernatural Works. Pp. 105; Published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 714 Broadway, New York.

Poor but Not an Ascetic.

During His public ministry He had no home, and spent most of His time in travelling, on foot, busy with public and private teaching, and sustained by the hospitality of friends and sometimes of strangers, or by money contributed by generous women for the support of Himself and His followers. Yet observe that He did not do this as meritorious asceticism, but simply from a desire to spend His whole time in doing good, throughout a ministry which He foresaw must be short. Even among ourselves there are men so devoted to science and art, to authorship or teaching or religious ministrations, that they often share the feelings of the great scientific man who said, "I haven't time to make money." His early life was very different from that of the founder of Buddhism, who is represented as the son of a wealthy king, dwelling for years in a home of luxury, and leaving it to become an ascetic. Jesus showed no tinge of asceticism. He wore good clothing, for we read of a tunic woven without seam, which at that day must have been a costly garment. He spent days at a wedding feast, which the Forerunner would probably not have consented to attend. He accepted invitations from the rich, and conformed to social usage by reclining on a couch beside the table in the luxurious Persian fashion; and as He, Himself expressly mentions, ate and drank what others did, though it exposed Him even then to misconception and unkind remark. Jesus touched life at many points, yet it was mainly and essentially the life of the poor. The profound literary and artistic interest now felt in the life of the poor, ought to awaken sympathy with the beginnings of Christianity.

Quietly pursuing the healthy duties of an humble calling, profoundly pondering from boyhood the prophetic writings, Jesus patiently waited till the time came for Him to appear and act. The earliest period at which a man was then supposed to be mature enough for highly responsible functions was something like the age of thirty years. At that age the Saviour came forth without delay, and after a ministry of not more than three or four years He left the earth. He taught and died a young man. To all the other great achievements of young men must be added this incomparable fact, that a young man gave us Christianity.

RESCUE WORK IN NEW YORK.

The Origin of the Margaret Strachan Mission—A Dressmaker's Christlike Labors—Her Difficulties—A Brave Undertaking—Sleeping on Benches—The Blessing on the Effort—Her Sickness and Death—Wealthy Friends to the Rescue—New Developments—A Marriage at the Home—The Response to a Mother's Voice—A Widow's Fall.

NOTHING in Christ's conduct so greatly astonished and shocked professors of religion in His day, as His kindness to women who had lost their virtue. One of them, who saw Him permit a notoriously immoral woman to lavish upon Him tokens of reverent affection, said that He could not be a prophet or He would have known what manner of woman it was who touched Him. It never occurred to these good people that Christ could know the character of the women and yet could welcome them to His mercy. "It is not the will of their Father," He said, "that one of these little ones should perish." The same prejudice against the women exists in our day, but there are some Christians who follow Christ in His compassion for them, and are trying to rescue and reclaim them.

In New York, which has a bad eminence for the large number of vicious women who live in the city, several efforts are being carried on for their rescue. The Florence Mission, the Greene Street Midnight Mission, the Wetmore Home, and others, are now engaged in this discouraging, disappointing arduous, but Christlike labor. One work, of this kind, very beautiful in its origin and very successful in its development is the subject of illustration this week, on the first page, with portraits of the devoted missionary and his wife, who are carrying it on. It is the mission which is appropriately named after its founder: The Margaret Strachan Home.

The Origin of the Mission was in the effort of a humble Christian lady to reclaim her erring sisters. Margaret Strachan was a dressmaker, who seven years ago was toiling hard to win her own bread in New York. On her way to and from work, she frequently met women whose appearance and manner, told only too plainly how they lived. She did not shrink from them as if in fear that contact would pollute her, as so many do. She spoke to them kindly, and pleaded with them to give up their evil lives and come to Christ. A larger number than might have been expected listened eagerly, admitted that they were miserable, and said they would reform if the way were opened for them. Miss Strachan visited them in their homes spending her evenings, which after a hard day's toil might well have been given to rest, in reading the Bible to them when they were sick, and praying with them. The difficulty in all cases was the same. A woman desiring to reform had nowhere to go, and no one was willing to employ her. It was hopeless trying to reform while they lived among their vicious associates, and the eager, sympathizing Christian woman could not obtain employment for them. She was foiled, but her faith did not fail.

At that time West Twenty-seventh street, between Sixth and Eighth avenues, swarmed with disreputable houses. One of the houses in that street was empty, the tenants having been expelled for the non-payment of rent. The owner was anxious to have tenants of a different class, and Miss Strachan with a wonderful courage hired the house. She moved into it her own little stock of furniture, consisting of an iron bed, four chairs and a table. A kind friend, who knew of her effort, gave her a few wooden benches and these she put on the first floor. She took possession on March 18, 1883, and in this humble way commenced her work with better hope. She had now a roof over her head a home to which she could invite any wanderer who was willing to accept such hospitality as she could offer.

A Strange Scene

it was in that neighborhood. Every night the women who sauntered past the house could hear gospel hymns being sung—hymns that reminded many of them of happy homes and the days of their youth. There was a welcome for any who chose to enter and spend an hour. A few words of Gospel truth, a reminder in Christ's own words, that whosoever came to Him would not be cast out, and then more singing and a prayer. From the houses around came sounds of uproarious merriment, coarse jests and laughter, but here in the midst of all the vice and degradation was a haven of peace and rest. Many women came and came again. Some were glad to stay. Two benches were brought together and formed a hard couch on which one could sleep for the night. Often one of the women would look so weak and sick that Miss Strachan would give up her own bed and would herself lie on the benches. It was a grand, noble, self-denying work, and God prospered it. In some cases Miss Strachan interceded with parents or husbands, and the wanderer was forgiven and welcomed home; in others, she succeeded in getting employment for them.

For four years she carried on this work, helped by Christian friends who heard of it and who found her the money to pay her rent. There were many times of straitness, but always help came to the believing woman, who trusted in God, and she was enabled to pay her way. Early in 1887, however, she fell sick. Worn out with her labors of love, her exertions in the cause she had espoused, and exposure in inclement weather on her frequent errands of mercy, she sank into an illness, and in August of that year she died. The scene at her funeral was a most affecting one. Tears of real sorrow fell from eyes not often wet. Tributes of grateful love came from many who through this humble woman's efforts had been restored to home and to virtue.

A Permanent Basis

was given to the work after this. The story of what had been accomplished through Miss Strachan's efforts became known, and Christian men and women felt it was a duty to continue the work. Mrs. Eliot F. Shepard, Mrs. F. Bortome, Mrs. C. C. Dodge, Mrs. Frederick W. Vanderbilt, Mr. John Rockefeller and others, came to its support. The house in which the work had been carried on was purchased, and the next house also, and both were plainly but neatly furnished; a board of trustees was formed and Mr. Maxwell P. Johnstone and his wife (whose portraits appear on the first page) were placed in charge as missionary and matron of the home. The work which had flagged during Miss Strachan's illness took on new vigor, and has continued to develop and increase in usefulness from that time. A religious service is held every night, after which Mr. Johnstone visits the dives and haunts of vice and invites the women to the Home. There Mrs. Johnstone receives them and talks with them. If they desire to reform, they are welcome to remain. They receive sound religious teaching, for neither the missionary nor his wife has any faith in permanent reformation that is not based on the new birth and faith in Christ. Then if it is possible to restore them to their homes, an effort to do so is made. If they have no homes, they are helped to support themselves by any talent they have. Some, who have had a good education, become music-teachers; others learn dressmaking, and others become domestic servants.

A Marriage

is not altogether an unknown event in the home. Some months ago a farmer in a distant State read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a brief notice of an incident which occurred at the Home, and when he came to the city on business, being deeply interested in the Christlike character of the work, he called there to see it in operation. He stayed to the evening service, and noticed among the inmates of the Home a girl of singularly attractive appearance. He had some conversation with her and found her intelligent and well educated. He inquired about her character, of the missionary and his wife, and heard an excellent account of her, and the story of how she was rescued from her vicious life. He returned home, but the impression she had made upon him remained, and he entered into correspondence with her, and finally proposed marriage and was accepted. He has since written to express his thankfulness that he had thus gained a wife who has proved in every way a helpmeet for him.

A Mother's Voice

produced an affecting scene in the Home not long ago. A lady in Brooklyn having heard of the mission work, went there and begged Mr. Johnstone to seek for her daughter, who had left her home for a life of sin. The missionary sought her but could find no trace of any girl of the name given him. Some weeks later, the anxious mother, unable to bear her sorrow and suspense, went again to the Home to see if any tidings of the lost one had been obtained. She was speaking in an agitated voice to Mr. Johnstone in the hall-way, when there was a response from an upper landing, and a girl came running down stairs crying, "Mamma, Mamma," and was clasped in her mother's arms. The missionary had found her in a dive on the Bowery and not knowing she was the girl he was seeking, as she had changed her name, had brought her to the Home where she had been cared for, until this recognition and forgiveness restored her to her mother.

A Widow's Fall

is another case of peculiarly sad features. She was a foreigner, very beautiful of face and graceful of form, who came to New York with her husband. He fell ill here and died. The widow vainly tried to earn her livelihood by any kind of labor, but she had been brought up as a lady with no acquirements that fitted her for supporting herself. She endured her poverty until almost starved to death, when, being strongly tempted, she fell into sin. After her fall, the downward course was rapid, and she became drunkard. One night she entered the Home half intoxicated, and begged for a night's shelter. It was given, and in the morning she completely broke down under the kind pleading of the missionary and his wife. She remained in the Home and was led to Jesus. She gave the best proof of the reality of her conversion by her efforts to save other girls who came in. She proved very useful in the Home and played the organ at the evening services. She is now the wife of a gentleman in good position and writes that she is thoroughly happy and full of thankfulness to God for His great mercy. She confesses now that on the night when she went to the Home for shelter she had resolved to drown herself if she was not received there.

The records of the Home furnish hundred of cases similar to those cited. Those we have given are but specimens of the kind of work that is being accomplished by the mission. There are now twenty-eight inmates there, which is the average number. As these leave for situations, or to return to their families, their places are quickly filled by others anxious to quit the ways of sin. They frequently come in ragged and sometimes shoeless, needing clothing as a first requisite. This fact affords an opportunity to render assistance to the work at small cost. Any lady having cast-off garments to spare, may show her sympathy with the enterprise by sending them to Mrs. Johnstone, 105 West Twenty-seventh Street, New York, by whom they will be gratefully received.

LOUISE BLACKIE'S CROSS.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 20: "And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple." (Luke 14: 27.)

In the well-filled library of a country parsonage, Dr. Luke Blackie sat busily writing. The silence had continued for more than an hour when it was broken by a heavy sigh. It did not come from the Doctor, but from the opposite end of the library where his eldest daughter, Louise, a girl some sixteen years old was in a low rocking chair, reading. The clergyman had forgotten that she was in the room until the sigh recalled her presence to his mind. Then he looked up.

"What is the trouble Louise? Your own or borrowed one?"

"Did I disturb you papa? I had become porbed in my book that I had forgotten where was. Papa, don't you think I might be a missionary? My life seems so empty and so trivial, long to live for some noble purpose. I wish I had lived in the war-times, and have gone to see the soldiers in the hospitals. I seem to be wasting my life."

"You want to be a heroine, Louise? Well I am glad that in this apathetic time there is earnestness somewhere. This seems to be an age of indifference, when people think nothing is worth effort. I have thought sometimes that if a man of trial came there would be but few brave enough to suffer and die for the truth. You think if there were need you dare go into danger for Christ's sake?"

"Oh, yes, Papa; I could die for Him gladly." "I am glad you feel so Louise; He is worthy all love and fidelity. I have often wondered at Peter and the other disciples, who had been with Him, could desert Him in His hour of trial. But we do not know what our strength is until it is tested."

Louise could not help feeling that a delicate proof was conveyed in her father's words, it she said, "I think God would help me."

"Ah! there our strength lies. We may need yet. In the meantime, what do you think is the best preparation?"

"I do not know, unless it is faith and prayer." "Don't you think the performance of present duties might be added? Take your own case. Work in the Sunday-school, visiting the sick poor, helping the struggling, would fit you for a man of trial?"

"Those occupations are so dull and wearisome," said Louise, "I cannot bear those stifling rooms and I do not get on in teaching the Sunday-school."

"Do you expect the cross to be pleasant?" asked her father. "It would not be a cross if it were. Cross-bearing is never described as an agreeable duty. Perhaps your aversion to these duties is an indication that your path lies there. Christ spoke of every man bearing his cross, as there were a special cross for each. I have noticed, too, that the behavior of your brothers often irritates you, and that sometimes you leave duties to your mother that you could perform, and come into the library to read, while she performs them. Oh, I think you have not far to look for your cross. It is ready to your hand and when you have borne that, you will be ready for more conspicuous work. Think it over, Louise," and the good minister left his daughter to her meditations.

A year later, Dr. Blackie calling on a sick member of his congregation, found his daughter in the house. "Miss Blackie has been like an angel in the house," said the suffering woman. "I dare not think of what we should have been without her. She has been here an hour or more every day looking after the house and the children. I should have fretted myself to death before this if it had not been for her." Louise was not present when the woman said this, but as she and her father walked homeward together, Mr. Blackie told her how gratefully the woman had spoken. "Do you find the cross so very heavy, Louise?" he asked.

"Oh, no, Papa; this has been no cross, nor is the Sunday-school work a cross either, now. It is all a pleasure."

"Ah, so says every one who bears the cross. We all find out that Christ spoke truly when He said, 'My yoke is easy and my burden is light.' But you were not eager to take it up."

"No, it seemed very irksome at first."

"I wish every Christian would make the same trial. How much better this world would be! Believers seem to forget that it is a duty—absolutely a condition of discipleship. Yet it is all so plain. Duty and direction are explicitly given to every one. To bear the cross, whatever that cross may be, and to follow Christ. Why if every one who looks to Christ for salvation obeyed, the world would see Christianity in action, and it would be won. Try to be a disciple, Louise. It is the most glorious ideal anyone can have."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Sonorous Sand of Hawaii has been subjected recently to a scientific examination by two savants, one of whom, Dr. H. C. Bolton, has sent the result of the investigation to a scientific journal. This sand dune, which is at Kauai has long been regarded as a natural curiosity. It is popularly known as "barking sand," owing to its giving out a sound resembling the bark of a dog when a mass of it is pushed down the dune or when it is struck by the open hand. Various theories have been suggested as to the cause of it. The one most generally accepted is that it arises from the particles being cellular; but Dr. Bolton believes the true cause to be the presence of minute films of air or gas, deposited on the sand grains during gradual evaporation, after wetting by rain or by the sea. These films, like elastic cushions, separate the grains of sand and are capable of considerable vibration. In proof of his theory Dr. Burton mentions that he found the volume and pitch of the sound to be dependent largely on the purity of the sand and its freedom from dust. A quantity of it was deprived of its sonorous quality when a little earth was mixed with it, and it was found impossible to restore the quality after it had been thus killed. An analogous cause sometimes operates in churches and in individual Christians. The volume and power of their testimony for Christ are largely dependent on their purity, and when earthly principles and aims are mixed with their spiritual aspirations they become mute. (James 1 : 27.)

Two Patients were Rejected by the Physician in charge of the Pasteur Institute in New York last week. One of them was a boy twelve years old, who had been bitten by a dog two weeks before his application was received. The wound had been painful at the time, but was not deemed serious. It had yielded to the usual antiseptic treatment, and had healed over. Ten days afterward, however, the boy grew restless, moody and irritable, and his parents, becoming alarmed, took him to the Pasteur Institute. Dr. Gibier examined him and then sorrowfully told the parents it was too late to apply the treatment. Nothing could save him from death by hydrophobia. The other case was that of a man at Brunswick Me., who was suffering from the bite of a dog. A physician of that town telegraphed that he proposed bringing him to New York to be treated, the townspeople being desirous of defraying the expense. Dr. Gibier telegraphed the physician not to bring the man as in his case also it was too late. It appears that when the poison has had time to take firm hold on the system, even the Pasteur treatment will not avail. Prompt and radical measures are necessary, and they incur a fearful risk who think it is sufficient merely to cauterize the wound itself. It is so with sin. A sinful habit may be abandoned, the drunkard may become an abstainer and the vicious man become virtuous, but no one is safe until his heart has been changed. Outward morality and even church-membership are not sufficient. Every pastor should dread incurring the reproach uttered by the prophet "They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying Peace, peace, where there is no peace." (Jer. 8 : 11.)

A Perilous Ride Down a Mountain Side is described in a press despatch from Denver, Colo. It states that an eastern bound train from San Francisco, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, had climbed the mountain to Tehachapi Pass. At that point there is a sharp descent, the grade at some points being fully two hundred feet to the mile. The engineer, knowing that the brakes were strong enough to check the speed, allowed the train to get headway before applying them. When he did put on the pressure he discovered to his consternation that they were out of order and would not work. The speed of the train increased momentarily. It shot along precipices where there was a sheer decline of thousands of feet on one side and a wall of rock on the other. It rattled over bridges spanning deep gorges, and around sharp curves, Finally it shot into a portion of the road where there was a level space to the left, while to the right was a descent of 1,200 feet. At this place it jumped the track, fortunately on the left side. Strange to say, although the train must have been running fully seventy-five miles an hour, not one person was killed, though the coaches were badly wrecked. That engineer will in future have less confidence in the brakes. He knows now that not only must they be strong, but must be ready to operate when they are needed. Many a man travelling the downward path has gone to his destruction through a similar misplaced confidence. Confident in his capacity to check himself when he chooses, he has gone on in his sinful career until he became alarmed and tried to stop, only to find his power of self-restraint fail him. Then he discovers the truth of the king's warning, "He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool." (Prov. 28 : 26.)

Painted Faces, Mechanical Smiles, and Frivolous music led to a suicide in New York on June 30. For some time past, a musician employed in a theatre, devoted to light opera, has been in a melancholy mood. He had lost a daughter whom he loved very dearly, and when he went to his duty at the theatre at night, with his heart full of grief for the dead, the frivolity around him jarred upon his nerves. In the orchestra he was so near to the actresses on the stage that he could see the paint on their faces, and the mechanical and perfunctory character of their smiles. Besides, he was familiar with the works of the great masters of music, and loved to interpret them. To play the light shallow music of comic opera to ignorant audiences seemed a humiliation to him. He grew more gloomy and discontented, and it was only by an effort that he kept his place in the orchestra to the close of a performance. At last he became utterly melancholy, and on June 30, he shot himself. In a note he left behind explaining his motive, he said that it was "worth dying not to see any more painted faces." Doubtless, he was not in a mental condition to fully realize all that dying by his own hand involved, or he would not have said that. Still, the necessity of going to the theatre evidently made life unbearable to him. Men who enjoy going there must find it difficult to understand his aversion. It will not, however, astonish any who are in great sorrow, or any man of a truly spiritual mind. In either case the professional hilarity seems a hollow mockery. (1. Peter 4 : 4.)

A Snake in a Lady's Bonnet Caused Some alarm in a household at Galveston, Tex., recently. A press despatch from that city says that on June 29, a lady was preparing to go to church, when she was heard uttering loud screams. Some members of the family ran to her room and found her fainting on the floor. When she recovered consciousness, she declared that she had been bitten by a snake. She said that she took up her bonnet from the table on which she laid it on returning from morning service, and put it on her head. As she did so, she felt something move in the bonnet, and saw in the mirror, before which she stood, a snake's head protrude, and it struck her before she could fling bonnet and snake away. It was thought at first that the lady must be mistaken, but on search being made, a small puff-adder was found behind the settee on which in her fright she flung her bonnet. Happily the lady's hair saved her from a wound which might have been serious if not fatal. It was a narrow escape and her danger was all the greater, because it was unexpected. In the woods, or in any place, where an encounter with a snake would not have been unusual, she might have been on her guard; but in her own house, and in her bonnet she had no reason to fear the presence of so terrible an enemy. Her danger was similar to the spiritual danger that assails Christians, in their conflict with Satan, who is likened in Scripture to a serpent. The times when he gets an advantage over them are when he assails them unexpectedly and there is Scriptural ground, for believing that his temptations may lurk in elegances of apparel. (1. Timothy 2 : 9, 10.)

THE FIRST RAPTURE.

By George H. Pember, M. A.

A Favored Church—Christ's Second Coming a Source of Comfort—Its Effect in These Days—A Mistaken View—Involving Needless Sorrow—The Apostle's Own Expectation—An Actual Descent—The Dead Raised—The Living Changed—An Eternal Union.

To none of the Churches with which he was connected did Paul communicate so many details of the last things as to that of the Thessalonians. For in one of his Epistles to them we find the most circumstantial prediction of the first ascension of the saints; while in the other there are many particulars respecting the subsequent career of Antichrist.

The Revelation

of that blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ, had lifted up the Thessalonian Church to enthusiasm. And so, indeed, it has ever affected those whose hearts have been opened for its reception. It was that hope which stimulated the early Church to the extraordinary exertions of the first two and a half centuries: it is that which oftentimes since has supported believers through days of trial; for whenever persecution has arisen on account of the word, the Apocalypse and the prophetic Psalms have almost invariably formed the great stay and comfort of the persecuted. And, at this present time, the same hope is again exercising a powerful influence in arousing the Church to renewed efforts, in separating off a people for the presence of the Lord.

Yet, although the Thessalonians received the spirit-stirring message with joy, even they did not rightly understand it in all its bearings, and the consequence of their imperfect knowledge was seen in certain false and mischievous inferences. Excited by expectation, and assuming that the Lord must come immediately, they could no longer settle down to the ordinary routine of life, and Paul found it necessary to exhort them to be quiet, and do their own business, and labor with their own hands, that their conduct might be seemly to those that were without, and that they might not, by neglecting their duty, be compelled to depend upon the help of others.

And then again, while they had, heard of the coming of the Lord and their gathering together unto Him, they had not yet been instructed in regard to

The First Resurrection.

Consequently, knowing only the final resurrection and last judgment, being well aware that these events would not take place until after the Millennium, and distinguishing clearly between the Millennium and the Eternal State, they naturally concluded that all who had the misfortune to die before the Lord's return would lose the glories of the Kingdom. What wonder, then, that they mourned immoderately when the spirit of a beloved one passed away from their midst; since they thought to see his face no more until after the long lapse of the thousand years; unless, indeed, they too should be called to follow him before the Lord came, and so be themselves deprived of the glory.

To lift this gloom from their eyes, and reveal to them the glad truth, is Paul's object in the latter part of the fourth chapter. "We would not have you ignorant, brethren," he says, "concerning them which have been laid to sleep; that ye sorrow not, even as the rest, which have no hope."

And then he reveals the wondrous truth, that each of the great events in our Lord's life has its correspondence in the lives of His members; that if, in our measure, we are called to suffer as He did, to be men of sorrows and acquainted with grief, to endure the contradiction of sinners and the hatred of the world, ay, and presently, should He tarry, to gaze for the last time upon the light of the natural sun; we may, nevertheless, look up to the eminence on the other side of the dark valley, where He sits in glory, and know that, by His grace, we too cannot fail to emerge from the night of death into the resurrection morning.

And so Paul proceeds to tell us how this consummation will be brought about: and he does so "by the word of the Lord," that is, by

A Direct Revelation

to himself. The words, "we which are alive," are of great doctrinal importance; for they give clear evidence that Paul contemplated the occurrence of the advent in his own lifetime as a possibility. He was, however, well aware that none might know the day and the hour, and, therefore, expressed no definite expectation. Yet Paul and many others have passed away, and still the Lord tarries. There is, however, no reason to believe that their expectant attitude is in any way changed: the spirits of those who sleep are also waiting for the Lord from the high heavens, and longing for the time when the sons of God shall be manifested and their bodies redeemed.

The words, "the Lord shall descend," utterly preclude the "spiritual" interpretation to which some Christians even now cling. For His spiritual presence is already with us, and so will remain even unto the end. It is, therefore, to His glorified body, which can be only in one place at a time, that allusion is here made. And the descent is in the fulfilment of the angels' words, that He should so come in like manner as He was seen to go up into heaven. And as He passes through His illimitable realms, upon wings of lightning, followed by His glittering hosts, and causing the countless stars which stud His heavens to pale with His glory, He will utter the word of command, and the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear, for all will not do so, shall live.

The First Stage

Forth from Paradise and the grave they will come, from the poor thief, whose mortal agony was prolonged until Heaven and Hades had thrilled with the mighty words, "It is finished," to the last who shall have been laid to sleep, just as the trump of God is proclaiming the arrival of the King.

And scarcely less wonderful will be

The Change in the Living.

It was a glad sight to see the warm flush returning to the leper's face, and his decayed limbs filling out and brightening into ruddy health. It must have made the hearts of the bystanders rejoice to look on when blind Bartimæus received the reward of his faith, and opened his wondering eyes for the first time on God's fair world and on the tender and loving face of God's own Son. And hard of heart must he have been who could restrain tears of sympathy when he beheld the poor demoniac ceasing from his mad ravings, his wanderings among the tombs, and his cruel self-mutilations, and sitting clothed, and in his right mind, at the feet of Him who had saved him from his fiendish tormentors. But even these miracles of love will seem as nothing to the deliverances of that glorious night, when the Lord shall call His people, and, in response, the bed-ridden invalid of years, the blind, the halt, the maimed, the consumptive, the fever-stricken, the poor oppressed lunatic or demoniac, the bowed down with age, and pain, and care, and bereavement, and persecution, and hard toil—all shall come forth from the places of durance in which they have been graciously enabled to possess their souls in patience, and shout for joy that the year of the Lord's redeemed has come. And dropping every fetter of mortality, losing every scar and disfigurement as they rise, and joined by the company of those who had slept, they shall ascend in one glorious body to the presence of the King.

Those who shall be summoned to this exultant gathering will find themselves

Suddenly Rapt Away,

doubtless by the forceful power of that Spirit by Whom they were sealed unto the Day of Redemption. Woe, then, to all who shall have grieved the Spirit of God on that unknown and fateful night! The Greek words imply that they who go to meet the Lord in the air will subsequently return to earth with Him, not without Him. For there shall be no more parting from the beloved Saviour, or from the friends whom He has restored to us. Thenceforth we shall be ever with the Lord: we shall follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.

And with thoughts of this glorious future we are to comfort one another in our bereavements.

A REVIVAL IN PERSIA.

THE missionaries of the American Presbyterian Board in Persia are filled with rejoicing over an extensive work of grace. It seems that the last year was a year of many trials, and that at its close the report showed a net loss instead of gain. The first hopeful sign was the awakening of a band of young men. The Week of Prayer, though observed with special solemnity and interest, was not followed by conversions, and the month of January passed without marked results. But later two young men, who it is said were scarcely able to read, but whose hearts were filled with love to God, went with one of the college teachers to a large village, where the church had been in a languishing condition, and a remarkable quickening was at once witnessed. Other churches soon began to feel the sacred influence, and every week since cheering tidings have come from some church which has received a great blessing. Preachers, native and foreign, have been taxed to the utmost in the holding of extra services. Much persecution has accompanied the work, notably from the Old Church and from the Ritualists. Some persons have been driven from their homes by their enraged relatives. Several remarkable cases of conversion are reported. Those of special note are two physicians, who have hitherto been bitter opposers of evangelical truth. The genuineness of the work has been attested by the liberal contributions of the people. The movement is described as very quiet, the preaching of the most searching and practical kind, relating to sin and repentance and the new birth. A large ingathering into the churches is anticipated, upwards of four hundred persons having publicly expressed their desire to begin a new life.

CONVERTS AMONG THE MARATHI.

THE annual report of the American Board's work among the Marathi of the Bombay presidency of India, chronicles a decided progress both in churches, converts and schools. One of the converts, a man named Narsoba, is in himself a potent influence for good. Its power does not consist so much in his teaching and preaching, though he does both, as in his life. He was a man whose evil deeds had made his name a terror through the district. He is now so changed that none who know him now and knew him a few years ago, can question the power of Christianity. In addressing a number of men in a neighboring village to which he accompanied the missionary, he said: "You know what my former life was, but now Christ has saved me, and given me peace;" and in saying this his voice trembled, and several in the audience were affected to tears, for he had been well-known in that village as a notoriously wicked man. In the early part of the year Narsoba's thatched house caught fire during his absence. He returned, but too late to render any assistance. He was, however, undisturbed in mind, and said cheerfully, "It is no matter; the Lord will give me another;" and sure enough the Lord has given another—not a thatched house, but one much more substantial and not likely to be burnt down. The people of that village and of other villages came to his help in a remarkable way. Of the five families who live near him, four have become Christians through his efforts. The first convert in another village is a relative of his. He had heard the truth thirteen years ago, and since then had occasionally met with Christians, so that his conscience had been awakened all this time. Not long ago, while digging a well, he was suddenly buried by the stones and earth coming down upon him. In this condition his sins all came up before him, and he praying said, "O Lord, if thou wilt re me now, I will devote my life to thee ;" the Lord heard him. He has kept his promise faithfully.

A CONVERT'S DILEMMA.

A Christian lands it is seldom that the faith of a convert is put to the test which was applied in Christ's time, and which He used to speak of as a proof of fidelity, that of leaving father and mother and friends for His sake.

Mr. Stover, a missionary of the American Board at Bailundu in Central Africa reports a letter to the Missionary Herald, an instance of what test being borne by one of his youthful converts. Among the boys who came to the school occasionally was one peculiarly bright, unruly. He was saucy, Mr. Stover says, and difficult to manage. But gradually he seemed to act and some time ago began to take part in the meetings. The Missionary took an opportunity of speaking to him a week before the receipt of his letter and found that the boy wanted to be baptized. "I wish I could give you his name as he told it to me," says Mr. Stover. "I was deeply impressed, by what he said, with the reality of the work of the Spirit, and how often He works when we know nothing of it. During all that period when we should have yielded at the suggestion that Nunda, pert, saucy, self-willed, though bright, had a sober thought, he was really under conviction. His inclination was to cast in his lot here, but his friends opposed, and for a time he reluctantly obeyed; at last he could resist no longer, and in the face of threats and taunts and scoffing he came forward, deliberately severing all earthly relations—all of which we never knew until he wrote me this a week ago. He belongs to a family of good standing, and all of them bitterly oppose Christianity."

TAKING UP THE CROSS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Lesson for July 30; Luke 14: 25-33; Golden Text Luke 14: 27.

Selfish Attitude Toward Christ—The Conditions of Discipleship—What a Disciple Is—The Heavenly Citizenship—The Signs of a Disciple—The Filial Duty of the Disciple—No Disrespect of Parents Cultivated—The True Cross-bearing—Its Cost—The Christian's Stupendous Undertaking—The Complete Contrast of Principles—The Conditions of Conquest—Worldly Christians Despised by the Church and the World.

THE parable of The Great Supper proved very active as the Master spoke it, "There went out multitudes with Him." All was to be gained, nothing to be lost by the invited guests, and it is very pleasing to human nature which is to make a good bargain. There are souls which rejoice and luxuriate in the doctrine of free grace of God, and are quite content that Christ should have all the shame if they have the glory; that He should have all the suffering so that they may be saved from eternal death; that He should have all the poverty so that they might have riches through Him. The fellowship with His suffering, and conformity to His death which Paul aspired to, are unknown to these degraded souls, which live unto themselves, even though Christ has died for them, at least they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves." The real glory of the Christian life is unknown to them, their ideas have never risen above their own selfish level.

Jesus turned and said unto them, If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

What Is a Disciple?

Generally an instructed one, or one who follows the witnesses to the instructions he has received from a teacher. It is not in the simple acceptance of the pardon which Jesus purchased with His blood that we become disciples, but in living ourselves be separated unto Him from which is unlike Him. We are redeemed, not by, or chiefly from everlasting death, and from the sin which has deserved it, but also from the very manner of life which we lived before our conversion. Delivered from this present evil age. (Gal. 1: 4.) The spirit of "All seek their own," (Phil. 2: 21), redeemed from your vain conversation, received by tradition from your fathers. (1 Pet. 1: 16.) "What will people think of you? You must do as other people do, you must not lower yourself," etc. From all this the precious blood of Christ redeems us to be disciples of Him who lived in the "newness of life" upon this earth, "Redeemed from among men." (Rom. 14: 4.) No longer carnal, and walking as man, (II. Cor. 3: 3), no longer taking part in divisions, strifes, envyings," etc. Discipleship to Jesus lifts us into another atmosphere where "by love" we can "serve one another." (Gal. 5: 13).

But how are we to understand these words? At first sight, it would seem as though the Lord would put a premium upon the want of filial respect and love which is so marked in our day and generation, as though He would teach us to hate instead of honour our nearest and dearest. But, taken in connection with His teaching to the disciples, "He that loveth father or mother is not worthy of me, and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me," (Matt. 10: 37), we clearly see that the whole meaning lies in this, that all else must take a second place to Jesus; in all things He must "have the pre-eminence." (Col. 1: 18.) When it is a question between our own will and our parents', then comes in the law, "Honor thy father and thy mother." When, however, it is a question between God's will and our parents', when they would call us into distinct opposition to His command, then, cost what it may, God's will must be followed. The opposition of friends, the bitter words, the biting insinuation, which none can make make in the same biting way as those who know us best, and who are aware of our weak points—is one of the hardest trials we have to face in our Christian life.

More than Me

"And whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple." "No cross, no crown," is a proverb which seems to have gone out of date, but it is a true one. We can never bear His cross on which He redeemed us, but we can bear for His sake and the Gospel's the very thing which crosses our will, and galls and humbles us this very hour. The humiliation which comes through the wrong doing of another, and which is imputed to us; the thwarting of our purposes, made in the will of God, by human agency, and yet permitted by Him; the hindrances which seem to stand in the way of our work for Him—the physical drawbacks which try our patience—these are our daily crosses, crosses not to be rejected, but to be borne.

But cross-bearing is not easy; discipleship costs much, and it is well to

Count the Cost

and weigh coolly and calmly the undertaking we have in hand, and then, if we are fully persuaded that it is worth the sacrifice, to let all go, and live for nothing else. "For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply, after he have laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, saying, This man began to build and was not able to finish." Here is plain, strong, common-sense. Now to apply it. What is our undertaking? Something far more stupendous than the tower of Babel. Our war against the king that cometh against us is the greatest war that ever has been waged. We undertake, while in a world governed by natural laws, to live a life which is supernatural, and therefore above these laws. The law of self governs all around us. Families, churches, cities, nations, as well as individuals, are governed by the selfish principle. The rich grind down the poor, the talented oppress the less gifted, might is right. Now, as disciples, i. e., followers of Jesus, we have undertaken to steer our little bark in the very face of the popular current, and to act on principles diametrically opposed to the law of self which governs the world. Whereas in the world "all seek their own," the follower of Jesus learns to look not on his own things but on the things of others." (Phil. 2: 4.) The world's strong ones despise and tread down the weak, but in the body of Christ, it is the feeble members who are the most necessary. (I. Cor. 12: 22.) In the world, it is the rich who carry all before them, while the rich follower of Christ shall hardly "enter into the kingdom of heaven."

What are the terms on which a life so unearthly, so truly supernatural, can be lived on earth? They are these, "Whosoever there be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." Paul knew this well, and "what things were gain to him those he counted "loss for Christ," honor, prestige, comfort, reputation, parentage, position, were all beneath the feet of a man whose citizenship was in heaven, and his aspirations rose to something vastly different, "that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." (Phil. 3: 10), to suffer in all which is a suffering to Christ, to be dead to all to which Christ is dead, and so in the resurrection, to share proportionately with Him. This was the tower Paul was building, and he had counted the cost, and left on record for us all that it was worth the while. Paul was a true disciple, to him to live was Christ, (Phil. 1: 21) he sought nothing for himself, but everything for his Master. To man, his life was inexplicable, he rejoiced in the things which other men shunned, tribulations and sufferings; he gloried in the cross of Christ, which brought upon him the contempt of all men. Nothing which earth could offer proved any attraction to him, and yet, so great was the influence of this man, who had renounced every worldly advantage, who like his Master was despised by the chief priests, and the rulers, and the scribes, that he and his followers turned the world upside down. (Acts 17: 6.)

Self-pity, self-interest, self-consciousness, self-esteem, self-care, and self-culture, are all antagonistic to the spirit of a true disciple.

Self Never Will Bear the Cross.

Self makes its own cross, but will not bear that which the Master gives or permits. Jesus said to His disciples, "If ye continue in My work, then are ye My disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." i. e., free from self to serve God and man. A disciple is at liberty only to serve. The true disciple leaves all that he has that God may possess him and that Christ may live in him.

"Salt is good, but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be seasoned?" One is disappointed when one takes up a bunch of violets and finds that the perfume is gone, but Oh, how much more disappointing it is when one finds children of God with none of the savor of Christ about them. Brilliant preachers have sometimes a greater savor of themselves than of Christ, but how often one who has great family trials, one who has been much tried in body, one who has gone through much persecution for Christ's sake, one who has had great reverses of fortune, is found bearing the cross, and like the alabaster box of ointment, when broken, the whole house, the whole neighborhood is filled with the odor of the ointment." (John 12: 3.)

But if the salt have lost his savor, if "his scent is not changed (Jer. 48: 11), wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is neither fit for the land nor yet for the dunghill;" you cannot make use of such in the church, you cannot quite number them among the unsaved, "but men cast them out." Savorless Christians, homeless Christians, worldly Christians, selfish Christians, are the contempt of the world, men cast them out. Men of the world want to see the real thing; there is enough of sham in the world, they expect to see in Christians something like Christ, they expect to have living Bibles in the persons of Christ's followers, and they are right; men cast out and refuse to own as Christians, those who shirk the cross.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

WHAT NOT TO READ.

AMID this deluge of books many people are being drowned. They know not which way to turn. Every one you meet has a book to suggest, and the papers have whole columns of literary commendations. The question what to read is much discussed, but not so much the question what not to read. Better stand off from all those books which are made, not because the author had anything to say, but because the publisher and author wanted to make a commercial success. Such books are generally of large type, profuse illustration and showy binding. They must have so many words, so many pages, so many pictures. You are aware from the appearance of the book, that it was merely made to sell. I believe, however, that a book will be of little practical service unless the author was compelled by an inward consciousness of duty to print it. The book into which an honest and earnest author throws his whole soul is the one that will magnetize, lift and vivify you. Avoid that book which has the appearance of literary jobbing. I also advise that you take only small doses of love story. The majority of novels are made to set forth desperate love-scrapes. It is well enough for a man to read sufficient of this literature to keep him from being awkward when he himself becomes a party to some affair of the heart. But much reading of love-stories makes one soft, insipid, absent minded, and useless. The probability is that when you fall in love, you will not fall into it according to the cheap novels. The lady will not burst into tears, nor faint, nor will the old man oppose you, so that you will have to place a long ladder to the third story window at midnight. Excessive reading of love stories will make you a fool before you know it. I further advise you not to read a book merely because some one else likes it. Do not waste your time on Shakespeare, if you have no taste for poetry or the drama, merely because so many like Shakespeare, nor pass a long time with Sir William Hamilton, when metaphysics are repulsive to you, though your literary friends are in raptures with the great headed Scotchman. When you read a book by the page, every few minutes looking ahead to see how many chapters you have to finish before you will be through, you had better stop that book and take something else. There is no reason in your dousing your plate with vinegar because your friends are especially fond of the sour, or of spreading your bread with honey because your host has a taste for the saccharine. There comes ever and anon a fashion for certain styles of reading. Be not overborne by the pressure. For a while there was prevailing a Tupperian epidemic, and we all went to writing blank verse. Then there came a Carlylean epidemic, and we all wrote turgid, involved, twisted, and break-neck sentences, each noun with as many verbs as Brigham Young had wives, and as little acquainted with them. Then came the Renanish epidemic, and the attempt everywhere was made to mingle romance and religion, with frequent punches at religion, and we prided ourselves on being sceptical.

THE WORLD'S AGUE.

WHAT a rough time this old earth is having! Every few weeks somewhere an earthquake. Geologists tell us our planet has been in convulsions ever and anon since it was born, and it does seem to me as though it had been chills and fever without end—now so cold it chattered with the white teeth of glacier, and now hot until the hemispheres seemed afire. "Firm as the everlasting hills" should be rejected as a figure of speech, for the hills are neither firm nor everlasting. Four or five years ago our climate was all disturbed and frenzied by what were called electric showers in the sun. Every little while a comet shoots through our night with enough force to obliterate us with one sweep of its tail. Caracas down, Lisbon buried, Java cracked open, Charleston terrorized and San Francisco again and again frantic, it is evident that God has no special controversy with any city or any land, for all lands have felt the tread of the earthquake. My impression is that there will be no long-continued cessation of these subterranean attacks, but a greater frequency of them until the planetary demolition. It is a shaky, rheumatic, epileptic old world, and it will die in one of these stupendous fits. It is a poor place to make permanent investment. Some think it will be fixed up for the final residence of the righteous; there is so much ice to be melted, and so much fire to be extinguished, and so many wild winds to be tamed, it is scarcely worth while to reconstruct it. Let us have a brand-new world. God did not make the moon over again after it became an extinct volcano. The telescope tells us it was left in ruins and will probably stay in ruins, and I think this world will yet be a forsaken wreck, to which we will from higher spheres make excursions, as now we go down to the beach at Southampton or Amagansett to see an old hulk that has been rotting there for twenty years. There is caged in the centre of this world an old lion of destruction, and he will not rest quiet much of the time, and he plunges against the bars of the cage. At one time he put one paw against the Western Hemisphere, and that made everything rattle from Florida to New York; and at another time he puts his paw against the Eastern Hemisphere, and France and Italy rock from side to side. No one can chain the raging internal monster or bid him lie down, except the one who made the lions crouch before Daniel in the Babylonish cavern.

The world needs about thirty new volcanoes. Volcanoes are to this world what boils are to diseased human body—the escape of bad humors that must come out, and, though they are hard to bear—both the boils and volcanoes—it is a choice in both cases between eruption and death. Perhaps God will give to the human race a power not yet exercised. By discharge of artillery, it has been found that showers of rain can be brought down, and it almost always rains on the evening of the Fourth of July, after gunpowdery explosions, and always rains on the evening after a battle, so that ingenious men may, after a while, contrive some style of cannonading that will break up the great droughts that afflict the earth. I am not sure that huge-handed machinery will not be invented that shall yet give relief to the world's paroxysm of earthquake, dividing down until the disturbed elements can be set free. A few extemporized outlets would end forever these subterranean turmoils and take this nervous and feverish earth into placidity and health. But before its destruction the world is to be gardenized. The last thunder will not roll over a desert, but over a Los Angeles, a Chatsworth, a paradise regained. We may not be able to manage the inside of this world, but religion will manage the outside. If the lion will lie down in the mountain, the lamb will lie down on the top of it. In Eden Adam had the beasts around him in amity, and the birds taught him to sing and the lambs taught him to play and the fish taught him to swim and the lion a lioness, at peace with all, covered his feet with their tawny mane. So it shall be again. Forces celestial, atmospheric, aquatic, volcanic shall be in complete accord with the redeemed human race and there shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mount; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. So when the earth is finally wrecked it will not be like a ship condemned as unseaworthy and worn out in the timbers, but like some great man-of-war of the deep, with gilded cabin and costly cargo, and with all sails set, crashing against a rock, a great Ville de Havre in collision, an Argo sinking, a splendid world passing out of sight.

STRUCK ON THE HEAD.

THE coroner's jury have come in. Facts were fought in a grog shop. Michael wants a drink. The bartender refuses to let him have it. Michael wants a drink so much he leaps over the bar to get it. Bartender takes up a bottle, and with it breaks Michael's head. The verdict of the coroner's jury so declares it. But this is no peculiar case. The bottle is breaking more heads to-day than is any weapon. We talk of the hearts but of the heads. Our literary and newspaper men are so pressed of hard work and kept up so late nights, and so exhausted of nervous energy, that many of them are taking artificial stimulants to keep up. They show it in their eyes and cheek, and some of them in the inflammation of the end of their nose. They are gradually going down. Every year they are able to do less and less. After a while they will disappear, and the doctors will apply a handsome sounding Latin term to the style of their decay. But all the world will know that they were killed by the same weapon that slew Michael. Struck across the head with a bottle.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Another Sister was Welcomed to the Family States on July 3, by the President's signature the Idaho bill. It was expected that the bill would have been signed on the Fourth, but the President called the delegate's attention to the fact that a new star could be added to the flag only on July 4, and, therefore, if he signed the bill on that day, Idaho's star would not appear for a year. It was therefore signed on July 3, and all correct flags on Friday bore for the first time forty-three stars. On the last anniversary they bore only thirty-eight, but in the interval, beside Idaho, the symbols of North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington have been added. Wyoming also hoped to have celebrated its admission on Independence Day, but the Senate and the House had disagreed over her land and the difference was not settled in time. Her star will doubtless appear next year, and flag-makers are discussing the best way of arranging the stars to accommodate forty-four on the field. The plan most in favor is to have the highest and lowest line contain eight and the four intermediate lines seven each.

A Momentous Question Awaits Senatorial Action in the Federal Election Bill, which passed the House on July 2d. The Bill practically gives the Federal government the power of conducting the elections for the Presidency and members of Congress, in the various States. There can be no question as to the constitutional power of Congress to make such a provision, but the vigorous protests made against it in the North, as well as in the South, prove that it is an innovation of a serious character. The States, which it is expected that the Federal power will be invoked, feel humiliated at the interference with long-established usage which it threatens. No legislation for many years past has aroused the old sectional animosities. Its operation is not dreaded in the North, but it is recognized there as a step toward centralization and as an invasion of the rights of the States, which may have dangerous results. It is doubtful whether it will have the good effect in the South that is hoped from it. The evils it is deemed to remedy are moral, and moral evils cannot be cured by legislation. It would appear in the attitude taken against the bill that, while it will exasperate the South, it will not remove the difficulties which now keep the color-voters from the polls. They will be protected by the provisions of the bill, if they choose to go there and cast their votes, but no legislation can protect them from the social hostility which they will incur by voting. There is reason to fear that the real evils which the promoters of the bill hope to remove by its operation will be increased thereby, and the position of the colored voter be made more painful than before.

A Small Riot Took Place in New York, on July 3, as the outgrowth of a labor struggle. Several firms in the city have introduced the eating system, which is the curse of the great cities in Europe. The cloak-makers have gone on strike, and if their reports of the wages they have been receiving may be relied on, their demands for more money were not without reason. But the wealthy firms, who employ them, knew that there were other people, who would do the work at the price they were willing to pay, and so there was no need to cut down their profits, or to raise the price of the garments by the few cents each, which would have covered the increase asked for by the operatives. The work was therefore given out to the new hands, whose necessities drove them to help the employer in the struggle with the employees. The strikers became exasperated, when they learned that the work was being done. They demanded that no one would do it at the price offered. Finding that one sweating hole had been established in a tenement house, on Eldridge St., they went to it, and found seven persons at work in a small room. They tore down the materials, and scattered the workers, but had been sent to the police and about twenty of them were arrested. They will be sentenced to various terms of imprisonment and the strike will collapse. But the misery will continue. The stories of the poverty of the workers are horrible. In one case a family of eight persons, occupied two stifling little rooms and with all working, who were old enough to work, they could not, at the prices paid, do better. During the struggle all the furniture has gone to buy food. Ladies, who are glad when they purchase a cloak at a lower price than they have been used to pay, know now how it is that the price is reduced, and what that cloak cost in human life.

An Appeal to Congress was Made by the President on July 2, on behalf of the closer relations with our southern neighbors. A letter from the Secretary of State, which he enclosed, showed that all our sister republics were doing more than we are, by subsidizing steamship lines and by other means, to maintain commerce which is of more advantage to us than to them. The delegates of the seventeen countries represented in the recent conference were all eager, Mr. Blaine said, to co-operate with the United States in extending present facilities by cable, railroad and steamship, and were prepared to contribute on the basis of population. The President strongly urged on Congress an immediate and favorable consideration of the project, pointing out how enormous would be the benefit it would confer on our own merchants by opening up markets for our products which are now occupied by Europeans. This is a necessary accompaniment to the proposal of reciprocity which, on the suggestion of Mr. Blaine, Senator Hale has appended to the Tariff bill.

The Agreement on the African Question Between England and Germany was signed on July 1. It is a curious fact that protests are being made against it in both countries, and in each the charge is made that its government has been overreached. In England the complaints are chiefly respecting the cession of Heligoland. Lord Salisbury is charged with handing over to Germany a people bitterly opposed to German rule. He contends, however, that their opposition is only to the conscription law of Germany, and in the cession he expressly stipulated that none of the present inhabitants of the island should be subject to conscription. The German opposition to the agreement centres on the clause giving England the protectorate of Zanzibar, which is recognized as the key to Eastern Equatorial Africa. Baron Wissmann, however, consoles the discontented critics by promising that when he assumes the administration of the German possessions he can open other ports with facilities equal to those of Zanzibar.

A Ministerial Crisis in Spain Occurred Last week, but without the disturbances which in past times would have accompanied such an event. Senor Sagasta resigned, and Senor Canovas del Castillo takes his place as premier of the new government. The change is a surprise, as it was expected that Sagasta would have remained in power until after the approaching elections, when the results of the system of universal suffrage, which he has given to Spain would be known. It is not known yet what question caused Sagasta's resignation. He has been the most enlightened statesman Spain has had in modern times. The civil marriage act, and other measures were his work, and he has shown a sagacity and tact in his administration which have gratified the Spanish people, and have saved the country from a renewal of dynastic troubles. The system of government he has gradually introduced, is practically that which exists in England, and by which the cabinet and not the throne is responsible to the country for the national policy. Senor Canovas who has been appointed to succeed him will not, it is thought, pursue a reactionary policy.

The War Cloud in the Balkans Still Disturbs the statesmen of Europe. The Sultan of Turkey finds that if he were disposed to satisfy the claims of Bulgaria he would immediately receive similar claims, from Servia and other provinces which he could not consistently refuse. Nor does it appear that the concessions, if he made them, would relieve him from his embarassment. Simultaneously with the demand of Bulgaria, with Russian endorsement, came the demand for the payment of the war indemnity which Russia insists shall be immediate. The two demands coming at the same time are taken as an indication that, in the opinion of Russia the time has arrived to push the Sultan to the wall. The concentration of the Russian army on the Armenian frontier, implies that decisive action is intended, and that it will assume a form which will provoke English hostility. England has assumed the protectorate of the Asiatic dominions of the Sultan, and he has therefore a right to call upon her for help in the crisis. That the situation is serious is generally admitted. The Emperor of Germany has attempted to mediate. He has suggested a financial scheme for the discharge of the debt, and proposes to substitute a Swedish prince for Prince Ferdinand, who as ruler of Bulgaria has been offensive to Russia. He has been curtly informed that his proposals are not acceptable to Russia. The situation causes acute anxiety as the outbreak of war might, in the present strained relations of European powers, involve other countries besides those immediately concerned.

BRIEF NOTES.

The collections in London for the Hospitals on Hospital Sunday, amounted to $135,000.

It is reported that Mrs. John L. Wright, American Presbyterian missionary in Persia, has been murdered by a fanatical native.

Mr. Marmont B. Edson has added $50,000 to the $50,000 given by the late Miss Mary A. Edson toward the Missions House of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The marriage of Mr. H. M. Stanley to Miss Dorothy Tennant is to take place in Westminster Abbey on July 12. The Prince and Princess of Wales have promised to attend.

Mr. Porter, superintendent of the census, says that from present indications the total population of the United States will prove to be 64,500,000 as against 50,155,783 ten years ago.

Five Indian Chiefs attended the Sunday School at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on June 29th, and Short Horn, one of them, belonging to the Blackfoot tribe, made an address to the school.

The corner-stone of the Judson Memorial Church at the corner of Washington Square and Thompson St., New York, was laid on June 30. In the cavity of the stone was placed a copy of the Bible, translated by Dr. Adoniram Judson into Burmese.

The Louisiana Legislature on July 1, passed the Lottery bill, which extends the charter on the payment of $1,250,000 a year. The concession needs to be confirmed by popular vote, so there is still a faint hope of its being beaten.

Rev. Geo. C. Needham has been holding very important Gospel services at Newport, R. I., following up the Convention of the New England Evangelistic Association recently held there. Large congregations gathered to hear the noted evangelist and much good was done. Mr. Needham is to be one of the speakers at the Bible Conference at Niagara.

Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt has purchased for $75,000 three lots on East Forty-second st., New York, and upon them a building is to be erected, costing $250,000, at the expense of his mother, Mrs. William H. Vanderbilt, for mission work conducted by Colonel H. H. Hadley in connection with St. Bartholomew's parish. A chapel, free baths, and other conveniences will be combined in the new building.

Bishop J. M. Thoburn of India, spoke at Mr. Moody's College Conference at Northfield, on July 3. He said that thirty dollars a year would support a mission in India, and he had men trained to take charge of them. Mr. Moody at once said that he would personally give the money for one mission. Other offers were made by representatives of colleges and before the meeting separated $3,300 had been raised.

The Philadelphia Medical Mission makes an excellent report of its year's work. Its labors are in the slums of the city among the poor, the outcasts and the vicious classes. It holds two Gospel services every week which show an increasing attendance and greater spiritual interest. During the year there have been large accessions to the band of workers, and many persons have been won from sin to the service of Christ.

Rockford Seminary, Ill., celebrated its commencement on June 25. The gratifying announcement was made that the Scientific Fund was completed and that the Alumnae Association had given an additional $5,000 to the endowment of the Principal's chair. Miss Galatin's services as Principal are now lost to the Institution by her ill-health. Miss Sarah F. Anderson, who succeeds her, has been connected with the Seminary for twenty years, and her appointment has the approval of all its friends.

THE TENDER HIGH PRIEST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"We have not a high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Heb. 4 15.

The High Priest's Office Continued—A Greater High Priest than Aaron—Tenderness a Distinguishing Trait—I. Has Assumed a very Tender Office—To Reveal God's Will to Men—To Speak to God for Men—To Hear Confession and Judge—To Console the Sorrowful—To Instruct and Reprove—II. Has a Tender Feeling—How Tenderness may be Gained—A Physician's Advice—A Six-Months' Sentence for a Member of Parliament—The Harshness of the Successful Man—III. Had a Tender Training—Tempted to Unbelief and Presumption—IV. A Tender Perfectness.

BELOVED, we have a High Priest. All that Israel had under the law we still retain; only we have the substance, of which they had only the shadow. "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle": We have a sacrifice, which, being once offered, forever avails; we have "One greater than the temple," and He is to us the mercy-seat and the High Priest. Take it for granted that all the blessings of the law remain under the gospel.

Observe here that the apostle delights to dwell upon the majesty and glory of our High Priest. What does He say? "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest," as if Aaron and all his sons were little personages compared with Him. These men were all faulty; but we have a "great High Priest," who is absolutely perfect. These men did but humbly represent Him, as in a dew-drop the sun may be reflected; but He is the true High Priest between God and man, and so the epithet "great" is put before His name as it could not be before any other.

Paul delights to dwell upon these points of glory. But when he has done so, it seems to occur to him that when we consider the greatness of our High Priest some poor trembling sinners may be afraid to draw nigh to Him; and the apostle ever has a longing eye towards drawing souls to Jesus. Therefore, he falls back upon our Lord's tenderness. Great as He is, our High Priest is not one who "cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Let no man be afraid of Him who is the embodiment of gentleness and compassion. Though conscious of your own infirmities, you may feel free to come to Him, who will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. I want to speak so tenderly that even the despairing may look up, and may feel a drawing towards our beloved Master who is so graciously touched with a feeling of our infirmities.

I. So I am going to begin my sermon by saying of our blessed Lord, He has assumed

A Very Tender Office.

It was intended, first, that by the high priest God should commune with men. That needs a person of great tenderness. A mind that is capable of listening to God, and understanding, in a measure, what He teaches, had need to be very tender, so as to interpret the lofty sense into the lowly language of humanity. If the man is to come from among the infinites down to the ignorance and narrow capacities of mortal men, he had need to be tender as a nurse to her children. What he had grasped from the Lord he must so put that the people could grasp it and act upon it. This is what our Lord has done in the tenderest manner. He reveals the Father. The things of God which He knoweth He makes known unto us by His Holy Spirit, as we are able to bear them. We are to learn of Him.

But a high priest took the other side also; he was to communicate with God from men. Here, also, he needed the tenderest spirit to rule his faculties and to move his affections. He must needs sit down and hear all the trembling petitions of troubled mothers who had come from the utmost end of Israel laden with their domestic burdens; he must listen to all the complaints of the oppressed, the woes of the afflicted, the trials of the poor, the perplexities of the distracted; and then, as a man of God, he was ordained to take all these things in prayer before the Most High, and in fitter language to present the requests of the broken in heart. What a tender office! How few could carry it out! Is it not gracious on our Lord's part to undertake so tender an office for those who need it so greatly, and have no other way of access to the God of grace?

But if I understand the high priest's office aright, he had many things to do which come under this general description, but which might not suggest themselves, if you did not have the items set before you. The high priest was one who had to deal with sin and judgment for the people. This is a very tender post to occupy. No mere man is fitted to hear, as a rule, the confessions of all sorts of people, and certainly, he should not seek to do so. Yet the man whom God calls to feed His flock is forced, at times, to enter into the soul-conflicts of his fellow-men, and to hear the mournful story of their wanderings; and he needs great tenderness in so doing. We have a High Priest into whose ear we may pour all the confessions of our penitence without fear. Go and do so.

The Consoler.

No doubt the high priest was resorted to, that he might console the sorrowful. It must have been a great relief for those who were of a sorrowful spirit, to go unto the sanctuary of the Lord, and sit at the feet of a man of God, who could remind the stricken one of the promises made to meet such sorrow. Only to tell the story was helpful. Mourners often get more comfort from telling their griefs than they do from the remarks of those to whom they unbosom themselves. Go to Jesus, dear friend, if a sharp grief is now gnawing at your heart. If it be a trouble which you could not tell to your father or your husband, go to Jesus with it. Pour out the wormwood and the gall before Him: He knows their bitterness, and He will surely make them to be swallowed up in victory.

It was the high priest's business to instruct and to reprove the people. To instruct is delightful; but to reprove is difficult. Only a tender spirit can wisely utter rebuke. Israel's high priest needed to be meek as Moses in his rebukes of the erring. Our Lord Jesus Christ tells us our faults in tones of love. His rebukes never break the heart. He never upbraids in bitterness, though he does so in faithfulness. Oh, the tenderness of Christ! I feel my subject deeply, but I cannot speak of it as I would.

II. Now, secondly, as our Lord Jesus has a tender office, so, next,

He has a Tender Feeling.

"We have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." You are touched, and He is touched, at the same time. A pang shoots through my heart: that pang has been felt by my Lord also. A grief has stirred the waters of my spirit, and the spirit of the great High Priest has moved in harmony therewith. They say, but I know not that it is true, that when the strings of one harp are touched, if there be another harp in the room, it gently responds in unison, though not touched by any hand; assuredly it is so with the believer and his Lord.

The Plea of Infirmity.

Note well that word "infirmities"—"touched with the feeling of our infirmities." If it had only said sorrows, there would have been a sound of the sublime about it; but He stoops to "infirmities." He is not only touched with the feeling of the heroic endurance of the martyrs, but He sympathizes with those of you who are no heroes, but can only plead, "the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." Hold fast this truth, for it may greatly tend to your consolation another day. Jesus is touched, not with a feeling of your strength, but of your infirmity.

How comes this about, brethren? Let us think of it awhile! Our Lord has a tender nature. Some people are not sympathetic, and never will be; their spirit is not generous. We are all made of clay: but some clay is stiffer and more gritty than another; and very hard grit it is in some cases. Some men have no more feeling than granite. They will say about the collection to-day, "I shall not give anything to the hospitals. Let the people take care of themselves. If they were more thrifty they would have a little laid by for a rainy day, and would not need to have hospitals provided for them." This gentleman can supply wagon-loads of the same sort of hard material. I know you, my friend, I have known you too, a long time. I was going to say, "I would be happy to attend your funeral"; but I will not say so, lest it seem that I am hardening myself under your influence; and besides, there are so many of your order, that one more or less is of no great consequence. Our Lord is tender by nature.

Our Lord is not only tender of nature but quick of understanding as to the infirmities of men. Want of sense often prevents men being sensitive and sympathetic. If you have never suffered under disease, you need a little imagination to realize it, so as to be touched with the feeling of it. I noticed a very able address delivered by Mr. Hutchinson before the Lord Mayor last Friday, in which he advises a person who mourns his lack of sympathy to go for a week to his usual city vocation with a black patch over one eye. "If this does not effect the business," he says, "let him choose some leisure day in bright spring, and resolutely for twenty-four hours keep a bandage firmly placed over both eyes. His organization is, I fear, in this direction, well-nigh hopeless, if next morning he does not feel inclined to send a liberal donation to some hospital, that has for its mission the prevention of blindness." I have no doubt that improvable persons might be all the better for some such attempt to gain fellow-feeling. The same doctor thinks that the wearing of a truss or spinal apparatus for one day might be

A Help to Tenderness.

I will not urge these modes of cure; but the principle is good, and it might be tried in other directions. Suppose the squire of the parish who thinks ten or twelve shillings abundant wages for a week, should say to his lady, "We have always said that our agricultural laborer have quite enough to live upon; let us try their fare. We will leave this house for a week and take one of the old cottages in the village; and live all of us, on the wage we pay our men." What a capital school for social economy! How we would some people know the value of our silver currency, and of the copper coinage also! Only we should like members of parliament to have a longer experience than one week, lest it might be a pleasant change from feasting to fasting. Say six months for the honorable member. This might foster sympathy. Our blessed Lord had real experience; and, beside that, the faculty of being able to put Himself into the place of sufferers, and so to be "acquainted with grief." His quick understanding made Him realize, as High Priest, the sorrows of His people.

Blatant Sufferers.

Too many people are so wrapped up in their own grief that they have no room in their soul for sympathy. Do you not know them? The first thing when they rise in the morning, is the story of the night they have passed. Ah, dear, and they have not quite eaten a hearty breakfast, before their usual pain is somewhere or other coming over them. They must have the special care and pity of the whole household. All the day long the one great business is to keep everybody aware of how much the great sufferer is enduring. It is this person's pater noster to monopolize all the sympathy which the market can supply, and then there will be none to spare for the rest of the afflicted. If you are greatly taken up with self, there is not enough of you to run over to anybody else. How different this from our Lord, who never cried, "Have pity on upon Me! Have pity upon Me O my friends!"

Men who are wrapped up in their own glory are not sympathetic. Is it not a fine thing to spend a life in contemplating one's own magnificence? Those who are amazed at their own greatness have no thought to spare for the suffering. "No," says the man, "the masses obey the laws of supply and demand, and it is on as well as they can. Let them do as I have done."

might have been as poor as they are, if I had own as little push and enterprise as they do." The gentleman talks on a great scale, and he has no sympathy for the small woes of common men. His sympathy is wanted at home; and his charity begins there, and is so satisfied with its winning that it never goes any further. Our Lord is at the opposite pole from all this. He never glorified Himself: He "made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant"; thus displaying the tenderness of His heart.

II. I must now notice very briefly, in the next place, that our Lord had A Tender Training.

For what He says of it. "He was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Blessed, our Lord was tried as we are; that is one meaning of the passage. As to all manner of physical ills, he was subject to them all. Hungry, weary, faint, without a place whereon to lay His head, He was tried in all the points to which temptation exposes its victims. Our Lord has been tempted mentally. "Oh," says one, "I do not think body has been tried as I have been by cruel kindness." Say not so, for Jesus was forsaken of all, and betrayed by the friend in whom he trusted. As to spiritual distress, our Lord has been there also. Where any sinless foot could go, He has gone. The abyss has heard His cry, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken Me?" Tried in all points from above and from below, from without and from within, our Lord can sympathize with every form of tribulation.

But the text says tempted, and and that bears a deeper meaning than "tried." Yet remember in the wilderness He was Tempted to Unbelief.

The evil one said, "If thou be the Son of God, show thyself here." Most of us know how he can hiss that into our ear. "If thou be the Son of God," said our Lord that "if" fell painfully but harmlessly. Then came the temptation to help Him and anticipate the providence of God by His action: "Command that these stones be bread." We, too, have had this rash act suggested to us. The tempter hath said, "You do get out of your difficulties by doing a magic thing—do it. It is not a very wrong thing; indeed, it is questionable whether it might not be justifiable under the circumstances. In vain will you wait for the Lord; but your own hand and provide for yourself." The way of faith in God is slow, and you are in pressing need." Our Lord came just here. When no bread in the house is made the background of a great temptation, remember that our Lord has undergone the counter-foil of that temptation.

The evil fiend—how often I have wondered at his—dared to say to Christ, "All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." Picture the Lord of angels, with all the royalty of heaven shining on His brow, and the evil fiend daring to say, "Fall down and worship me!" It may be that a like temptation was coming home to you: live for gold, live for fame, live for pleasure; in some form or other, worship the devil and renounce faith in God. "Worship me," says the prince of evil: he leads to the new doctrines, practice the current fashions, leave the word of God for the opinions of the philosophers: in some form the temptation come; but even though the devil could fulfil his promise, and all the world would be ours, we are bound to resist unto death, and we are encouraged to do so by the fact that we are upon the old ground where the Redeemer fought and conquered. He can sympathize with the distress which this temptation brings you; for He has felt the same.

I am happy to come to my last point. Our Lord has

A Tender Perfectness.

Read the verse—"In all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin," I thought I heard our Lord say, "But that is just the pinch of the matter. He cannot sympathize with me in sin, and that is my great trouble." Brother, do not wish that your Lord had become a sinner like yourself? Abhor the idea! It would be blasphemy if understood and indulged. You see at once that you cannot wish anything of the kind. But listen to me; do not imagine that if the Lord Jesus had sinned He would have been any more tender toward you; for sin is always of a hardening nature. If the Christ of God could have sinned, He would have lost the perfection of His sympathetic nature. It needs perfectness of heart to lay self all aside, and to be touched with a feeling of the infirmities of others.

Hearken again: do you not think that sympathy in sin would be a poisonous sweet? A child, for instance, has done wrong, and he has been wisely chastened by his father; I have known cases in which a foolish mother has sympathized with the child. This may seem affectionate, but it is wickedly

Injurious to the Child.

Such conduct would surely lead the child to love the evil which it is needful he should hate. Have you not felt yourself that, in unbelieving moments, it would have been a great evil for a Christian brother to have petted you in your unbelief; and that it was far better for you to have heard a bracing word of upbraiding? We ought not to wish for sympathy in wrong. We must show sympathy with sinners, but not with their sins.

I have done when I have said this—if our Lord was thus sympathetic, let us be tender to our fellow-men. Let us not restrain our tenderer feelings, but encourage them. Love is the brightest of the graces, and most sweetly adorns the gospel. Love to the sorrowing, the suffering, the needy is a charming flower, which grows in the garden of a renewed heart. Cultivate it! Make your love practical! Will you allow the poor to pine in their narrow rooms! Shall they perish for lack of surgical care and medical help? Do you call yourself followers of the tender Jesus? Do you hope to be saved through His compassion? On this Hospital Sunday I charge rich Christians to delay no longer, but to be touched with the feeling of the sufferings of those who are made of one flesh with them. Let all of us do our best. I will not insult you by pleading with you as though you were unwilling. You are eager to give for His dear sake who sympathizes with you tenderly, and helps you so graciously. Let the collection be made at once.

A DEMENTED HUSBAND RESTORED.

AN interesting case of Divine Healing is reported in Mrs. Baxter's magazine, Thy Healer. It is another instance of the parallelism of the spiritual and physical results of faith. The brethren, who believe in healing by faith, have always contended that the same principle on which the Christian commits his soul to Christ should lead him to commit his body to Him, and that Christ is as ready to heal and renew the body of His follower as He was to regenerate his soul. The instance now reported indicates that the parallel goes further, and as Paul said that the unbelieving husband might be sanctified through the wife (1 Cor. 7:14) so in sickness he may be healed through the faith of his wife.

It appears that fourteen years ago, a marriage took place between a worldly young farmer, and a lady of his own class, who was also of a worldly disposition. Adversity came upon them, sickness, loss of crops, and misfortunes of many kinds. Their troubles had opposite effects upon them. They drove the wife to the Saviour and the husband into infidelity. The latter became profligate, dissipated, and immoral. The wife bore with him patiently, and prayed, and worked, to bring him to Christ. Her own life for several years was a life of inconceivable humiliation and suffering. Finally she sank under her trials and was brought almost to death's door. She sought the prayers of God's people and was wonderfully healed. Then her husband grew nervous and exhibited signs of insanity. He was at last confined in the asylum at Hatton, England, which is under the charge of the most skilful and successful specialist in the country. The wife went frequently to see the demented man, and had an interview, at last, with the doctor, who told her that her husband could never recover. His form of insanity was hopeless. She must make up her mind, that he would be there as long as he lived, and he added that his death would be a matter for congratulation. The afflicted wife was much distressed; but after her return home the thought of her own healing came to her mind, and she resolved to commit her husband's case to the same Hands. She sent to Bethshan, and prayer was made continually for him. In a short time the wife received word that he was much better, and now he is pronounced well and has been released from the asylum. In a letter which he has sent to Bethshan since his recovery he says: "And now, dear sisters, will you praise God for my great deliverance, and ask Him to give me grace to live and act as His last Will and Testament commands. My deliverance has been through God's great mercy in hearing and answering the earnest and believing prayers of faithful and 'nothing doubting' Christians."

A CHINAMAN'S CONSCIENCE.

THE Gospel had not been long preached in Koankhau before several persons professed their faith in Christ. One of these was a young man that kept a cake shop in one of the principal streets of the town. He was naturally a thoughtful and earnest man, and the exalted truths of Christianity had a special attraction for him. The question of religion was to him a most serious one, and now that he had obtained what he believed to be the true one, he was prepared to make any sacrifices that might be demanded of him for it. The time very speedily came when it was to be tested. It is the custom in every town to hold public services in honor of the idols in it, at particular times of the year. Each district appoints a head man who arranges about the feast, and the theatrical performances, and who also collects from the public the sums in which they have been assessed to defray expenses. This man with a number of his followers, applied to the cake maker for his amount. He told them that he had become a Christian, and could no longer pay as he had been accustomed to do. They said they had no objection to his worshipping any God he pleased, so long as he conformed to existing usages. He was positive in his refusal, and they went away. Next day they returned and proposed a scheme by which he might be relieved, whilst at the same time they would not lose his subscriptions. They suggested that he might increase his rent by the amount due, and then the landlord could settle with them. "They did not wish," they said, "to quarrel with him, because hitherto they had been good neighbors together. He was an honest, industrious man, and they liked him, and were anxious to come to some arrangement that would prevent ill-feeling."

The Chinaman sturdily refused to agree to this plan, as it would not be honest for him to do so, seeing that he would still be paying for the support of an idol that he disbelieved in. They again reasoned with him, and appealed to him to yield, on the ground that his case would afford a precedent for others. The head man said: "Suppose that you are allowed exemption: of course other persons in the whole street may claim the same. And supposing that the whole street should decide to follow your example, then how would the temple service be kept up, and who would pay for the feasts in honor of the idol? The whole thing would collapse." The man replied with a smile that this was what he hoped and longed for. The men were shocked at this temerity in braving the vengeance of the gods. But they did not admire it and they told him finally he must either pay or leave the town. Before long he found that this was not an idle threat. During the next few months, he was so harassed by those in authority, and deserted by his customers, that he had to shut up his shop, and remove to Amoy. But he still relies upon God and being assured of his acceptance with Him does not fear what man can do to him."

Miss Fawcett, Chief Graduate of Cambridge University.

The Brethren's Hall, Plymouth England.

DRIVEN TO CHRIST.

IN the course of a letter to the Church, Rev. W. J. McKee, of Ningpo, China, thus describes the conversion of a man whom he had just admitted to Christian baptism: "The third one received is a man over sixty years of age to whom the Valley of Achor was evidently given for a door of hope. He is a peddler who has for many years sold goods to our girls' boarding-school. First his son, a promising scholar died. Then there was discord in his family. Finding no more pleasure in life, he decided to live religiously and prepare for the future life. Having heard something of the truth from our Christians, he began worshipping the heavenly God at home in his own way. But he did not gain peace, and was not yet satisfied. He asked the matron and cook in the girls' school to tell him more of our way, which they gladly did, and recommended him to go and talk with Pastor Zi. That same day he went to Mr. Zi and said, I wish to prepare for the future life, and will you tell me how? The pastor joyfully told him fully of Him who is the way, the truth and the life. The old man became a regular attendant at our church services, and now leads a consistent Christian life. His face, though showing the traces of trouble and sorrow, indicates the possession of a peace the world cannot give."

MISS PHILIPPA G. FAWCETT.

Winner of the Chief University Honor of the Year.
AN event unprecedented in the annals of the famous University of Cambridge, England, has occurred at the recent examinations. The coveted distinction of standing at the head of the list in the mathematical department has been won by a woman. The faculty of the University do not admit women as students, but some twenty years ago the College of Newnham was established for girls, and the privilege was granted to that college of sending its students to the annual examinations at Cambridge, to undergo the same test as the male students. It is an interesting fact that the movement which led to the founding of the college, and the gaining of this concession from the University, originated in a meeting in the drawing-room of Mrs. Fawcett, the wife of the blind statesman, who was Postmaster-General of Great Britain.

At that time Mr. Fawcett had a little daughter, a year and a half old, named Philippa Garrett Fawcett who, growing up, was sent to Clapham High School, and subsequently having won a scholarship at Newnham College, she went to that institution. She inherited the intellectual gifts of her father, who himself missed being Senior Wrangler at Cambridge only by his nervousness at the examination. No such nervousness affected his daughter when she went through the same ordeal. She wrote her papers coolly, showed no fatigue and kept her self-possession. Much of this was doubtless due to the habits of her college life. She had worked hard, but had not burned the midnight oil. Her books had been rigidly closed at eleven o'clock, and she had taken care to have daily exercise. She was consequently in excellent condition of mind and body when she entered upon the examination, which is a most severe strain to the ablest under-graduates.

When the list of the successful candidates was issued, at the head stood the name of Miss Fawcett with four hundred marks more to her credit than those to the credit of the next name on the list. He, being a man, receives the distinction of being "Senior Wrangler" of the year,—a distinction which under the rules of the University could not be conferred on a woman. The fact, however, that nothing but her sex prevented her occupying the proud position, is well understood by the University and the public. Her competitors and the graduates showed their appreciation of her achievement by cheering her enthusiastically when her name was read out with the words "Above the senior wrangler." The principal of her college gave a banquet in her honor, illuminated the college, lighted a bonfire and had an old-fashioned night of rejoicing.

Miss Fawcett is tall and slender, pale and dark of complexion, and is twenty-two years old. Her success is a genuine surprise. That a woman should win distinction in the classics, or in literature, would not have been astonishing, but that she should gain the chief place in an examination in mathematics is a remarkable triumph. It deserves to be celebrated everywhere as an encouragement to every girl, who is striving to develop the powers which God has given her.

THE BRETHREN'S HALL AT PLYMOUTH

(See Illustration.)

READERS of this journal who belong to the Brethren—or "Plymouth Brethren," as they are called by outsiders, will be glad to have the picture here given of the old Hall in Plymouth, England. It is the Raleigh Street Hall, so closely associated with the origin and development of their society. In this town it was, in 1830, that John Darby gathered the little band around him to break bread, and wait for the promise of the Coming of the Lord, which the Churches had forgotten or ignored. It was but a small company, and their leader was a young man disinherited by his father on account of his faith. But they were strong in their determination to hold by the Bible, to receive no teaching that was not in accordance therewith, and to submit to no spiritual authority but God Himself. Frowning all system, all organization, they met together to study the Word and to pray for the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit. How the numbers grew and extended over the world is well known. Every Church has been indebted to them for an example of earnest, simple piety and the revival of the belief in Christ's personal coming and personal reign on earth, which the generation has witnessed, is largely due to their faithfulness and earnestness with which the Brethren have placed the doctrine and Scriptural proofs of it before the Christian public.

THE COLONNADE OF SAMARIA.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most suggestive spectacles in the Holy Land, speaking of its past splendor and present desolation, is the heap of ruins which the traveller finds at the foot of the hill of Samaria. The accompanying illustration, is drawn from a photograph taken on the occasion of Talmage's visit to the spot, and represents the distinguished American preacher standing among the ruins in conversation with the sheikh who accompanied the party. In such a place the Doctor must have found ample material for the lessons which he inculcates continually from his pulpit at home. All around him were the mute evidences of the truth of the Bible, and the proofs of the threatenings of God and the warnings of His prophets are fully executed. Once, ruined columns and the stones at their base had been part of a scene of splendour and magnificence, but it was a scene of corruption and idolatry, and he had said of it: "I will make Samaria as a heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard, I will pour down the stones thereof into the sea, and I will discover the foundations thereof." (Micah 1:6.) That eminence stood proud city of Samaria, the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel, a city identified with Ahab and Elisha. King Jeroboam had purchased the hill from Shemer, its owner, for two talents of silver, (supposed to be worth about $2,000,) and there he built his temple, B. C. 925. Ahab enlarged it and beautified it, and with characteristic impiety erected in the magnificent temple to Baal. It must have been a strong city, for it was twice ineffectually besieged (I. Kings 20:1 and II. Kings 6:24.) Subsequently Shalmaneser captured the city after a siege of three years, and with it fell the kingdom of Israel. (II. Kings, 18:9.) Subsequently it fell into the hands of Alexander the Great, then, with all that region, it was held by the conquering Romans.

In New Testament times Herod the Great was king, holding it for Augustus Cæsar. He almost entirely rebuilt the city and beautified the country surrounding the hill on which it stood. He it was who killed John the Baptist. The city they now show the tomb of that martyr, but it is improbable that he was buried there, as is supposed, his execution took place in the Castle of Machærus on the east of the Dead Sea.

The city must have almost equalled Jerusalem in beauty when Herod's work was complete. It was surrounded by a wall, and within it was a palace containing a magnificent temple dedicated to Cæsar. The columns of this temple are still to be found near the summit of the hill. Fifteen of them are now standing. Originally they formed two rows, thirty-two paces apart, while two paces intervened between the columns. The columns measure seven feet in circumference. In the ravine on the north side of the city is still another colonnade in a sequestered spot, completely shut in by the hills. These columns formed a magnificent quadrangle, the purpose of which is not known.

The columns seen in the illustration were part of a colonnade that is believed to have surrounded the hill on which the city was built. They are sixteen feet high and two feet in diameter at the base. The capitals have disappeared but the shafts still retain their polish in many places. Most of them are of limestone but some are of white marble and others of granite. There are eighty-two columns still erect and a larger number are prostrate. Stones from the ancient city have been thrown between them, forming a rough wall. It is a sad and mournful picture of ruined grandeur, and an awful illustration of the doom of cities which despise God and give themselves over to licentiousness and corruption.

Dr. Talmage Among the Ruins of the Colonnade of Samaria.

Written expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 430.)

[So many new subscribers have been added to our list since this story was commenced, that it may be useful to give a brief summary of the preceding chapters. It opens with an invitation to Robert Heritage, principal of the high school of Basseterre from Prof. Detwold, of Mount Morrill University, to deliver an address at the Commencement exercises. On his way thither he reads a popular novel dealing with a phase of agnosticism. Believing that the influence of the book will be injurious, he resolves to write a novel which shall present the orthodox view of the question more fairly and attractively. This he does, but on sending it to the editors of several journals, it is declined. Then he describes it to the editor of the Reflector, and asks him if he will examine it with a view to publication. On his way to the college exercises he encounters a young lady on the cars, whom he had known previously, and with whom he has painful associations. At the Commencement he is much impressed with the beauty and genius of Miss Metta Chapman, one of the graduates, and makes her acquaintance. While talking with her at her own door, the lady passes, whose appearance on the cars had disturbed him, and Miss Chapman observes that the meeting is embarrassing to him. Subsequently he visits Miss Chapman at her home, and finds her in distress at the sickness of a friend to whom she goes on a visit. From this point the story proceeds.]

THE AUTHOR'S DEBUT.

THE reply of the editor of the Reflector to Heritage's offer of his story encouraged the hopes of the aspirant to literary fame. It contained the assurance that it would have editorial examination, which was more than it appeared to have received elsewhere. More than that, the purpose and plan of the work which Heritage had outlined in his letter commended themselves to the editor's taste, and he said that if the story was well told he would publish it.

He cordially approved of Heritage's theory respecting the rationalistic novels which had acquired so large a circulation. He lamented the pernicious influence they were exerting, and deplored the effects which would be produced on the youthful readers. "They don't argue the question," he said, "they excite the admiration of the reader for some man, represent him as able and learned, and then describe the struggles which he passes through in abandoning his faith. They do not say what were the arguments which led him to take that step. If they did that, it would not be so bad because people could then judge for themselves, but readers are left to infer that the arguments which could convince so able a logician must be unanswerable. I shall be really glad if you have produced an antidote to such unfair treatment."

"It is the most courteous letter I ever received from an editor," said Heritage. "He seems to be an open-minded man. I think the story will have a fair examination, and that is all an unknown author can expect for his work. Perhaps he may reject it, after all. Even if it shows genius, my inexperience may have spoiled it by some blemishes which are palpable to an editor's eye, though undetected by mine. I suppose it would be too much to expect him to point them out. He must be a busy man, and there is no reason why he should take enough interest in a stranger to spend his time and trouble in helping him. Still it would be kind. I should get more good from his criticism than from the indiscriminate praise of a partial friend. I will send the story to him at once."

Meanwhile a letter from Metta Chapman informed him that her friend was on a fair way of recovery, but would not be well for a month or more, and at her request Metta had decided to remain with her during her period of convalescence. Heritage was sorry. This visit seemed to postpone indefinitely his declaration of love. But he tried to bide his time, and found that the weeks did not drag, so absorbed was he in his school duties, religious activities, and literary work.

It did not take the editor of the Weekly Reflector long to read the manuscript of the story and come to a decision on its merits. In two weeks a letter from him came to hand in which he said: "The general structure and literary workmanship of your story please me so much that I shall be glad to publish it, if you will consent to a few changes. In several chapters the tedium should be relieved by introducing some sprightly conversation, not too religious in tone. One scene—that of the hero's meeting with the ruffian—is drawn so realistically that it becomes a little too coarse for our paper, and I think the love scenes might be improved; as you have them they are a little flat (pardon the word), and too arid. If you say so, I will make suggestions on the copy and then send it to you for elaboration. Please telegraph me and work fast, for we want to begin the story."

Heritage was surprised at himself when he read this epistle. The editor had done the very thing Heritage hoped he would do, yet instead of feeling grateful as he expected he would have done, he was feeling deeply wounded. His vanity was hurt. Dr. C—and others had praised his productions, why should this upstart New Yorker speak of them so slightly—and worse still, with an assumption of patronage that was unpardonable? Still, he wanted his work published. Prudence suggested that he should accept the offer, have the book appear, and then, when his name was talked of in the literary world, he need not submit to such treatment, but could pay back in kind. He therefore swallowed his resentment, and wired his acceptance of the offer, and a few weeks later had the exquisite pleasure of seeing the first instalment in print. Parted Lives: the Story of a Quest, was the title, and he felt a glow of honest pride as he read the words underneath, "By Robert Heritage."

His color heightened and his heart quickened its beat a few evenings later when he received a letter from Metta Chapman. She had seen his story—indeed Heritage had taken measures to insure her seeing it, by having the Reflector mailed to her from the publishing office. He knew she must have seen it, and this letter would contain her opinion of it, an opinion more important to him than that of any one else in the world. Would she like it and would it speak to her for its author? It did not take him many minutes to find the answer to the former question.

Miss Chapman's letter was all congratulatory. After chiding him playfully for not telling her of his work, and pretending that even now she was not sure that the author of the story was really the Robert Heritage she knew, she spoke of the story. "I am so glad," she wrote, "that this mighty engine of fiction is not to be used by agnostics only. The novels published of late, especially one that one finds in every home, when they deal with religion at all, deal with it from a rationalistic standpoint. Yours, if this is really yours, has a distinctly religious tone. It will be an antidote to the poison of the others and the best kind of antidote. In this case I believe in the Homœopathic principle, 'Like cures like.' I pray most earnestly that it may reach the hands of some whose faith has been unanchored by the reading of those dangerous books and it may be the means of bringing them back to peace. I have great faith in the method, and as to the execution it merits the highest praise. It is clever, its style is graceful, it has power and piquancy. I most sincerely congratulate you, and wish for you all the glory you deserve."

After that, Heritage cared little for the carping censor in the editorial room in New York and sat down immediately to write him a dignified letter cautioning him against making any alterations in the story, and insisting on its being printed exactly as he had written it. If Metta Chapman praised it there could be no question of its excellence. The editor might have more experience, but Metta had intuition which was far better.

Heritage had now little fear of the result of a proposal when an opportunity of making it should come. The girl was so friendly, so frank in her interest in him and so evidently admired his work that he felt sure she would accept him when he could speak to her, and he resolved to take advantage of the first chance for running over to Crawley and putting his fortune to the test. Perhaps if he could have done so at once he would have been successful, but circumstances conspired to prevent his going, and in the meantime an unexpected obstacle was put in his way.

Among the citizens of Crawley there was one who had found the spell of Miss Chapman's attractions as potent as Heritage had found them. Over a doorway in the principal street of the town was a sign bearing the legend; "Bradford S. Corrigan. Art Gallery. With Scenery, and Accessories of the Latest Design." One evening, while the events just described were transpiring, the proprietor of the gallery paced his large, well-appointed rooms in a state of nervous agitation, and it was evident that his mind was not occupied with cabinets, busts, vignettes, or even "instantaneous processes." He was thinking of Metta Chapman! Shortly after her return from college he had met her, secured an introduction, and since then had called at her home frequently. But he had not been there often before he learned of Robert Heritage's visits, and when, one evening, some one had referred to that young man in Metta's presence, the sharp eyes of the artist detected the change in her color, and a fear of a possible rivalry at once took possession of him.

The photographer had been brought up in a Christian home, but at an early age had chafed against the religious tutelage of his parents, who were, perhaps, a little too Puritanic in their training, and through various influences he had drifted, rather than reasoned himself, into unbelief, though from motives of policy he seldom avowed his real convictions. At first, he merely questioned the inspiration of the Bible, then he began to doubt the existence of God, and then, unable to rest in an attitude of mere negation, he plunged headlong into blank atheism.

Corrigan was one of those men who carry their theories to their logical conclusions in practical life. We often wonder why all atheists do not become utterly corrupt and bestial. It is because they are better than their philosophy; because they cannot crush, by mere speculation, the witness of God within them, and hence their ethical instincts often save them from the morally deflecting influence of their principles. "Tis the divinity that stirs within." With Corrigan, however, it was different. With the advent of doubt of religious truth, he had lost his grip on moral distinctions, and declared, at least to himself, that all our theories of right and wrong were mere figments. Expediency, shrewdness, policy, were his watchwords, and his conduct was governed accordingly. It mattered little what means were employed, so that a desirable end was compassed; and a desirable end usually meant some advantage to himself.

It must not be supposed that he never felt any protests of conscience, for no man can take a header all at once into infamy. But his vicious philosophy proved a narcotic in case of every demur on the part of the moral powers of his nature. He was not gross or vile, simply because he was not tempted to be so, and because he knew a career of sensuality would ruin his prospects in life. He loved to mingle in good society, and so cloaked all his cunning with a mask of outward candor that he passed for an upright young man, a model for imitation.

As he paced his room that evening, he broke out into a soliloquy. "It is not a moral question at all," he reasoned, bringing his hands together in a logical clasp. "It is a question of the 'survival of the fittest.' Everything depends on who is the fittest—or rather the fitter, to be precise—in this case, Heritage or myself. He wants the girl, I suppose, and I know I want her. There is no harm in my trying to win her," he added, inconsistently, unable, after all, to banish ethical considerations, "for I could make her happy, I am sure—and myself still happier."

He stopped and gazed abstractedly at a delicate etching that hung on the wall. By a mental effort, he evolved the following line of reasoning:

"I don't believe Heritage is the man for her. This little discovery I have made reveals his character, showing how fickle and inconstant, if not unprincipled, he is. Ah! how fortunate it was that I went to the Mount Morrill University when I did! I've found you out, Heritage," apostrophized the artist. "False in one case, false in all! Yes, it is wise and right (if right has anything to do with it) to apprise Miss Chapman of her danger. And the sooner I do it the better. I will do it to-night;" and he drew on his overcoat and gloves and sallied forth into the howling March storm, the snow driving spitefully into his thin, pale face.

He was ushered by a servant into the drawing-room of the Chapman house, and when Metta came in, in response to his card she gave him a kind, though not a very cordial, welcome. They sat talking for some time, before he found an opportunity to introduce the errand that had brought him. A journal lying on the centre table attracted his notice, and picking it up he saw that it was the Weekly Reflector. He cared very little for religious literature, but knowing Metta's principles, he pretended to feel an interest in the journal. Suddenly, as he glanced absently over the list of contents, his eye caught the name of Heritage and his face darkened.

"Parted Lives," he said, "by Robert Heritage. I wonder who he is. I knew a man by that name once, but it is not likely that he would write a story. Some obscure scribbler I should suspect this man to be."

Metta blushed painfully.

"It is his first literary effort, I believe," she said, stiffly.

"Why, do you know him?"

"I have met him several times."

"I wonder whether he is the Robert Heritage who was once a student at the Mount Morrill University."

"Yes, I believe he is."

"And is he teaching at present in the public schools of Basseterre?"

"Yes."

"Then I do know him, but only slightly."

met him once at the college while on a visit there, and heard a good deal about him. And so he has taken to writing religious stories—Sunday-school literature, I suppose, judging from the initial chapter. Well, well! The unprincipled fellow! You never can trust these men who turn pious. Oh, excuse me," he said deprecatingly, "I am aware that there are many consistent Christians, but I'm sure Heritage is not one of them."

Metta's cheeks flamed, but she was too much disconcerted to stop her interlocutor's story.

"I must tell you about one of his escapades at college. Being a rather brilliant fellow, he won a good many friends among the ladies. There was one girl—a tall, beautiful brunette living about two miles out of town—whose affections he won, formed an engagement with her, promised to marry her as soon as he could provide a home, and then shamefully deserted her a short time before leaving college. I have seen her several times, once after his heartless defection, and I tell you it almost brought tears to my eyes to see the deathlike pallor of her thin face, which had once glowed so with health and beauty. Her heart was broken. Many persons knew about it. It is seldom one meets with more distressing circumstance. And to think that this man, this deceiver, has gone to prating about religion and writing religious books!"

"Do you know what the girl's name was?" asked Metta, in husky tones.

"It was Dolly Pressly; she lived about two miles east of Constans, on the Mavinger Pike. She was a girl of a good deal of talent."

"Have you ever heard what became of her?"

"I think she still lives with her parents. You seem surprised and a little incredulous. Oh, assure you the facts were well-known at Mount Morrill. You would not hear of them perhaps it was not a story for ladies, but you may depend your brother knows of it. Write and ask him if you have any doubt—that is if the story interests you."

Metta was in no mood for more conversation after this. She bade her visitor good-night and sought the retirement of her room. A terrible suspicion had entered her mind:

"That tall, wan girl, who stared at him so on the street at Constans was the girl he deceived and that was the reason he flushed so guiltily."

Metta's eyes were bedewed as her memory furnished the corroboration of Corrigan's story. Still, she did not like the narrator, and after all the story might not be as he had told it. Heritage did not have the manner of a man given to flirting. He seemed too serious and earnest in all he did and said. Why not test the thing a Corrigan had suggested? That night, for she felt the suspense was more than she could bear for a long time, she wrote to her brother and asked him if he knew of the affair, and if he could find out the exact and literal truth.

(To be Continued.)

EPITHEM TURNED TO ACCOUNT.
An evangelist was preaching in the open and a large audience had gathered, and med very much impressed, but just as he was inviting them, with all the earnestness which he was capable, to close with Christ, the young men swaggered up. "They are stylishly dressed," says the preacher, and I suppose would have called themselves gentlemen, but their conduct betokened they had no right to that honorable appellation. They at once began to disturb the meeting, and ridicule me. For some time I bore it quietly, but at last they became so offensive that I asked them to go away. This only caused them to redouble their abuse, and among other things they called me an ass, and the son of an ass. I stopped short in my address, and facing them I said: 'Yes I am like an ass spoken in the Bible. When Jesus wished to enter Jerusalem, and having neither horse nor ass of his own, He told two of His disciples to go to a certain cross-road, where they would find an ass tethered to a pole. That ass was to loosen and bring to Him, and when that ass Jesus rode into Jerusalem. A few years ago I was like that ass tethered to the pole at the cross-road. I was tied to the world. I was the world's and the devil's but Jesus sent a messenger of His who loosed me from the world, and brought me to Him. Since then I have been Christ's ready for whatever He wishes me to do. Now, young gentlemen, will you tell me whose asses are you, Christ's or Satan's?' They did not wait to give me an answer, and quickly left the place. Whose servant are you? You cannot be neutral. If you are not Christ's, then you are the devil's."

RECLAIMED BY KINDNESS.
An instance of what kindness will do to reclaim a man is related by the Rev. Mark H. Pearse. He says he remembers an instance of faithful kindness which had greatly impressed him as a lad. An official of one of the churches had used the Church money for his own purpose, and consequently lost his character, and was expelled from the church. He then, in his despair, plunged into all kinds of excesses. Everyone seemed to regard him as an outcast. While walking with his father down the street one Sunday morning, they met this poor forsaken man. His father immediately crossed the street and held out his hand and said, "How do you do, Mr. So-and-So?" The man could scarcely speak for emotion. His father then said, "It is a pleasant morning," and replied the man, "You don't look so well as formerly," he said, and made some other kind remarks. Immediately the father grasped Mr. Pearse's hand with both hands and said, "God bless you, sir; God bless you." That man went and sought the mercy of God and became a steadfast religious character. Now nothing had been said of his manner of life, nothing of the past or future, nothing about religion. But the father, which has so many tongues, had spoken kindness to him, in his neglected condition, touched his heart. A few years after that, Mr. Pearse was called to visit him on his dying bed, and the man then said, "It touches those kind words on that Sunday morning and that kindly shake of the hands that you gave me, Mr. Pearse."

THE CRUELITIES OF HEATHENISM.
In the Fiji Islands," says a returned missionary, "fifty years ago, it was customary to fatten young girls for the cannibal market. Worse than that, on the island of an African king, a river will even be turned from its course, a pit dug in, a score of slave women butchered at its edge and thrown in. Over these a tomb is erected, upon which another score of the wives of the death monarch are piled. Then the earth is shovelled upon the yet living, and the river turned back on its path-way. In India there are twenty millions of widows, half of whom are never been wives, because married in their eight years old or thereabouts, and the husbands have died while both were still children. England abolished the suttee, or burning of widows upon the funeral pile of husbands; but even this has left the miserable women to a cruel fate, for a widow is an object of supremest contempt. Unable to support herself, forbidden to marry again, reduced to the condition of a beast of burden, she is often driven to suicide as the only escape from unspeakable misery and wretchedness. Among the evils which curse women in India are child marriages, polygamy, an outcast widowhood, the horrible prevalence of licentiousness, the abject slavery of the harem and zenana. Any husband or father would rather his wife or daughter should die than be approached by a male physician, though her sickness would meet with easy recovery under such treatment. Thus horrible is the condition of women apart from Christianity, that surely every Christian city of ten thousand people should send at least one lady missionary, well trained in medicine. Only by Christian women can the women be reached! The agonies of female degradation in India, China, and Japan entail on us a fearful responsibility."

A LIFE AND DEATH GRASP.
Among the reminiscences of Rev. T. Champness is the following account of an accident which nearly terminated his life in his youth. He says: "My first occupation was in a mill in Manchester. A part of my duty was to give out stores. Cakes of tallow were needed for some kind of work, and for the sake of coolness these were kept in a sort of vault. Many a time I had gone down to fetch these tallow cakes; they were kept in an iron box, an old oven, if I remember rightly. There was a jet of gas kept lighted, but I was so familiar with the place, that I did not need to turn it up to the full. Often as I had been down, I had not noticed a sort of trap-door, over which I must have walked. One day a man had need to lift up the trap-door, which covered a well, and had gone away, leaving the door up. I came down, and hurried along, not seeing the opening, and so walked down, and was soon in the water. While struggling, my hand came in contact with an iron pipe, which, I think, once formed part of a pump. How I grasped it! And clinging to it with all my strength, I climbed up until I could see the tiny gas jet, and so knew that I was at the top. I tore my hands, but never let go the friendly pipe, or I should not have lived to tell the tale. I filled my hand with that which became my salvation! And so must all do who would be saved."

200,000

Estey Organs have been sold in the last fifty years.

An enormous number! No other Organ has been so popular. No other Organ has had such a sale.

We want to secure the best conception of 200,000 Organs. We ask some reader of this paper to give us an illustration of the number 200,000 which will show how great it is.

Here is one specimen illustration.

"If each organ cost $100, and payment was made in one cent copiers, these cents laid side by side, touching each other, would reach entirely around the world."

This is a good illustration. Perhaps you can do better. Will you not try?

ESTEY ORGAN CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

Branch Offices: 159 Tremont Street, Boston. 831 Broadway, New York. 18 North 7th Street, Philadelphia. State and Jackson Streets, Chicago. 916 Olive Street, St. Louis. Marietta and Broad Sts., Atlanta, Ga.

An interesting Book of Facts (containing 24 pages with 46 illustrations) entitled, How Large is 200,000, will be mailed free; one copy to one address.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING." SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

Sample Vial "RUBIFOAM" sent free by E. W. HOYT & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Dyspepsia

Makes many lives miserable, and often leads to self destruction. Distress after eating, sick headache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depression, etc., are caused by this very common and increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla tones the stomach, creates an appetite, promotes healthy digestion, relieves sick headache, clears the mind, and cures the most obstinate cases of dyspepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. In an hour after eating I would experience a faintness or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced. It relieved me of that faint, tired, all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better since I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am happy to recommend it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass. N. B. Be sure to get only

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

EVERY MOTHER

Should Have It in The House. Dropped on Sugar, Children Love to take JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cramps and Pains. Relieves all Summer Complaints, Cuts and Bruises like magic. Sold everywhere. Price 35c. by mail; 6 bottles Express paid, $2. L. S. JOHNSON & CO., Boston, Mass.

P.D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.!

Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

HIRES'

25c HIRES' IMPROVED 25c

ROOT BEER!

IN LIQUID. NO BOTTLING OR STRAINING EASILY MADE. THIS PACKAGE MAKES FIVE GALLONS.

ROOT BEER.

The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world. Delicious and Sparkling. TRY IT.

Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.

C. E. HIRES, PHILADELPHIA.

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

on your Boots and Shoes.

Sold by all Dealers.

FRUIT DIET is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 77 Broadway, New York City.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on 10cts.

If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

YOU CAN LAY BY $500 TO $1500

a year by working for us. You can't do it in any surer or simpler way no matter how you try. We furnish capital and pay liberally those who work either whole or part time. Stamp not required for answer. Jno. C. WINSTON & Co., Publrs., Philadelphia, Chicago, Kansas City.

BERCHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous illa. BERCHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

W. S. WYSE, DEAR SIR:—I was a sufferer from kidney disease for several years, and made every effort to obtain relief, but failed in every instance until I procured a bottle of Wyse's New Remedy. I took half of a bottle, which to my great delight relieved me of all the troublesome symptoms in a very short space of time. I am so much improved that I consider myself out of all danger, if not entirely cured of the disease. JAMES S. BARRON. 329 West 22d Street, New York.

TESTIMONIALS.
From AMOS J. CUMMINGS, member of Congress; Ex-Senator ALBERT DAGGETT; Ex-Police Commissioner DEWITT C. WHEELER, and others. Sent free by mail.

WYSE'S NEW REMEDY FOR DISEASES OF THE KIDNEYS AND LIVER.

WYSE'S NEW REMEDY
Has become celebrated for the successful treatment and cure of the following diseases: Diabetes, Bright's Disease, Brickdust Deposits, Mucous Inflammation of the Kidneys and Bladder, Pain in the Back, Weak Kidneys, Retention of Urine, Gleet, Gravel and all diseases affecting the Urinary Organs.

WYSE NEW REMEDY COMPANY, PROPRIETORS,
157 W. 23d St., New York.
For sale by all druggists. Sent by express on receipt of One Dollar. Mention this paper.

LOVELY WOMAN!

HOW CAN YOU TOLERATE Freckles, Pimples, Blackheads, Yellow or Muddy Skin, Moth, Wrinkles, Red Nose or any other form of facial disfigurements when, by using Dr. Ammett's French Arsenic Complexion Wafers, you can possess a beautiful form, brilliant eyes, and lovely complexion. Perfectly harmless, and the only positive beautifier of the skin and form. $1.00 per box by mail or by express. Fulton Mfg. Co., 72 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

RUPTURE CURED

with our Improved Elastic Truss worn with ease night and day, retains the rupture under the hardest exercise or severest strain. Send for pamphlet. IMPROVED ELASTIC TRUSS CO., 822 & 824 Broadway, Cor. 12th St., New York.

BAILEY'S

Compound light-spreading Silver-plated Corrugated Glass REFLECTORS

A wonderful invention for lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.

BAILEY REFLECTOR CO., 708 Penn Ave. Pittsburgh, Pa.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores, and Residences. ARTISTIC

H. S. NORTHROP, 18 Rose Street, New York.

HOW TO BUILD A HOUSE.

If you are thinking about building a house, you should send 25 cents for my new book containing plans and specifications for 25 houses, all sizes, from 2 rooms up, costing from $300 to $5,000. A book of great value to all who desire to build a house, and will suit you almost as well as if you paid $5 for a book. Sent post-paid on receipt of 25 cents. Address J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 67 ROSE ST., New York.

MEN WANTED.
Great Inducements. Outfit free. Address, J. AUSTIN SHAW, Nurseryman, Brooklyn, New York.

VanHouten's Cocoa

"BEST & GOES FARTHEST."

The purest, most soluble, the original cocoa. Invented, patented and made in Holland. Delicious, stimulating, nutritious, much better for the nerves than tea and coffee. Ask for VAN HOUTEN'S, take no other. [6]

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Talmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly taught, by mail or personally. Situations procured all pupils when competent. Send for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oswego, N.Y.

"ONE LESS AT HOME."

One less at home!

The charmed circle broken—a dear face
Missed day by day from its accustomed place,
But cleansed and saved and perfected by grace!
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

One voice of welcome hushed, and evermore
One word of farewell spoken; on the shore
Where parting comes not, one soul lauded more—
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

Chill as the earth-born mist the thought would rise
And wrap our footsteps round and dim our eyes,
But the bright sunbeam darteth from the skies—
One more in heaven!

One more at home!

This is not home, where cramped in earthly mould
Our sight of Christ is dim, our love is cold,
But there, where face to face we shall behold,
Is home and heaven!

One less on earth!

Its pains, its sorrows, and its toils to share,
One less the pilgrim's daily cross to bear,
One more the crown of ransomed souls to wear
At home in heaven!

One more in heaven!

Another thought to brighten cloudy days,
Another theme of thankfulness and praise,
Another link on high our souls to raise
To home and heaven!

One more at home!

That home where separation cannot be,
That home where none are missed eternally,
Lord Jesus, grant us all a place with Thee
At home in heaven!

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.
will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets
assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

If you have made up your mind to buy Hood's Sarsaparilla, do not be persuaded to take any other. Be sure to get Hood's Sarsaparilla, which possesses peculiar strength and curative power.

THE BAILEY REFLECTORS have been in use in churches, halls, &c., throughout the country for years and have given universal satisfaction. They are made in handsome and unique designs and are in keeping with the most elaborate interior furnishings. The reflector is made of Bailey's compound light-spreading, silver-plated, corrugated glass, which gives an unusually powerful light, and is at the same time the most economical reflector made whether you use gas or oil. Before adopting any system of lighting your building write to Bailey Reflector Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., for their catalogue. See advertisement in another column.

AN EMPLOYER'S REMORSE.

DURING a recent discussion of the Temperance Question, a gentleman remarked that he had a right to do as he chose about signing the pledge. He could drink in moderation and there was no need for him to become a total abstainer, and it was not the concern of any one else whether he was one or not. Among the company was an Englishman, who had been a manufacturer of cutlery in Sheffield. He asked permission to relate an incident bearing on the question. He said:

When I was in business I had drays which went about the town collecting ingots of steel, to be hammered to the sizes wanted.
On the principal dray there was a man who professed great devotion to me. He used to say that if he saw me in danger he would willingly lay down his own life to secure my safety. At that time I was a total abstainer, but had not signed the pledge. This drayman was not temperate in his drinking and often I spoke to him about his failing, but I felt I could not ask him to take the pledge when I myself would not take it. I could only reason with him, though I knew nothing but pledged total abstinence could do him any good. To ask a man like him to drink moderately was nonsense. One day he was coming home with a ton of steel on his dray. He stopped outside a saloon, into which he went to have a drink. Coming out, he seized the reins and told the horse to go on, then attempted to jump on the side, as is the usual way with carters; but he was too drunk to do so, and slipping off the dray, he fell on the street, and a wheel passed over his leg. He was taken to the infirmary, and in a week was in his grave.

He was a victim of drink, and doubly so;
for not only was it the cause of his accident, but he could have recovered from it if he had not been a heavy drinker. But his system was so saturated with alcohol that inflammation ensued, and that killed him.
And all this might have been avoided if only I had been a pledged abstainer; for if I had signed and then requested him to do as I had done, my influence, backed by my example, would have caused him to do so. We who are Christians should see that, neither passively or actively, by our omission or commission, we do anything that may cause our brother to stumble.

A DYING REQUEST.

A TOUCHING story of the power of sympathy is told by an evangelist. A fallen girl in New York, called Wild Maggie, had frequently attended the service of the City Missions, and Mr. M., the superintendent, had obtained considerable influence over her, but not sufficient to lead to reformation. After being missing for some time,
Mr. M. heard that she was in the Bellevue Hospital, dying of consumption. He visited her several times, to her great joy. The last time, a little before her death, both had conversed as if they should see each other no more. "Mr. M., I'm dying," said she,
"I shall never see you again. Would you —be willing—to stoop down—and kiss—my forehead?" "Most certainly, my child," was the reply. And he reverently kissed the face of the dying child. "Thank God," said she, "if men on earth can so forgive, why should I not trust my Father in heaven?" When she died she asked that, in being prepared for burial, the place where the parting kiss had been given her should not be washed, but left untouched. "You know," said the nurse, "we could not refuse her, poor thing!"

A MISTAKEN KINDNESS.

In an address at a recent meeting of Christian workers, the Rev. James Wells said he felt it his duty to put every one on his guard against mistaken notions of hospitality. He quoted the following case in point: "A man of business in our city lately died a dipsomaniac. I knew him well.
A few years before, after a sad break down,
he retired to a quiet corner in the country,
fully resolved to make a fresh start. There, he met a gentleman, a member of the same church, who occasionally requested him to have some wine. At first he refused, but ultimately, when urged to be sociable, he succumbed, thinking there could not be much harm in taking just a little in such company. That started him again on the down grade of intemperance, and though he repeatedly attempted to pull himself up, he never could do so, and the end was a drunkard's grave. I also knew the man whose mistaken hospitality in urging his friend to partake of wine, had torn the crutch of total abstinence from the poor man who was striving to hobble from the abyss of drink.
I told him all I knew, and he at once said,
"Had I known these facts I would never have urged him to drink wine." That gentleman is now a total abstainer. How many in ignorance or thoughtlessness have put a stumbling-block in their neighbor's way, and it may be, have caused their brother to stumble and fall."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

AGENTS WANTED.—Reliable man or woman to sell our patents in every county in the United States. Just out, retail for 25 cents to $6. $75 to $250 a month made for working for us. Address with stamp,
C. E. Swartzbaugh & Co., Findlay, O.

BOUNTING BILLOWS

ON THE SEA,

or the pure Mountain Breezes will soon invite your presence. Make your leisure twice the pleasure,
by taking along our entertaining music.

(If you have no Guitar, Mandolin, Banjo, Flute or Violin, call or send for lists of fine instruments at our branch store, J. C. HAYNES & Co., 33 Court Street, Boston.)

OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Price, $1.00. Arranged for Piano.

YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLEC-TION. 51 very easy and very good pieces. Price, $1.00.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. 38
beautiful Melodies, finely arranged. Price $1.

Vol. 2 of Miss Eleanor W. Everest's ALBUM OF SONGS. 12 first-class Songs by the best authors.
Price $1.

COLLEGE SONGS. New, enlarged edition. 82
jolly Songs. 300,000 sold. Price 50 cents.

OLD FAMILIAR DANCES. For the Piano.
100 of them. Easy, and as merry as they can be.
50 cents.

FOR MUSIC FESTIVALS.

THE ATLAS. By Carl Zerrahn. 29 splendid Choruses. Sacred and Secular. Most of them
quite new. $1.

Any book mailed for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.

C. H. DITSON & Co., 367 Broadway, New York.

PIANOS $150 to $1500

UNIVERSITY

ESTAB. 1850. INCOR. 1877

PRICE They Lead the World!

Sent for trial in your own home.

Absolutely Perfect

Guaranteed Six Years.

Don't Buy a Poor Piano!

Cat. Free.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.

235 E. 21st St. N.Y.

ORGANS $35 to $500

TERSE and TIMELY.

Diabolos and His Demons.

By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 20 cents.
A Scriptural exposition of an important subject.
Most suitable for the present time. Should be read, pondered, considered, and consulted by all classes. Demonology is an alarming fact. No person should read of Satan's agencies and remain indifferent. There is great curiosity for the supernatural, and in this book such will find food for reflection.

The Spiritual Man.

By Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents.
$5.00 per hundred.
A Biblical Expository Lecture delivered at one of the Northfield conventions under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody.
"This pamphlet contains important teaching as
to the natural and spiritual—the man born of the flesh, and the new man in Christ Jesus."—The Christian (London).

The Royal Priest.

As typified in Melchizedek and Aaron. By Mrs. Geo. C. Needham. Price, 10 cents
each. $5.00 per hundred.
Melchizedek has always been one of the mysterious characters in the Old Testament. His life is seen in its true light when applied typically, as is done in this pamphlet.
Sent post-paid to any address on receipt of price.
Address, ALBERT NEEDHAM, Publisher,
Manchester, Mass.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

CHANCE FOR ALL

To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect
Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 35 pounds of Fine Tea, either
Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpow-
der, Young Hyson, Mixed, English
Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent
by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea
you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

"Demonology or Spiritualism, Ancient and Modern." "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures.—History facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1.
Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

CHOICE LEAFLETS To inclose in letters, or for distribution.
Sample packet of 50
leaflets (no two alike) will be sent postpaid for 10 cts; 100 for 20 cts, or 150 for 30 cts. Special price on orders of 1,000 or over. J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

OUR

MIDSUMMER STOCK-TAKING SALE OF

SILKS,

In our Departments on the Main Floor and in the Basement, will commence on Monday, June 23.

Seasonable and desirable assortment of Silk Fabrics will be offered, daily at prices that are designed to secure complete disposal of our Spring and Summer Stock before the Inventory.

Ladies desiring such fashionable and useful Fabrics as Washing Silks, Indian and China Silks, Surahs, Louisiennes in both Plain and Fancy, Black and Colored Silks, Velvets, etc., will find this a very interesting opportunity.

James McCreery & Co.

Broadway, cor. Eleventh St.,
NEW YORK.100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY
DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses

Patented
1879-1885
1885-1886

No one using a Chart or Square complete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting So Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, in Form, Follows every Fashion. A vent as Useful as the Sewing machine.
Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.
THE McDOWELL CO.
6 West 14th Street, New York

We know the advertiser to be thoroughly reliable, and that machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

ASK FOR "GLOVE THUMB"

"Retrograde" Seamed Mitt

THE VERY BEST MADE. Kept by all Large Dealers

JUST PUBLISHED.

THREE CHOICE BOOKLETS.

No. 1. "THY WILL."

A beautiful poem of submission.

By JEAN S. FIGOTT.

"Teach me to do thy will, for Thou art my God."

"Beneath the splendor of Thy choirs, Thy perfect choice for me, I rest."

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

No. 2. "I SHALL BE SATISFIED."

A poem of contentment.
"Far out of sight, while yet the flesh enfolds us Lies the fair country where our hearts abide."

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

No. 3. "ONE LESS AT HOME."

A poem of sweet comfort for those who have dear friends.

"One less at home!

The charmed circle broken—a dear face
Missed day by day from its accustomed place,
But cleansed and saved, and perfected by grace!
One more in Heaven!"

18 pages. Silk-tied. In titled envelope.

Each of the above are printed with handsome on extra heavy bristol board, 18 pages, with a delicately tinted on each page, silk-tied, and enclosed in titled envelope. Sent post-paid for 20 cents each, the three together for 50 cts.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York

"MY MISTAKE," by A. J. Anderson (formerly a Christian Scientist). 5 cts. in paper; 10 cts.
cloth. Address Mrs. E. M. WHITTEMORE, 723 E.
Ave., New York. The proceeds of the sale of this book will be devoted to a Home in this City for Girls. Every one should read it, and particularly those who are under the influence of such an error.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

XIII., No. 29. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 16, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

OCEAN GROVE: ITS PRESIDENT, ITS HISTORY AND ITS WORK.
MEETING IN HEAVEN. Dr. Talmage's Sermon at Waseca, Minn.
WASTER'S FRIEND. A Story of the S. S. Text.
THREE JUDGMENTS. By Rev. Charles Graham.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Carlyle's Prayer, Etc.
LOST AND FOUND. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF THE LATE GEN. FISK.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: An Extraordinary Journey of Two Girl Tramps, Etc.
A SUNDAY AMONG THE MORAVIANS. By Viator.
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MRS. AMANDA SMITH.

THE REVELATION OF LOVE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
PICTURE OF TRINIDAD.
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)
A Name for a Text—A Surly Host Saved—A Captain Enlightened—A Chain of Influence, Etc.

OCEAN GROVE CAMP MEETING GROUNDS.

Rev. E. H. Stokes, D. D.—2. His Residence—3. Lake Pathway—4. Tent Life—5. Model of Modern Jerusalem—6. The Auditorium—7. A Surf Meeting—8. Memorial Vase—9. The Young People's Temple.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

Preached at an open-air service at Waseca, Minn.
OUR MEETING IN HEAVEN.

"I shall go to him." II. Sam. 12: 23.

Sickness in the King's Palace—A Question in which Millions are Interested—Recognition in Heaven—A Certainty—The Hypothesis—The Bible Assumes It—The Patriarchs with their People—Christ's Assurance to Martha—The Memory not Obliterated at Death—The World's Expectancy—An Intuition God Implanted—The Recognizable Features of the Soul—A Necessity of Grateful Impulse—A New Jersey Pastor's Labors Acknowledged—Recognitions in Dying Mementos—A Child's Delighted Exclamation—What Heaven is Like—The New Addition to the Home Circle—What Death is with a Believer.

THERE is a very sick child in the abode of David the king. Disease, which stalks up the dark lane of the poor and puts its smothering hand on the lip and nostril of the wan and wasted, also mounts the palace-stairs, and bending over the pillow blows into the face of a young prince the frosts of pain and death. Tears are wine to the King of Terrors. Alas! for David the king. He can neither sleep nor eat, and lies prostrate on his face, weeping and wailing until the palace rings with the outcry of woe.

What are courtly attendants, or victorious armies, or conquered provinces, under such circumstances? What to any parent is all splendor surrounding when his child is sick? Seven days have passed on. Then in that great house, two eyelids are gently closed, two little hands folded, two little feet quiet, one heart still. The servants come to bear the tidings to the king, but they cannot make up their minds to tell him, and they stand at the door whispering about the matter, and David hears them and he looks up and says to them, "Is the child dead?" "Yes, he is dead." David rouses himself up, washes himself, puts on new apparel, and sits down to food. What power hushed that tempest? What strength was it that lifted up that king whom grief had dethroned? Oh, it was the thought that he would come again into the possession of that darling child. No grave-digger's spade could hide him. The wintry blasts of death could not put out the bright light. There would be a forge somewhere that with silver hammer would Weld the Broken Links.

In a city where the hoofs of the pale horse never strike the pavement he would clasp his lost treasure. He wipes away the tears from his eyes, and he clears the choking grief from his throat, and exclaims, "I shall go to him."

Was David right or wrong? If we part on earth will we meet again in the next world? "Well," says some one, "that seems to be an impossibility. Heaven is so large a place we never could find our kindred there." Going into some city, without having appointed a time and place for meeting, you might wander around for weeks and for months, and perhaps for years, and never see each other; and heaven is vaster than all earthly cities together, and how are you going to find your departed friend in that country? It is so vast a realm. John went up on one mountain of inspiration, and he looked off upon the multitude, and he said, "Thousands of thousands." Then he came upon a greater altitude of inspiration and looked off upon it again, and he said, "Ten thousand times ten thousand." And then he came on a higher mount of inspiration, and looked off again, and he said, "A hundred and forty and four thousand and thousands of thousands." And he came on a still greater height of inspiration, and he looked off again, and exclaimed: "A great multitude that no man can number." Now I ask, how are you going to find your friends in such a throng as that? Is not this idea we have been entertaining after all a falsity? Is this doctrine of future recognition of friends in heaven a guess, a myth, a whim, or is it a granitic foundation upon which the soul pierced of all ages may build a glorious hope? Intense question! Every heart in this audience throbs right into it. There is in every soul here the tomb of at least one dead.

Tremendous question! It makes the lip quiver, and the cheek flush, and the entire nature thrill: Shall we know each other there? I get letters almost every month asking me to discuss this subject. I get a letter in a bold scholarly hand, on gilt-edged paper, asking me to discuss this question, and I say, "Ah! that is a curious man, and he wants a curious question solved." But I get another letter. It is written with a trembling hand, and on what seems to be a torn-out leaf of a book, and here and there is the mark of a tear; and I say, "Oh, that is a broken heart and it wants comfort."

The object of this sermon is to take this theory out of the region of surmise and speculation into the region of Positive Certainty.

People say, "It would be very pleasant if it were true. I hope it may be true. Perhaps it is true. I wish it were true." But I believe that I can bring an accumulation of argument to bear upon this matter which will prove the doctrine of future recognition as plainly as that there is any heaven at all, and that the kiss of reunion at the celestial gate will be as certain as the dying kiss at the door of the sepulchre.

Now, when you are going to build a ship you must get the right kind of timber. You lay the keel and make the framework of the very best materials, the keelson, stanchions, plank-shear, counter-timber-knee, transoms, all of solid oak. You may build a ship of lighter material, but when the cyclone comes on, it will go down. Now we may have a great many beautiful theories about the future world, built out of our own fancy, and they may do very well as long as we have smooth sailing in the world; but when the storms of sorrow come upon us, and the hurricane of death, we will be swamped—we will be foundered. We want a theory built out of the solid oak of God's eternal Word.

Assumed in the Bible.

The doctrine of future recognition is not so often positively stated in the Word of God as implied, and you know, my friends that that is, after all, the strongest mode of affirmation. Your friend travels in foreign lands. He comes home. He does not begin by arguing with you to prove that there are such places as London and Stockholm and Paris and Dresden and Berlin but his conversation implies it. And so this Bible does not so positively state this theory as, all up and down its chapters, take it for granted. What does my text imply? "I shall go to him." What consolation would it be to David to go to his child if he would not know him? Would David have been allowed to record this anticipation for the inspection of all ages if it were a groundless anticipation? We read in the first book of the Bible, Abraham died and was gathered to his people. Jacob died and was gathered to his people. Moses died and was gathered to his people. What people? Why, their friends, their comrades, their old companions. Of course it means that. It cannot mean anything else. So in the very beginning of the Bible four times that is taken for granted. The whole New Testament is an arbor over which this doctrine creeps like a luxuriant vine full of the purple Clusters of Consolation.

James, John, and Peter followed Christ to the mountain. A light falls on that mountain and lifts it into the glories of the celestial. Christ's garments glow and His face shines like the sun. The door of heaven swings open. Two spirits come down and alight on that mountain. The disciples look at them and recognize them as Moses and Elias. Now, if those disciples standing on the earth could recognize these two spirits who had been for centuries in heaven, do you tell me that we, with our heavenly eyesight, will not be able to recognize those who have gone out from among us only five, ten, twenty, thirty years ago?

The Bible indicates, over and over again, that the angels know each other; and then the Bible says that we are to be higher than the angels, and if the angels have the power of recognition, shall not we, who are to be higher than they in the next realm, have as good eyesight and as good capacity? What did Christ mean in His conversation with Mary and Martha, when He said, "Thy brother shall rise again?" It was as much as to say, "Don't cry. Don't wear yourselves out with this trouble. You will see him again. Thy brother shall rise again." The Bible describes heaven as a great home circle. Well, now, that would be a very queer home circle where the members did not know each other. The Bible describes death as sleep. If we know each other before we go to sleep, shall we not know each other after we wake up? Oh, yes. We will know each other a great deal better than now: "for now," says the apostle, "We see through a glass darkly, but then face to face." It will be my purified, enthroned, and glorified body gazing on your purified, enthroned and glorified body.

Now, I demand, if you believe the Bible, that you take this theory of future recognition out of the realm of speculation and surmise into the region of positive certainty, and no more keep saying, "I hope it is so; I have an idea it is so; I guess it is so." Be able to say, with all the concentrated energy of body, mind and soul, I know it is so.

There are, in addition to these Bible arguments, other reasons

Why I Accept This Theory.

In the first place, because the rejection of it implies the entire obliteration of our memory. Can it be possible that we shall forget forever those with whose walk, look, manner we have been so long familiar? Will death come with a sharp, keen blade hew away this faculty of memory? Abraham said to Dives, "Son, remember." If the exiled, and lost remember will not the enthroned remember? You know very well that our joy in any circumstance is augmented by the companionship of our friends. We want some one beside us with whom to exchange glances and sympathies; and I suppose the joy of heaven is to be augmented by the fact that we are to have our friends with us when there rise before us the thrones of the blessed, and when there surges up in our ears the jubilate of the saved. Heaven is not a contraction, it is an expansion. If I know you here, I will know you better there. Here I see you with only two eyes, but there the soul shall have a million eyes. It will be immortal gazing on immortality—ransomed spirit in colloquy with ransomed spirit—victor beside victor. When John Evans, the Scotch minister was seated in his study, his wife came in and said to him, "My dear do you think we will know each other in heaven?" He turned to her and said, "My dear, do you think we will be bigger fools in heaven than we are here?"

Again: I accept this doctrine of future recognition because

The World's Expectancy Affirms It.

In all lands and ages this theory is received. What form of religion planted it? No form of religion, for it is received under all forms of religion. Then, I argue, a sentiment, a feeling, an anticipation, universally planted, must have been God-implanted, and if God-implanted, it rightfully implanted. Socrates writes: "We would not part with a great deal to purchase meeting with Orpheus and Homer? If it be true that this is to be the consequence of death I could even be able to die often." Among the Danes, when a master dies his servant sometimes stabs himself that he may serve his master in the future world. Cicero, living before Christ's coming, said, "Oh glorious day when I shall retire from this low and sordid scene, to associate with the divine assemblage of departed spirits, and not only with the one I have just now mentioned, but with my dear Cato, the best of sons and most faithful of men. I seemed to bear his death with fortitude, it was by no means that I did not most sensibly feel the loss I had sustained. It was because I was supported by the consoling reflection that I could not long be separated." The Norwegians believe it. The Indians believe it. The Greek lander believes it. The Swiss believes it. The believes it. Under every sky, by every in every zone, the theory is adopted; and say a principle universally implanted must od-implanted, and hence a right belief. ain: I adopt this theory because there are res of moral temperament and features of soul that will distinguish us forever. How e know each other in this world? Is it ly by the color of the eye, or the length of air, or the facial proportions? Oh, no. y the disposition as well, by the word in the very best sense and n the bad sense; and if in the dust our should perish and lie there forever, and should be no resurrection, still the soul has h features and the disposition has enough es to make us distinguishable. I can un- and how in sickness a man will become so ous that he will not know his own friends; will we be blasted with such insufferable r, that, standing beside our best friends for ernity, we will never guess who they are? ain: I think that one reason why we ought ept this doctrine is because we never in world have an opportunity to give thanks ose to whom we are spiritually indebted. oy of heaven, we are told, is to be inaugur- y a review of life's work. These Christian and women who have been toiling for t, have they seen the full result of their ? Oh, no. In the church at Somerville, Jersey, John Vredenburg preached for a many years. He felt that his ministry was re, and others felt so, although he was a ul minister preaching the Gospel all the He died, and vent home to God; for no one ever doubt- at John Vredenburg was a good Christian ter. A little while after his death there a great awakening in Somerville, and one th two hundred souls stood up at the tian altar espousing the cause of Christ, g them my own father and mother. And was peculiar in regard to nearly all of two hundred souls was that they dated religious impressions from the ministry in Vredenburg. Will that good Christian before the throne of God never meet those brought to Christ through his instrument-

Natural Affinity,

Died Amid Discouragements,

Oh, of course he will know them. I re- ber one Sabbath afternoon, borne down a sense of my sins and knowing not God, t up Doddridge's Rise and Progress. Oh, a dark afternoon it was, and I read the ers, and I read the prayers, and I tried to the prayers my own. Oh, I must see Doddridge. A glorious old book he wrote!

out of fashion now. ere is a mother before the throne of God. say her joy is full. Is it? You say there e no augmentation of it. Cannot there be? on was a wanderer and a vagabond on the when that good mother died. He broke old heart. She died leaving him in the rness of sin. She is before the throne of ow. Years pass and that son repents of imes and gives his heart to God and be- a useful Christian, and dies and enters ates of heaven. You tell me that that er's joy cannot be augmented. Let them ont each other—

The Son and the Mother.

she says to the angels of God, "rejoice ne! The dead is alive again, and the lost nd. Hallelujah! I never expected to see ost one come back."

Bible says nations are to be born in a day. China comes to God will it not know Dr. ? When India comes will it not know Dr. Scudder? When the Indians come to God ey not know David Brainard? e a soul entering heaven at last, with cov- ace at the idea that it has done so little hrist, and feeling borne down with un- iness, and it says to itself, "I have no to be here." A voice from a throne says, you forget that Sunday-school class you d to Christ! I was one of them." And another voice says, "You forget that poor man to whom you gave a loaf of bread, and told of the heavenly bread. I was that man." And another says, "You forget that sick one to whom you gave medicine for the body and the soul. I was that one." And then Christ, from a throne overtopping all the rest, will say, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, you did it to me." And then the seraphs will take their harps from the side of the throne, and cry, "What song shall it be?" And Christ, bending over the harpers, shall say, "It shall be the Harvest Home!"

One more reason why I am disposed to accept this doctrine of the future recognition is that so many in their last hour on earth have confirmed this theory. I speak not of persons who have been delirious in their last moment and knew not what they were about, but of persons who died in calmness and placidity, and who were not naturally superstitious. Often the glories of heaven have struck the dying pillow, and the departing man has said those who had gone from him. How often it is in the dying moments parents see their departed children and children see their departed parents! I came down to the banks of the Mohawk River. It was evening, and I wanted to go over the river, and so I waved my hat and shouted, and after awhile I saw someone waving on the opposite bank, and I heard him shout, and the boat came across, and I got in and was transported. And so I suppose it will be in the evening of our life. We will come down to the river of death and give a signal to our friends on the other shore, and they will give a signal back to us, and the boat comes, and our departed kindred are the oarsmen, the fires of the setting day tingeing the tops of the paddles.

He Saw and Heard

Oh, have you never sat by such a deathbed? In that hour you hear the departing soul cry, "Hark! look!" You hearkened and you looked. A little child pining away because of the death of its mother, getting weaker and weaker every day, was taken into the room where hung the picture of her mother. She seemed to enjoy looking at it, and then she was taken away, and after awhile died. In the last moment that wan and wasted little one lifted her hands, while her face lighted up with the glory of the next world, and cried out, "Mother!" You tell me she did not see her mother? She did. So in my first settlement at Belleville a plain man said to me. "What do you think I heard last night? I was in the room where one of my neighbors was dying. He was a good man, and he said of God singing before the throne. I haven't much poetry about me, but I listened and I heard them too." Said I, "I have no doubt of it." Why, we are to be taken up to heaven at last by ministering spirits. Who are they to be? souls that went up from Madras, or Antioch, or Jerusalem? Oh, no; our glorified kindred are going to troop around us.

He Heard the Angels

Heaven is not a stately, formal place, as I sometimes hear it described, a very frigidity of splendor, where people stand on cold formalities and go around about with heavy crowns of gold on their heads. No, that is not my idea of heaven. My idea of heaven is more like this: You are seated in the evening-tide by the fire-place, your whole family there, or nearly all of them there. While you are seated talking and enjoying the evening hour, there is a knock at the door and the door opens, and there comes in a brother that has been long absent. He has been absent for years, you have not seen him, and no sooner do you make up your mind that it is certainly he, than you leap up, and the question is who shall give him the first embrace. That is my idea of heaven—a great home circle where they are waiting for us. Oh, will you not know your mother's voice there? She who always called you by your first name long after others had given you the formal "Mister"? Will you not know your child's voice? She of the bright eye, and the ruddy cheek, and the quiet step, who came in from play and flung herself into your lap, a very shower of mirth and beauty? Why, the picture is graven in your soul. It cannot wear out. If that little one should stand on the other side of some heavenly hill and call to you, you would hear her voice above the burst of heaven's great orchestra. Know it? You could not help but know it.

Now I bring you this glorious consolation of future recognition. If you could get this theory into your heart it would lift a great many shadows that are stretching across it. When I was a lad I used to go out to the railroad-track and put my ear down on the track, and I could hear the express train rumbling miles away, and coming on: and to-day, my friends, if we only had faith enough we could put our ear down to the grave of our dead, and listen and hear in the distance the rumbling on of the chariots of resurrection victory. O heaven! Sweet heaven! You do not spell heaven as you used to spell it. You used to spell it h-e-a-v-e-n, heaven. But now when you want to spell that word you place side by side the faces of the loved ones who are gone, and in that irradiation of light and love, and beauty and joy, you spell it out as never before, in songs and hallelujahs.

Oh, ye whose hearts are down under the sod of the cemetery, cheer up at the thought of this reunion! Oh! how much you will have to tell them when once you meet them! How much you have been through since you saw them last! On the shining shore

You Will Talk it All Over.

The heartaches. The loneliness. The sleepless nights. The weeping until you had no more power to weep, because the heart was withered and dried up. Story of vacant chair, and empty cradle, and little shoe only half worn out, never to be worn again, just the shape of the foot that once pressed it. Talking it all over, walking in the light. No sorrow, no tears, no death. Oh, heaven! beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are. Heaven where we expect to be.

In the East they take a cage of birds and bring it to the tomb of the dead, and then they open the door of the cage, and the birds, flying out, sing. And I would to-day bring a cage of Christian consolations to the grave of your loved ones, and I would open the door and let them fill all the air with the music of their voices. Oh, how they bound in these spirits before the throne! They quiver with excessive gladness. They gaze on each other. They weave their joy into garlands, they spring it into triumphal arches, they strike it on timbrels, and then all the loved ones gather in a great circle around the throne of God—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters, lovers and friends, hand to hand around about the the throne of God—the circle ever widening—hand to hand, joy to joy, jubilee to jubilee, victory to victory, "until the day break and the shadows flee away."

What Death Is.

Oh, how different it is on earth from the way it is in heaven when a Christian dies! We say "close his eyes." In heaven they say, "Give him a palm." On earth we say, "Let him down in the ground." In heaven they say, "Raise him on a throne." On earth it is, "Farewell, farewell." In heaven it is, "Welcome, welcome." And so I see a Christian soul coming down to the river of death, and he steps into the river, and the water comes to the ankle. He says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No" says Christ, "this is not death." And he wades still deeper down into the waters until the flood comes to the knee, and he says, "Lord Jesus, tell me, tell me, is this death?" And Christ says, "No, no, this is not death." And he wades still further down until the wave comes to the girdle and the soul says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." And deeper in wades the soul till the billow strikes the lip, and the departing one cries, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." But when Christ has lifted that soul on a throne of glory, and the pomp and joy of heaven came surging to its feet, then Christ said, "THIS OH TRANSPORTED SOUL! THIS IS DEATH!"

OCEAN GROVE:

ITS PRESIDENT, ITS HISTORY AND ITS WORK.

The Object of the Association—Its Origin—The Initial Meeting in a Tent—Criticism of the Project—Its Charter Obtained—Its Success—A First-class Summer Resort—Dr. Stokes and his Labors—The Religious Meetings—Mr. Yatman's Beneficent Work—Other Features—The Prototype.

The phenomenal development of Ocean Grove, and the great religious movement it represents, clearly demonstrate the practicability of successfully establishing, under the blessing of God, for the residents of our populous centres, summer resorts affording them superior advantages in the shape of pure air, beautiful scenery, excellent water, and pastoral quiet—the whole forming the happy combination of Ocean and Grove, as indicated in the title,—with every possible encouragement and opportunity to worship God and serve Him in spirit and in truth, insuring at the same time, absolute immunity from overt desecration of the Lord's day and the terrible evils of the liquor traffic. It proves, too, that the Christian men and women of our day are sufficiently in earnest in their desire for growth in grace, to liberally support an enterprise designed to provide them with the opportunity of spiritual development, simultaneously with physical recuperation. The annual vacation is now recognized as a necessity by the business man, weary with the toils of the year, and by his wife who has borne the monotonous burden of domestic cares. The question was whether the number who would prefer to spend their vacation in an atmosphere of piety, apart from the worldly pleasures and frivolities of the ordinary summer resort, was large enough to support a distinctively religious watering place. The answer furnished by the prosperity of Ocean Grove is as unequivocal as it is gratifying. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in other sections of the country, who have not an opportunity of visiting this now famous place, will be glad to see the pictures of it which appear this week on the first page, and to have a brief account of its history and present development.

The Origin

of the movement, which has now attained its legal majority of twenty-one years, was as unostentatious as the origins of great movements usually are. In 1869, when Ocean Grove differed but little from any other stretch of sea-coast, a lady who was passing her vacation there, suggested to her husband that a religious service should be held in their tent. He acquiesced, and invited a few friends; and the Rev. E. H. Stokes D. D., the Presiding Elder of the District, was asked to deliver an address. It was a solemn service and it had momentous results. Dr. Stokes chose for his text the first words of the Bible, "In the beginning, God." Those words have now become the appropriate motto of the community, suggesting the thought, which is the essence of Ocean Grove life, that God is before all, in supremacy as well as in priority of time. A few months after this service the idea then conceived had taken shape. Thirteen ministers and thirteen laymen obtained a charter from the Legislature of New Jersey, under the title of "The Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association," binding themselves in solemn covenant to use the land it acquired, for sacred uses with a single eye to the Divine glory.

When the project became known it was made the subject of ridicule by the secular press, and the churches doubted whether the idea could be successfully realized. Some thought the meetings would be neglected for the bathing and the rambles on the beach. Others thought that it would prove a financial failure. But the promoters had strong faith in God and in the people, and they went on with their work. With remarkable sagacity and keen business foresight they planned the new town and, as the numbers of those who resorted to it have increased year by year, they have adopted the latest improvements to increase their temporal comfort. The management has kept pace with the demand upon its resources and the ideal of its originators has been fully realized.

There is no sign that Ocean Grove has ceased, or even paused, in its development, but it can never be more perfect than it is to-day in its adaptation to the needs of its visitors. It has over twelve hundred buildings, the majority of which have all the appliances of modern civilization. An Artesian water-system with over twelve miles of water-mains assures the resident of pure water in abundance. The streets are lighted by electricity supplied by the most improved plant and thirty miles of wire. Post-office, police, fire-brigade, hotel accommodation and stores, are all in efficient operation. The city man may stay there and gain health without missing any of the facilities to which he has been accustomed. In addition, special care has been taken to preserve the high morality of the resort. There is not a liquor saloon, nor a cigar-store within its boundaries, and there is conspicuous absence of the temptations which have to be shunned elsewhere. The fact that the receipts last year were $107,000, shows that it has lived and thrived as a moral community.

The Presiding Officer,

Dr. E. H. Stokes, whose portrait, and a picture of his house appear on the first page, deserves much of the credit for this unique success. He has toiled indefatigably in the cause, and has brought to bear upon it remarkable tact and administrative ability. He is a native of Medford, N. J. His parents were members of the Society of Friends, but in early life he united with the Methodist Church. He at first contemplated a commercial career, and the success of his administration of Ocean Grove indicates that had he followed that career he would have been eminently successful. The desire to serve God in the ministry, however, superseded his first intention. He was admitted to the New Jersey Conference in 1844. After serving several important churches, he was made a presiding elder, and in 1868, was elected to the General Conference. In spite of the vast labors entailed by the management of Ocean Grove, of which he is the central figure, he has found time to contribute extensively to current literature, beside doing with remarkable efficiency the duties of the pastoral office. He has been a copious writer of hymns, some six hundred sacred lyrics, many of them favorites with all the churches, being the product of his fertile brain. He has also written a book of travels, entitled, What I Saw in Europe, which records his observations on a European tour which he made in 1884. His personality, so full of energy, executive ability, tact, courtesy, and geniality, is an evidence of the providential arrangements which raise up men for special work.

The Religious Services

are, after all, the main feature of Ocean Grove. The managers have taken care that they shall not be subordinated to the secular attractions. Every summer there are three full months of religious meetings. Sunday-school Institutes, Young People's Meetings, Mother's Meetings, Business Men's Meetings, Children's Meetings, Meetings of the King's Daughters, Holiness Meetings, and Temperance Meetings, are some of the departments of special work, beside the regular preaching services and general church assemblies. In addition to these, several agencies hold their anniversaries at Ocean Grove, such as the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, The Women's Foreign Missionary Society, The Band of Deaconesses, and Chautauqua Circles. During last season there were no less than 63 sermons preached and 447 addresses delivered at Ocean Grove, and at the two celebrations of the Lord's Supper there were 3,736 communicants.

The Auditorium,

a picture of which occupies panel No. 6, on the first page, is a large building, covering nearly half an acre of ground and accommodating comfortably seven thousand persons. At nearly every preaching service it is crowded, and a large sounding board over the preacher's head renders it easy for him to make himself heard by the vast congregation. The Choir, generally under the leadership of Professors Sweeney and Kirkpatrick, occupies the centre of the large edifice. It is carefully selected and contains representatives of several churches.

The Young People's Temple

is another of the famous buildings at Ocean Grove. A picture of it occupies panel No. 1 on the first page. This is one of the new buildings rendered necessary by the success of the meetings conducted by Mr. C. H. Yatman, the famous Newark evangelist. These meetings are the most popular on the grounds, and are held at nine in the morning throughout the three months. Though the building is a large one, it is always crowded, and, in the height of the season, hundreds are unable to gain admission. The beneficial results of these meetings are felt in many a home, and thousands of parents bless God that their sons and daughters have attended them. A kindred work, also much blessed, is the Bible Class Sunday-school conducted by the Rev. Thomas Hanlon, D. D.

Other Prominent Features

of Ocean Grove must be briefly noticed. Panel No. 4 of the first page illustration shows a specimen tent of which there are large numbers on the grounds, some being private property and some rented by the Association to visitors. Panel No. 3 represents one of the pleasant avenues of the ground and is known as Lal Pathway. Panel No. 5 is a picture of the model modern Jerusalem, which every visitor makes a point of visiting. It is a very accurate model constructed with remarkable fidelity. Panel No. 8 is a picture of the Memorial Vase which bears the motto of Ocean Grove, and was set up last year on the site of the tent in which the initial religious service, before mentioned, was held twenty years before. Panel No. 9 is a sketch of one of the celebrated Surf Meetings, for which Ocean Grove is famous. They are held at the most suitable part of the beach where there is room for the largest gathering and are always attended by an enormous number of persons. They consist of responsive reading, songs and addresses, and they have been most signally blessed.

The Biblical prototype of Ocean Grove is the Galilean shore. As multitudes flocked from Decapolis, and Jerusalem, and the parts beyond Jordan, to hear the words of life that fell from the Master's lips, as He walked by the sea, or taught from the boat put out a little way from the land, so multitudes from our populous cities go to this Christian shore to commune with Him in spirit, to hear His word and to gain strength for their souls.

MRS. AMANDA SMITH.

(See Portrait on Page 460.)

THERE are few persons in our churches who have not heard of Amanda Smith. Those who have ever come under her influence, who have listened to her strong, deep, tender words have been so impressed with her vigorous personality that they must speak of her, and so her fame has gone out into all the churches.

Amanda was born at Long Green, Md., 1837. She was a slave, but her father had the opportunity of working for himself, and he eventually purchased his own freedom and that of his family. She found a home with a family of Friends and while there, came under strong conviction of the Holy Spirit. For a time she suffered a severe spiritual struggle, being unable to find light. She tells us that on one occasion she pushed forward with her work, and when it was done, went into a cellar to pray, resolved that she would never come out alive unless she received pardon of her sins. She says that she did die, but from that time has been alive in Christ Jesus. Three years after, she was married to J. H. Smith, of Philadelphia, deacon of the African Methodist Church, and began to take an active part in church work.

Her husband died in 1869, and from that time she has given herself wholly to Christian labor. A year before, she had listened to a sermon by Rev. John S. Inskip, and had accepted the doctrine of present holiness, which he preached. She went to England and labored there successfully for nearly two years as an Evangelist.

an opportunity came for her to go to Indiana, where, finding a warm friend in Dr. M. Thoburn (now Bishop Thoburn), she did an excellent work in Calcutta, Madras, Ceylon, and other places. She returned to England in June, 1881, but in December, that year, she was enabled to gratify her long cherished desire to labor in Africa. She arrived in Monrovia, Liberia, in January, 1882, and was one of the first to greet Bishop Taylor on his arrival. She accompanied him on several of his journeys and helped him in his arrangements with the chiefs for planting his mission-stations. She welcomed the missionaries and assisted them in beginning their work, and labored with them during the trying times of their early settlement. Even her iron constitution broke down under her self-imposed labors, and she at length compelled to seek rest. She returned to England, where kind and loving friends are nursing her back to health. When fully recovered she hopes to come back to the United States, where she will receive a warm welcome.

THE TREASURE ISLAND OF TRINIDAD.

(See illustration on page 460.)

An interesting story is connected with the island, a picture of which is here given, and which bears the same name as the larger and more important West Indian Island. About the year 1829, some twenty pirates were wrecked with a cargo of stolen church property on the coast of Peru, said to be worth a million sterling. They buried their treasure, setting up marks by which they might recover it if rescued and to return thither. They were found by Captain Cochrane, who handed them over to the authorities. They were all hanged except one, who was spared on account of his youth. This young man kept the secret of the buried treasure until just before his death at an advanced age, when he divulged it to an old sea-captain, to whom he had sailed for ten years previously. When the British ship Bramble sailed from the purpose of witnessing the total eclipse of the sun, she passed Trinidad Island. On board, seeing some tents on the shore, they were erected by shipwrecked pirates, and with some difficulty they made their way through the surf for the purpose of rescue. They then found that the tents belonged to a party of treasure-seekers, who had never possessed of the sea-captain's secret. They easily found the spot where the treasure was said to be buried, but the site had been covered by a huge landslip, and at the time of the Bramble's visit they had been hard at work for two months, and had moved some tons of earth and rocks, since then, how the expedition has been dissolved.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Two Girl-Tramps Made an Extraordinary Journey of 1800 miles recently. They are sisters, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., who three years ago were two brakemen, and went with them to St. Louis, Mo. In January last, one of the girls was killed on the railroad, and the other deserted his wife. The two women after endeavoring to support themselves, failed to return to their old home. But as they could not pay their fare, and could get no help from their widowed mother, they decided to go to Wilkesbarre, eighteen hundred miles off. Fearing that they might be molested on the road, each of them dressed in a suit of her husband's clothes, smeared her face to look like a female brakeman, and with a total sum of $2.50 between them, and a little food and drink, started June 13th on their long journey. Their hardships, by the way, were innumerable. From Kansas City to Chicago they lay in a dirty truck among sheep, who robbed them of their food. In Chicago they earned seventy-five cents to buy more food by carrying a load of coal from the sidewalk to a third-story flat. From Chicago to Cincinnati they rode concealed in a water-pipe. There they were arrested and fined a dollar each as suspicious characters. On their way to Pittsburgh they had to share their food with other tramps, and, what was worse, to accept a share of their tobacco in exchange, and chewing it to avert suspicion of their sex, became sick. When at length they reached their home, their mother did not recognize them, and called a neighbor who put the two dirty tramps out of the house. An old school-mate, who was less timid, was appealed to, and she knew them in spite of their disguise, and gave them a bath and a change of clothes. Then they returned to their mother, and were welcomed with joy and wonder. As they sat in their old home, with their mother and their old friends around them, they said that all the perils and hardships of the journey seemed like a dream, and their happiness had been cheaply purchased. That will be the Christian's feeling when he reaches his Father's house in heaven after his journey through life. The trials he met with in persisting in travelling thither through the temptations of the world will be forgotten in the joy unspeakable of the heavenly mansions. (II. Cor. 4 : 17.)

A Fatal Lapse of Memory Cost Five Lives in Alabama on July 9. The driver and conductor of a south bound passenger train received orders on leaving Birmingham, Ala., to side-track the train at Clear Creek station, to allow a special extra freight train to pass. The train stopped at Clear Creek to take on passengers, but both the engineer and conductor seem to have forgotten the order, and the train proceeded. A mile below, in a deep cut and on a sharp curve, the passenger and extra freight collided. Both trains were running thirty miles an hour, and the crash was a terrible one. There was no time to jump, and both engineers and firemen and a boy, who was riding on the freight engine, were instantly killed. They were caught in the cabs and buried under the wreck. Happily two empty coaches in the fore part of the passenger train sustained the worst of the shock, and the passengers in the rear coaches escaped with a severe shaking. There can be no question of the responsibility for this calamity, as the order was explicit and clearly understood. So it will be in that more terrible disaster that will overtake many Gospel hearers at the last, who though they know the way of salvation, go on in their sinful career in spite of the explicit warnings of God's Word. (Prov. 1 : 30, 31.)

An Eventful Meeting at Midnight on a New York Street was described recently by a citizen who claimed to have personal knowledge of the circumstances. Noticing a gentleman and his wife, who were prominent in a recent social gathering, he called attention to their singularly happy, cheerful demeanor, and said that their first meeting was a romantic and a gloomy one. Some years ago the husband was a handsome, dissipated young man, on the high road to ruin. One night, after a quarrel with his father, he left his home not knowing if he would ever return, and fully resolved never to humble himself by asking forgiveness. He wandered about the city until midnight, when, in going through a street, he saw a girl violently flung out of a house a few yards ahead of him and heard the door shut against her with a bang. She stood for a minute as if bewildered, and then took a straight course for the river. He followed her and caught her just as she was jumping from a pier into the water. He expostulated with her, but she would not listen, and begged him to release her that she might drown herself. She said she had no home, no friends, and no money. He begged her not to do anything so wicked, and promised to find her employment by which she could support herself. The offer tranquillized her, and finally she yielded to his appeal. Realizing that he was powerless without his father's help, he went the next morning to his office and begged pardon and promised amendment. The father gladly consented to give him another trial, but without much hope. To his surprise, however, the son was completely changed, gave up his dissolute habits, and lived a new life. About a year afterward, the girl whom he had saved became his wife, and never were two persons more devoted to each other. As he had saved her from death so she saved him from ruin. Their story is only another illustration of the potent force love is in human life. It is the essence of the Gospel. Christianity rescues men from sin by telling them that God loves them with an infinite love, and when they begin to love Jesus they hate sin. "What the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh God sending His own Son," has done. (Rom. 8 : 3.)

A New Kind of Palimpsest is Described in a journal devoted to the paper trade. It states that by a certain process an invisible, communication may be made visible and a visible one be made invisible. The journal informs its readers that in using postal cards they may write so that only the initiated can read the message, and write a misleading message which will disappear. The true message, it says, should be written with a gold or a quill pen dipped, not in ink, but in a mixture of one part sulphuric acid and seven parts water. When dry, the card bears no trace of writing, but, as a blank card might excite suspicion, it may be covered with writing in tincture of iodine. When heat is applied to the card, the writing in iodine disappears, and the writing in diluted sulphuric acid becomes legible. There is reason to fear that the same process is going on in the record of some people's lives. In the day when all secrets are revealed and every one appears in the penetrating light of the great white throne, the records of the epitaphs will disappear, and in their place will stand the hidden, true record of the actual life. (Eccles. 12 : 14.)

Contradictory Sermons, of Which the Worse was the more powerful, have been preached by a minister in Florida, according to the Jacksonville Herald. It says : "There is a man in Florida that we never pass without a sigh of regret. This man was the finest pulpit orator of the South. His tongue dropped diamonds, and his thoughts were pearls. No congregation ever tired of his eloquence. He held attention breathless, and thousands hung upon his words. If he had followed one good purpose with unflagging zeal through his life : if he had kept his eye single and his heart set in one direction : if to all his radiant gifts had been added stable purpose and sincere consistency, he might have been among the most famous and the most useful men of his time. But he followed all things : he sought to give God and Mammon equal service, and his melancholy shipwreck points the solemn moral of his plan of life. The story of this man is more eloquent of warning than the best sermon that he ever preached." Such men are not peculiar to this generation—the type has always been present in the world, and prophets and apostles have deplored their fall. (Isa. 5 : 11.)

A Warning Against Counterfeit Half-Dollars has been issued. The warning was necessary because the usual tests of coin fail in the case of these counterfeits, as they are of the same size and weight as the genuine coins. Counterfeiting of this sort is exceedingly profitable when done on a large scale, as detection is practically impossible. It is believed that most of the metal used is from remelted trade dollars. By the purchase of these in large quantities the counterfeiters obtain the metal already mixed at just the standard alloy. The market price of one hundred trade dollars, before they were called in, was $84, and the metal in them is sufficient to make two hundred and seventeen standard half dollars, which gives a profit of $24.50. The coins pass readily in the course of trade, neither the public nor the merchant detects them, and it is only when they go to the Treasury or the mint, where the genuine coins are made, that they are surely found out. It is so with human imposture. Ministers and churches in the world are apt to think that the man who has picked up the cant phrases of religion and is living a moral life is a genuine Christian, but when he appears before God who alone can give the new birth, the imposture is revealed. (Matt. 7 : 32, 23.)

THE THREE JUDGMENTS.

By Rev. Charles Graham.

I.—The Judgment of Saints—A Judgment of Services—Decides Degree of Reward—The Hay and Stubble Edifices Burned—Takes Place at the Parousia—II.—The Judgment of Living Nations—At the Beginning of the Millennium—Tested by Treatment of Christ's People—III. The Final Judgment of the Dead—At the Close of Millennium—The Record in the Books.

HOLY Scripture foretells three great judgments: a judgment of the saints before Christ takes the kingdom, a judgment of the nations when He has taken the kingdom and sits on the throne of His glory in the beginning of his Millennial reign, then, at the end of the Millennium, there will be the judgment before the Great White Throne.

Of the judgment of the saints Paul speaks in II. Cor. 5:19 "For we must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad." A question naturally arises, how can believers receive for the bad which they have done? Its guilt has all been cancelled here. They cannot, therefore, suffer positive punishment for it in eternity. They shall receive for it a diminution of reward. Their works shall be burned up, but they themselves shall be saved, but so as through fire, like a man escaping from a burning house in which his property is consumed. "Look to yourselves," says John, "that ye lose not the things which ye have wrought, but that we receive a full reward." There is, therefore, a possibility that by unwatchfulness we may lose even the things which we have wrought, and fail to receive a full reward. The judgment of the believer will be a judgment in relation to his service. As to his personal acceptance, there can be no judgment: for "he that believeth on the Son of God hath everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment, but is passed from death unto life." We could not think that the spirits of "the just made perfect" when they receive the resurrection body shall be placed before the Divine tribunal to be tried whether they shall be acquitted or condemned, whether they shall go to heaven or Gehenna.

We have said this judgment will be when the Lord comes. Hence, says the apostle to the Corinthians, "Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come, who shall both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and shall make manifest the counsels of the hearts. Then shall every man have his praise of God."

Second Judgment.

The second judgment we have foretold in Matt. 25:31, sg. Notice, when it takes place the Son of Man has come in His glory. Again, notice, it is the nations which are gathered before Him. There is no account of any resurrection of the dead. The judgment is that of living nations. They are judged for the treatment accorded to the brethren of Christ. Messengers have been sent to them called the "brethren" of the Lord, and they are judged according to their treatment of them, and they go to eternal punishment or eternal life, according to the way in which they have treated them.

When the Gospel was first sent forth it went out from Jerusalem, and when the Lord returns and saves His earthly people, from Jerusalem it shall go forth again. Isaiah tells us, "Out of Zion shall go forth the Law, and the Word of God from Jerusalem." And the effect shall be that they will beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." That this is not the judgment of the saints, of which we read in II. Cor. 5, we see from the fact that the judgment of the saints is from the Bema; but this judgment is from the throne.

The Third Judgment.

This judgment we have in Rev. 20:11-15, where we have the resurrection both of the just and the unjust. Between these two resurrections a thousand years intervene. The end of the thousand years bring the second resurrection and final judgment. John sees a great white throne; great, for it is in harmony with the august occasion; white, for He that sits upon it is about to judge on the principle of inexorable righteousness. He that sits on the throne is the Lord Jesus. "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." When He came to destroy the Antichrist, and to judge and make war, He came on a white horse; now he comes to cast all the wicked, and their wickedness into the lake of fire, and sits on a great white throne.

From before His face the Millennial earth and heaven fled away; for even in the Millennial state there will be imperfection. The Apostle Peter describes this unparalleled scene: the heavens pass away with a great noise, and the elements melt with fervent heat; the earth also and the works that are therein are burned up. But they pass away to give place to a new heaven and a new earth which shall be the everlasting home of righteousness.

The sea, as well as the grave, now gives up the bodies which it retained; and Death and Hades deliver up the spirits; and the dead, small and great, appear before that throne.

The Books.

The books are now opened, and the dead are judged according to what is written in the books. Scripture tells us of two books kept by God, "a book of Remembrance" of which we read in Mal. 3:16, and "the Book of Life." From His book of Remembrance "every work shall be brought into judgment with every secret thing, whether it be good or bad." In His book of Life the names of all His people are written, all who have received life through His Son.

The Book of Life being present at this judgment, indicates that there will be those present whose names shall be found in it. This seems beyond question when we reflect that all who died in infancy, or looking to the mercy of the Lord, from the first resurrection up to that hour, will be found in a state of salvation.

The dead are judged according to their works. When, therefore, it is stated that all whose names were not found written in the Book of Life were cast into the lake of fire, it is clear that the names of all we have referred to who feared God and wrought righteousness shall be found in it.

The lake of fire is the second death. Into it, with all the wicked, Death and Hades, personified enemies, are cast. This is the fulfilment of the words of the apostle, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." And now, when all rule, authority, and power are put down, the mediatorial kingdom is given up to the Father, and then God, that is, Father, Son, and Spirit, are all in all. The God-man Christ Jesus was the Ruler in the Millennial kingdom; in the eternal the Triune God shall be all in all.

A SURLY HOST SAVED.

In the report of the proceedings of the Convention of Christian Workers* is the following incident, which, occurred, at Toronto, and was described at the Convention by Miss McIntyre, the self-sacrificing Christian nurse and mission worker: One night, in the Mission Hall, I heard of a woman who was sick. It was in the house of a drunkard. I went into the drunkard's home, and I need not tell you what it was like. There was the sick woman, the broken window-panes, and the drunken husband. I remained with that woman all that night. The man was very rough and uncivil, and said he did not want any strangers there. In the morning he was sobered up, and he was a little better. By God's blessing, his wife got well. I went to him and said: "Will you come to the Mission Hall?" He said, "No." I said to a young lady, "There is a poor unsaved man there;" and we two girls stayed there, and prayed, and prayed for that man's soul, and God heard us. The man finally came to the hall, and as I went by him one night

I said, "Can you leave the mission-hall to-night without Jesus?" He said, "Why I have accepted Him right here and now. I don't want to about it here. I want to go home and thank and ask my wife's forgiveness." He went home and he lived close to the Lord Jesus Christ. He showed it in every act of his life. He was tall and sick and I went to see him. I do not think I shall ever forget the sight as Mr. O'Brien knelt beside him. I shall never forget his smile as he said, "Nurse, I am glad I did not put you off." I knew what he meant. We sang "Jealous Lover of my soul." It was while he was trying to sing that he went home. I felt that it was worth ten years of such work among the wretched, miserable homes by night and by day to save that one man's soul. I have that man's photograph, and, when I get discouraged I look at that and it helps me.

A NAME FOR A TEXT.

In giving an account of his Medical Mission work in New York recently, Dr. George D. D. McKim related the following touching incident of a despairing man: One day a man came to the dispensary in the First Ward with his arm broken, as he thought. My janitor told him that he had come on the wrong day, and then he came to me and said, "There is a man here who thinks his arm is broken. I told him it was wrong day, but he begged me to ask you to him." I thought that the Master would have sent him away because it was the wrong day, so I said I would see him. I found his arm was not broken, but badly sprained. I attended to his arm and talked to him about his spiritual welfare. I next wrote his name in the book, and, after having written his name (his name was John), I said, "Do you know, John, what I was thinking about, as I wrote that name here?" He said, "No." "I was thinking, perhaps, when your mother gave you that name she hoped you would be like one of those Jews in the Good Book." The man's head fell and tears came to his eyes. The mention of his mother seemed to open up the river, as it were, and bringing up his head a moment after he said, "I know, but she did, but I am not like one of them and never shall be. I know there is no hope for me. Doctor, you have attended to my arm, I wish you would let me go." I said, "Don't just yet. I have done what you wanted to do, and it is hardly fair for you to go now. I cannot tell you what happened in the hour and a half that followed, but he got on his knees and gave his heart to the Saviour, though it was more or less drink in him at the time. Years after I heard of him as a deacon in the Presbyterian Church. He and his wife had drunkards for more than fourteen years. Ministers and missionaries had been to that man's woman, but it was given to us to have the privilege of bringing him and his wife into the kingdom. It is a pleasure to visit their home."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Carlyle's Prayer.*

Not long after the death of his wife, The Carlyle wrote to his friend Erskine of Inverness, as follows: "Our Father which art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done,"—what else can we say? The other night in my sleepless tossings at which were growing more and more miserable those words, that brief and grand prayer, came strangely into my mind, with an altogether new emphasis, as if written and shining for me in mild pure splendor on the black bosom of the night there; when I as it were, read the word by word, with a sudden check to my perfect wanderings, with a sudden softness of composure that was most unexpected. Not haps for thirty or forty years had I ever fully repeated that prayer: nay, I never felt before

* From The Nature and Method of Revelation. By George Fisher, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University. The shallow scepticism paraded in our day by those who think that their character for mental acumen is raised by their being spoken of as agnostics, meets with a vigorous rebuke in this little volume. Prof. Fisher shows that faith is higher than unbelief, though not contrary to reason. An appendix on the date and authorship of the Gospels adds greatly to the value and usefulness of the book. Pp. 291; Price, $1.25; Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

* Published price $1, by the Bureau of Supplies, First National Bank, New Haven, Conn.

intensely the voice of man's soul it is,—the most aspiration of all that is high and pious in man nature; right worthy to be recommended with an, 'After this manner pray ye.'" How Carlyle come to see what he had never seen before, and to feel what he had never before? Have the teachers of the church in all these years been so far astray when, following Christ the apostles, they have talked of blindness of mind and of spiritual light?

The Faith of The Prince of Wales.
A number of years ago I read an account of a visit made by the Prince of Wales in company with an eminent man of science to a great iron-works. They stood together by a stream of molten iron flowing slowly out of the smelting furnace. "Do you believe in science?" said his companion to the Prince. "I do," was the reply. Then he thrust your moistened finger into that stream. The Prince at once divided the stream with his finger, and the finger was not harmed. Whether this particular incident occurred or not, the same thing is not infrequently done by workmen in foundries. On the instant of the contact of the hand with the fiery liquid there is what the scientific men call "the spheroidal state." The sudden evaporation is attended with a repulsion that perfectly shields the flesh the moment from contact with the burning substance through which it passes. We may suppose a person to understand the principle of a "spheroidal state," and how it is that the heat, with only the ordinary amount of natural force upon it, can be safely passed through a current. Nevertheless, he might shrink from making the experiment. The sight of the molten liquid might induce a recoil which his knowledge of the principle would not suffice to overcome. Workmen who have seen one of their companions try the experiment again and again, and get back by a certain timidity from following the example. An unwonted energy, an undoubted boldness, are requisite to neutralize the impression made on the mind through the senses, and let reason say what it will.

LOST AND FOUND.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Lesson for July 27; Luke 15: 1-10; Golden Text Luke 15: 10.

Complaint of the Pharisees—The Charge of Giving Sinners—The Lost Sheep Sought—In Parables—As Individuals—The Friends of the Shepherd—How God Values Men—The Holiness Preferred—The Humble Man Better than the Righteous—Only the Lost Saved—Dying in Order to Live—The Lost Piece of Silver—Its Importance—Superscription—The Church to Search for the Candle to be Lighted—The Rejoicing in Heaven.

As after Jesus had taught the multitude the conditions of discipleship that the only ones lost were attracted to Him. "He that ears to hear," He said, "let him hear." In the midst of pious Pharisees and learned scribes, and of members of the priesthood or of the tribe of Levi, "There drew near unto Him all publicans and sinners for to hear Him." Pharisees, on the other hand, occupied with constant effort "to establish their own righteousness" (Rom. 10: 3), had no ears for the teaching of Jesus; they were would-be learners, and could not learn. Their object was to praise Jesus, and now they had found a fault of accusation. It was this,

"This Man Receiveth Sinners, and eateth with them." Thank God that this accusation found its way into the Word of God as a rebuke of His love to sinners; thank God He "receiveth sinners" still. The Pharisee's doctrine was that we are better than publicans and sinners, better born, better bred, better educated, we are justified by our position to a consideration which our birth and previous life cannot pretend to. These advantages, so generally considered in the world, had not one feather's weight of value with Jesus; "a broken and a contrite heart" (Ps. 51: 17), more than outweighed them. The leaders of the Jews would not brook that Jesus of Nazareth should set aside the "manner of life" which they had "received from their fathers," (1. Pet. 1:

18) and which flattered their pride and responded to the self-esteem which is also born and grows like a rank weed in every human heart. Jesus spake this parable unto them, saying, "What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and goeth after that which is lost until he find it? And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing." It was mortifying to the Pharisees that those whom they despised should have any value in the eyes of Jesus; the world appreciated them, and gave them their place; why should not this prophet of Nazareth? Jesus saw through the vulgar, senseless assumption of superiority from the accident of birth, position, and riches, and all His teaching and His life went to witness against anything so unjust and untrue. He made superiority to consist, not in what a man had, but in what he was, in meekness, in self-conquest, in appreciation of God. Man's natural heart is so selfish, and so cruel, that he treads down the weak, and suffering, and sinful; "the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that

Which Was Lost."

He goes after that which was lost, until He finds it. Jesus "emptied Himself, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." (Phil. 2: 7, 8.) It was thus He went after that which was lost. But He goes after the individual lost ones also. How many a child of Christian parents finds himself thwarted in all his misdoings, stopped here and there, his health broken down, his studies interrupted, his hopes of earthly distinction blighted—why? The good Shepherd is after him, seeking that heart which is set on earth to attract it heavenwards. "And when He hath found it," when at last the one who has cost Him so much sorrow is won, "He calleth together His friends and neighbors, saying, Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost." Oh, if the Pharisees had had ears to hear and hearts to understand, they would have been abashed that they could not be reckoned among the neighbors and friends of the good Shepherd, for they had no heart for the lost sheep which were being found by Jesus! By and bye they would have to wake up to the terrible consciousness that their own fancied superiority was but a dream. By and bye there will be "weeping and gnashing of teeth" when they will see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, and they themselves shut out, while others shall come from the east, and west, and north, and south, before their very eyes, and sit down in the kingdom of God (Luke 13: 28, 29), which in their silly pride they have rejected.

Jesus adds, "I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance." In heaven the value of the sacrifice of Christ is appreciated, and human merit is but impertinence where all is seen in the light of God. In that unclouded atmosphere, everything is seen in its true light; the lost sinner, who is confounded by the unutterable love of Him who died in his stead, takes a higher rank than the most stainless of moral characters who has not the same appreciation of God.

Have we a heart like our Lord—a heart for the lost? In all the writings of philosophy, in all heathen systems of religion, no place is found for the lost. The idea of man is always to develop and increase his own goodness, and to build up a claim upon God which is founded upon his own intrinsic merit, and the lost are left to perish. But "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ came into the world to save sinners." (1. Tim. 1: 15.) God is creative in all His dealings, He makes all things new. Wherever there is anything of goodness in a man, it must be broken down, for the self which is in it is an element which cannot mingle with the divine. Good self is as contrary to God as bad self. Thus we must know we are lost in order to be saved; we must die to live, and out of our death and nothingness, God creates a new man, Christ in us. If we have sympathy with our God, we shall hold out hope to the hopeless and rejoice with Him over every sinner that repenteth. One who counts on his own goodness is most unwilling to extend hope to the erring, because, if such can be saved and put on a par with him, his goodness cannot count for anything, to his credit. But those who go down into the slums, and rescue the lost are in sympathy with Jesus. "Either what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently until she find it? And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbors together, saying, Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost."

The woman, the Church, is called to leave her own people and her father's house (Ps. 45: 10), that the people and the house, the name and the interests of the Bridegroom may be hers. It is the privilege of the Church to do the works of Christ. He is the Shepherd who seeks His lost sheep, she is the woman who seeks the lost silver. First, she recognizes that the lost coin is of value, it has upon it the image and superscription of the King, it is current coin of the realm, and yet lost, hidden away among the rubbish and the dust. The Church's special care is to look after the backsliders and the cold, useless Christians, and bring them out of their hiding-places into healthy and useful circulation, not to shun, despise, and leave them to themselves. The woman first lights a candle. When the light of the Church is burning low, the true love of the members one to the other waxes cold. It needs new light and new power of the Holy Ghost to recognize what there is of Christ in those who humble us the most, who cause us the most grief. It is those who are spiritual who restore the lost silver "in the spirit of meekness." (Gal. 6: 1.)

But light is not all that the Church of Christ needs. We may be awakened to our duty and calling to seek after the lost and useless Christians which are around us; we may be letting our light shine amongst them, but there needs a clean sweeping away of the rubbish in order to discover them, and to bring them into circulation. It is by the deeper purification of those who most understand God, and by their yielding to the work of the Refiner, that others who are entangled in the world can be reached. There must be the broom, and the diligent sweeping of the whole floor, before the silver is discovered. Nothing awakens a careless, worldly believer like the unfeigned humiliation of one who walks closely with God. He reasons, "If such a man needs to be humbled, how infinitely more do I!" And he begins to look at himself in the light of the Word, and discovers how much of the image and superscription of the King in him has been defaced and marred by self and sin, how little profit he has been to his Lord, and he surrenders himself to be cleansed, renewed and used of God.

"When she hath found it," when the silver is the worth of silver to the church once more, than she calleth her friends and her neighbors together, saying, Rejoice with me for I have found the piece which I had lost," and the song begun on earth, is echoed in heaven, "Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." It is a wonderful thing that man is permitted fellowship with the joys and sorrows of God and heaven. Just in proportion as our personal interests are transferred to God, He makes over to us a share in His. It was when Abraham was separated from country, kindred, and all else, unto God, that God unfolded to him His designs upon Sodom. It was when Ezekiel, the man who was a sign, had learned, for God's sake, and his country's, even to forbear to weep over his own wife's grave, that God could reveal to him the thoughts of His heart. O, to be thus free from self, to understand and reciprocate the love of our God.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

WEARY BRAIN.

SINCE the days of Hazlitt and Sheridan and John Milton, and the wail of Grub Street, London, literary toil has never been appreciated. Oliver Goldsmith, entertaining his friends, has to sit in the window because there is only one chair. Seviers has to sell his splendid work for one ducat. Defoe, the author of two hundred and eighteen volumes, dies penniless. The learned Johnson had such shabby clothes that he could not dine with gentlemen, so he sat behind a screen and dined, while the gentlemen on the other side the screen were applauding his works. Butler, after throwing the world into fits of laughter with Hudibras, died for lack of a crust. So it has always been. Manual toil seems to have a grudge against literary toil, and it practically says: "You come down here and shove a plane and break cobble-stones and pound the shoe-last, and get an honest living like the rest of us, instead of sitting there idly scribbling!" But God knows there is no harder toil on earth than literary toil. It is not a question of hard times; it is characteristic of all times. The world has no appreciation of the immense financial, physical, intellectual exhaustion of literary toil, and so the world begrudges five cents for a newspaper, and says: "Can't you make it four?" and then begrudges four, and says: "Can't you make it three?" and begrudges the three cents for a newspaper, and says: "Can't you make it two?" and grind, and grind, and grind. And in that mill are ground up the bodies and the minds and the souls of men and women. The world dips its chalice into the blood, and says: "Aha! the price of newspapers has gone down." While there are men in the literary profession who have made their fortunes, I tell you, men and women of America, that to the most it is a struggle for bread. Small pay and large abuse are the fate of most literary men.

Great outcry is made against magazines and newspapers, because the literary product is often not of an elevating kind. But why do many of the journals give prominence to murders and scandals and the corruptions of society? Because the public taste demands them. I go into a foreign city, and into a meat-market, and I find that the butchers have hung up on the most conspicuous hooks meat that is tainted, while the fresh and the savory meat is carelessly tossed aside. What am I to conclude? I unmistakably conclude that the people of that city love tainted meat. If there is so much iniquitous literature abroad in the shape of book and newspaper, it is because the public taste is so corrupt it demands it. Now, you are an honest citizen, you are a good citizen, you are an intelligent citizen, you are a man of family. A newspaper comes into your house. You open it. There are three columns of splendidly written editorials. Next to it there is a mean, contemptible divorce case. Which do you read the more thoroughly? Here are the splendidly written editorials, evolving some beautiful moral sentiment or some theory of science. You dip into it and say: "That is splendidly written, that is well done, that editorial." Then you turn to the divorce case, and read it all, from the long primer type at the top to the nonpareil at the bottom, and ask your wife if she has read it. It is only a case of demand and supply. Newspaper men are not fools. They know what you want, and they give it to you.

If the Church of God, and if honorable men of the world would decline to read the depraved books and depraved newspapers, they would not be published, for the simple reason that they would not pay, for iniquity gets poorer and poorer, and cannot afford to support literature. It is the honest men, the hard-working men, the pure men of the world, that support the literature. If a convention could be called now, and made up of all the editors and reporters of the United States, and it were plainly put to them, which kind of a paper they should prefer to publish, and which style of news to send forth, I think they would unanimously declare, "we would rather send out elevating literature than bad literature." I say this not in apology for debauched newspapers, but I say it that you may divide the responsibility between those who print and those who read.

VICTORY OVER DISEASE.

WE hail Apostolic and Laquerrier, the French biologists who expect by galvanic currents to kill the germs of disease. We applaud Pasteur's inoculation against hydrophobia and Ferran's scientific attack on cholera. These, with Jenner's vaccination for small-pox, are only segments of the circle which includes recovery from all the diseases the human race is heir to. As Dr. Jenner's experiments were a long line of half successes or entire failures reaching on to complete scientific triumph, so these other attacks on Asiatic cholera and madness will sometimes fail and sometimes advance, until the paroxysms of the one and the ragings of the other shall forever cease. Other maladies will in their turn go under, until medical science will stand victor over all the distempers and plagues and epidemics and physical agonies that have cursed the earth. I am no more confident that Christianity will extirpate the spiritual woes of the world than that medical science under divine direction will abolish the physical woes. Christ suggested this when He cursed the paralysis and blind eyes and catalepsies of those whose sins He pardoned, and the positive promise concerning the millennial gladness is that "the eyes of the blind shall be opened and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame leap as a hart and the dumb sing." It is only a question of time, not long to be deferred, I hope and believe, when there will be an atropine for every morphia, a magnesia for every acid, a cinchona for every putrescence, and for every physical ill a chemical reagent.

More interest have I in these medical experiments and discoveries than I have in inven-

ventions, locomotive or bellicose. The warrior who destroys life deserves not so bright a glow as the practitioner or scientist who saves life. The machinist who invents a swift wheel to whirl a passenger to some other place is not of so much use as the doctor who invents a plan by which his patient can stay in this place. Success, therefore, to all the laboratories until the time shall come—and it will come—when men and women will die only of old age. The physical machinery will stop because it is worn out. Slower and slower pulsation, feebler and feebler the respiration until painless demise shall end the earthly career. Croups, and pneumonias, and scarlet fevers, and consumptions, and rheumatism and neuralgias, and congestions, abolished, the disorders that have already succumbed, want no inventions to take us faster than the limited express train. We need no quicker communication of thought than that which is afforded by telegraphy. We want no brighter light than Edison's electric. But we do want an exterminating war upon the diseases which rack our bodies, and bereave our families, and ravage the nations. What a realm opens before the doctors. Who knows but that after all there may be found a universal antidote, and all the world's distresses came from one tree in Paradise, so there may yet be discovered a root, or bark, or fruit, whose essence the world may quaff for the rectification of all disorders.

CHRISTIAN WORK.

STRONG in faith, strong in prayer, let us be strong in works—always abounding in the work of the Lord. God needs workmen, and He pays them well. He pays them promptly. He pays them in this life. He pays them in life to come. If in any one thing more than other the Church is lacking, it is in the systematic training of its members for work. A great majority of us are sleeping-car Christians. When, a short time ago, I went to Pittsburgh, I got on the train at Jersey City, went to my berth and woke up in Pittsburgh. So the vast majority of our members, join the Church, have names enrolled on its records, fold their hands and expect that on the morning of the resurrection they will open their eyes on scenes celestial, there forevermore to dwell. The things from the pulpit on this subject are too definite. Thousands and tens of thousands are awaiting orders and instructions. They are ready for work—willing to work, but need explicit directions. To these let me say, do what is nearest at hand. Do not wait for a golden and glorious opportunity to achieve a great victory, but strive in the doing well, the sight of the Lord, of little, every-day duties to fit yourself for a greater work. Begin at Jerusalem. This is your own home. Countless opportunities will present themselves; you will only pray that the dear Holy Spirit will open your eyes to see them.

Faith is the flower, works the fruit. Without works is dead. Having faith, let us go to God for enlightenment as to the line of duty for which our peculiar talents and gifts are peculiarly fit us. Ascertain what special privileges for the work the Christian enjoys. Opportunities are numerous and diversified. Sunday school work, mission work, sick calls, visiting, work, exhorting, class-leading, giving. God has fitted you for the one or the other, or for several. Oh! that the Church membership may be awakened and rejoice that God has called them to be co-workers with Him in this blessed, this glorious work.

CURRENT EVENTS.

oming Entered the Family of States on day last, when the President signed the admission. She will not have the Senate Representatives in Congress to which entitled until an election is held under new constitution, which will probably be in number. This election will interest the country, and it may be hoped that we have full reports of it. Its interesting feature will be the female suffrage experiment. In doing, women are to be allowed to vote at all. There is much curiosity felt as to the result. If, as is probable, it should prove beneficial, the States may become more willing than now are to accept the assistance of women in deciding how the country shall be governed. Objection generally urged against women is that they do not understand politics. Even if that is true, they can exercise a power by their votes which would benefit the country. Let them apply a test they do not by steadfastly voting against every candidate of immoral character. Male voters are too easily satisfied with a candidate if his political is right, even though his moral character is vile.

Death of General John C. Fremont, which occurred in New York on Sunday last, removes from us one of the historical figures of national life. General Fremont had served to a prominent place in our country's history.

In early life he was an explorer, and it was mainly through his daring and energy that our frontiers were extended to the Pacific coast. Settlers followed where he had found a path, and where they settled they carried their love and allegiance to the United States Government. Fremont was not only a geographical pioneer, but a political pioneer. It was he who bore the standard of the Republican Party in its first campaign for the Presidency in 1856. It was who later raised the banner of emancipation by his proclamation in Missouri, though afterward recalled by President Lincoln. He was prominent in the months of the war, but the sturdy independence and strong personality of the man restrained under command, and he asked no permission to retire early in the war. It was only in April of this year that he was restored to his rank in the army, and re-elected. General Fremont was seventy-seven years of age, having been born at Savannah, Georgia, January 21, 1813.

her Case of Discipline in the Roman Catholic Church similar to that of Dr. McGlynn is in the light in New York last week. It is the question whether a clergyman can be expelled from his church if his ecclesiastical superiors disapprove of his social or political views. This question is answered in the affirmative by the supreme court of appeal in New York.

It was raised by the suit which was brought in the New York Courts to compel the removal of the remains of Mr. McGuire to the Roman Catholic Cemetery to allow the remains of Mr. McGuire to be buried in the cemetery, in his own lot, which he had purchased and paid for in his lifetime. The trust was used to permit the interment because he died in a meeting of Dr. McGlynn's church. Dr. Burtzell, Rector of the Roman Catholic Church of the Epiphany, who was a party in the case, said that in his opinion the remains were bound to admit the body. This was opposed to that of Archbishop Corrigan. Shortly after the case was decided, the archbishop removed Dr. Burtzell from his position in New York, and appointed him to a position at Rondout. As Dr. Burtzell was attached to his people, and they loved him and him to remain with them, and as there was no complaint against the manner in which he performed his pastoral duties, Dr. Burtzell appealed to Rome against the archbishop's sentence. The appeal is dismissed, and the archbishop's order sustained. Dr. Burtzell must either submit or share Dr. McGlynn's fate. The significance of the case lies in the fact that Dr. Burtzell was subpoenaed in the McGuire case and was therefore obliged to appear as a witness. He was sworn to tell the truth and being asked for his opinion, gave it. He is being punished for holding an opinion which was in conflict with that of his archbishop. It would appear that, notwithstanding the declaration of the Constitution, a man may be punished in this country for his opinions.

The First Sealing Seizure of the Season was made last week at Oun-Alaska. The Mattie C. Dyer, a vessel engaged in catching seals, put into that port in a storm, and was promptly seized by the collector of the port. The seventy skins on board and the arms of the vessel were confiscated. There appears good reason to believe that Mr. Blaine and the British Minister would have arranged the whole of this Behring Sea difficulty before now if they had been unhampered. It is stated on good authority, that the President was influenced by persons employed by the lessees of the American Islands and was induced to interfere with the negotiations, absolutely withdrawing the proposal Mr. Blaine had made for an amicable settlement. This proposal was for the United States to restrain vessels of all nationalities from sealing at improper times. Both England and Russia were disposed to accept this arrangement. Since President Harrison has directed its withdrawal, our Government has sent its cruisers to Behring Sea and England has sent powerful vessels to protect her flag. Mr. Blaine has renewed his negotiations informally with the British Minister, still hoping to avoid unpleasantness.

The Fatal Steamboat Disaster which Occurred at Chicago on July 11th, shows that more restrictions as to the freight of steamers ought to be imposed. The Tioga, one of the largest of the lake steamers, valued at $225,000, was being unloaded, when a terrific explosion occurred. It blew the rear part of the vessel completely out, and she would have sunk if the watertight compartments had not been in working order. Flames immediately burst forth, completely enveloping the steamer. The fire-department found the utmost difficulty in extinguishing them as the smoke was so dense that the firemen could not live below the deck where the fire was. Eventually, however, the fire was got under, and then the painful duty of bringing up the dead was commenced. Seventeen dead bodies were found, and two men still alive but seriously injured. Even this list does not cover all the dead, for fourteen more men were known to have been on board, who are now missing. They were probably blown out of the vessel into the water. The explosion came, it appears, from the vapor of kerosene oil, of which there were two hundred barrels on board. As the oil was moved the vapor was liberated, and when the men went into the compartment with lights the vapor exploded and set fire to the ship.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Wedding was Solemnized in Westminster Abbey on Saturday last. The vast assembly of English aristocracy which filled the historic edifice to witness the ceremony testified to the respect felt for the explorer in society. The bride did a very graceful thing on her way to the altar. As she moved up the aisle, she carried a beautiful wreath of white flowers with the letter L in scarlet in the center. She broke the procession and walking to the side of the abbey, laid the wreath on the stone beneath which lie the remains of Livingstone. At the altar, Mr. Stanley, accompanied by Dr. Parke, Mr. Jephson, Mr. Bonny and other comrades of his recent expedition awaited her. He bore traces of his illness, and leaned heavily on his cane. After the ceremony the party went to the home of the bride. The wedding presents there displayed proved again how lively an interest is taken in the newly married couple. The queen's present was, as usual, her own portrait. The Prince of Wales sent a magnificent inkstand, and his son-in-law, the Duke of Fife, a diamond cross. The strangest present was from Africa, of a tin case containing a bottle of water from the Victoria Nyanza. Many presents came from America and some not intrinsically valuable would be much prized by Stanley on account of old associations dating to the time before he became famous.

The Speculations as to Bismarck's Future action have been numerous in Germany since his retirement, there being a general impression that having been for so many years accustomed to wield a controlling influence over the national policy he would not be content with inaction. A journalist who interviewed him last week tried to get some intimation of his intentions from him. Bismarck said he might possibly write his memoirs, but the archives were now not so easy of access as formerly to him. He declined to enter on the causes of his retirement, beyond saying that it was brought about by a difference of opinion between him and the Kaiser. He said that he was not indisposed to accept the national liberal candidacy if it were offered, but would avoid opposition to the present government, and would prefer accepting a position in the Bundesrath from some other German State than Prussia, in which capacity he could address the Reichstag.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Talmage's personal appeal to the readers of this journal for help in rebuilding the Brooklyn Tabernacle, has received a very gratifying response. To those who have already sent in the names of new subscribers, Dr. Talmage desires to express his most cordial thanks. Others are still to be heard from. It is hoped that everyone will take pleasure in participating in this great work. The publisher reminds all who are intending to send a subscription, that the New Testament, with Dr. Talmage's autograph inscription will be sent for every full-paid new annual subscription, mailed before July 31.

The national debt of Heligoland is $50. Its annual revenue is $40,000.

The Baptist meetings will be held at Martha's Vineyard during the second week of August.

The Ocean Grove Sunday-school Assembly is in session this week, and continues till July 22.

Dr. Talmage expects to preach at the Pavilion Assembly, Asbury Park, N. J., on August 10, at 4 o'clock.

Fort Wayne College, Indiana, at its recent commencement, conferred the degree of A. M. on Mr. Louis Klopsch, publisher of this journal.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been conducting revival meetings at Springfield, Ill. Fifteen churches of various denominations united in the services.

The Russian Government is expelling Jews in large numbers with the result that the Austrian Government has recently had to provide for crowds of absolutely destitute Jews.

A Home for intemperate women has been opened in Brookline, Boston, Mass. Mrs. Charriot, who conducts it, has had much success in the smaller institution she has managed in Worcester St. She began the work by receiving patients in her own house twelve years ago.

Evangelist H. R. Keates has concluded his labors at the Seventeenth St. M. E. Church, New York. The revival has continued for eight weeks, and during that time, 140 persons have made a profession of faith in Christ, and many of them have joined the church on probation. Mr. Keates has proved himself an earnest and consecrated worker and is heartily commended to the churches. Any pastor desiring his services may write to him at this office and the letter will be forwarded to him wherever he may be.

At the celebration of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's fifty-sixth birthday recently at his orphanages, over 12,000 persons came to participate in the rejoicing. The birthday gifts, which Mr. Spurgeon turns into the treasury of the orphanage, amounted this year to $9,000. There are five hundred orphans now in the institution, ninety-one having been received this year. The number received since the opening in 1867 is 1420. The cost of feeding, clothing and educating them is $5,000 a month. Charitable people contribute and Mr. Spurgeon pays the balance. There is no debt.

A reader of Mrs. ReQua's volume of beautiful poems, who, in a season of trial and bereavement received comfort from the perusal, has sent to the gifted authoress twenty dollars, with the request that a copy of the book be sent to various hospitals for the benefit of the inmates. This is a Christ-like act showing true Christian sympathy with the afflicted. It is doubly blessed because the proceeds of the sales are applied to the support of Indian orphans and the mission among the Indians. Anyone wishing to follow the excellent example may remit to Mrs. W. F. ReQua, McAlester, Ind. Ter.

J. C. FREMONT.

The matchless declaration of the love of God, the voice of love in the present. The Lord the believer now. Whatever discomfords are in, the Lord loves you. In this hour, perhaps, your heart is failing you with fear. The Lord still says to you, "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love." "Everlasting" includes to-day. Things present are preferred as well as things to come. External circumstances do not change the love of God, nor your internal condition do so. The true voice of love in the future. It means, thee for ever." God has not loved us with which will die out after a certain length of time: His love is like Himself, "from ever to everlasting."

It is a declaration of love secured to us in many ways. Did you observe in the chapter how the Lord secures His love to His people, first, by a covenant; then, this love is secured by relationship. In adoption and regeneration the Lord drew Himself to be thy Father, and actually said, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." "The son abideth ever," children, than heirs." His love is pledged by redemption. Redemption has sealed the love. That spear which found out sin and set flowing its blood and its water, led all doubts as to the eternal endurance of the Lord's love.

It is a declaration of love divinely confessed. The Lord has not sent this assurance to the prophet, but He has made it Himself—The Lord hath appeared." This declaration of love comes through another tongue or lip; the divine Lover Himself breathes His own word to His chosen: "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love."

We finish, thirdly, with

The Manifest Evidence.

We loved thee with an everlasting love; and, with loving kindness have I drawn thee. Here are drawings mentioned. Have you felt them? We have not seen God, but we have felt Him drawing us. Oh, how He gave to us when we were children; you remember, when you were boys and when you could not sleep at nights for your drawings towards divine things? Do you remember when you were in the country how you would sit down under a hedge, you scarce knew why, longing for something better than you had as yet reached? Do you remember when the Lord Jesus drew you from the horrible pit, out of the midnight air? Do you remember how He drew you and set your feet upon a rock? He drew you from spiritual death, from the corruption of the dominion of the devil. He drew you to life, love and liberty. He drew you to the cross, to the throne of grace, to the Father of Christ.

Drawings come from God so are they given to God. Blessed is he whose heart is drawn nearer and nearer to the Most High. We struggle back to carnal things; taken up with business, with the family, with a thousand grovelling cares; but when the Spirit draws it is Upward and Heavenward.

It is us to repentance, and to faith, and to holiness and to continuance in well-doing, that we may now feel divine drawings from Him who is our all in all.

The Lord assures us that these are drawings of loving kindness. However He draws, it is love; and whenever He draws it is in love. That He pulls and snatches in anger, we know that He has always drawn in love. Because the horse is wilful if the driver stern; our waywardness makes us think our Lord austere. The forces of sin put forth to work upon us are gentle, kind and loving. He has drawn me "with loving kindness." I am sure He has dealt with me. Will you think of a case and bless His name? Lord, thou hast drawn me when I did not know it; thou hast drawn me when I thought I was willingly of my own accord. I see it now, and I name for it.

Nothing more. These drawings are to be precious. "With lovingkindness have I drawn thee;" and He means to do the same. If you will look the chapter through, you will see that God promises to keep on drawing. He would not care to preach to you a gospel which has no final perseverance in it. Spirit which can die, is not the eternal life in the Gospel; and heavenly love which can fail is not the everlasting love of our text. My road to get to heaven lies in this: as far as I have come on the road, the Lord has drawn me, and will draw me the rest of the way.

Such a magnificent text as ours ought to make us consider two things. The first is, Is it so? Am I drawn? If God loves you with an everlasting love, He has drawn you by His loving-kindness: is it so or not? Has He drawn you by His Holy Spirit, so that

You Have Followed On?

Are you a believer? Do you carry Christ's cross? You have been drawn to this. Then take home these gracious words: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." If you have not been so drawn, do you not wish you were? Oh, it were worth dying a thousand deaths to be a Christian after that fashion of Christianity which is based on everlasting love! O man, if you cannot claim this, at any rate desire it, and go humbly on your knees to Christ Jesus, and look to Him, and live!

But, child of God, if you know these drawings, and if it be true that God loves you with an everlasting love, then are you resting? "I have a feeble hope," says one. What! How can you talk so? He who is loved with an everlasting love, and knows it, should swim in an ocean of joy. Not a wave of trouble should disturb the glassy sea of his delight. What is to make a man happy if this will not? Come, come; we must have no more hanging heads. Hallelujah! Hallelujah! If the Lord has loved me with an everlasting love, I will not be cast down, though the earth be removed. His love is better than wealth, better than health (great blessing as that is), better than honor, better than usefulness. Everlasting love, and thou hast it! Man alive, wipe the tears out of thine eyes, and lift up thine head! "Oh, rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him;" for if He hath loved thee so, what hast thou to fear? What is to be done but to love Him in return who has loved us so much? One thing I know—

"All that remains for me
Is but to love and sing,
And wait until the angels come
To bear me to my King."

A SUNDAY WITH THE MORAVIANS. BY VIATOR.

TIME and place being convenient for the purpose, I avail myself of a kind invitation to spend Sunday, in this early summer-time, with a Moravian family in the settlement of Bethlehem, Pa. Arriving there on Saturday evening, I find a friend awaiting me at the depot, and we make our winding, climbing-way, to his home beneath the shadow of the fine old church, which is the chief structure in the place. He is a scholar and a man of fine taste and a delightful companion. Nothing could be more restful than his home, where his mother, who is the widow of an eminent Moravian clergyman, and his sister await our coming. They are highly educated and musical, queens of hospitality, and charming conversers. I feel sweetly at home, and the rest of the evening passes all too quickly. In my sleeping-room I find every comfort, writing materials, and a well-stocked library.

A lovely morning invites to the spacious piazza and the enjoyment of a view of consummate loveliness. Beyond the gardens and orchards before and on each side stretches the Lehigh Valley, dotted here and there with dwellings and churches. Still beyond rises a range of wood-crowned hills, terraces of houses, and isolated structures mingling their varied forms and colors with the abundant green of the noble trees spared from the woodman's axe.

'Tis a high day in the Christian year of the simple and devout Moravians. Sonorous music from trombones calls me from the breakfast-table, and I see in the turret of the church the musicians, whose melody is at once new, pleasing and profoundly sacred. They begin their performance with the fine, pathetic old psalm tune, frequently sung to the passion hymn, "When I survey the wondrous cross," and known as Rockingham. Two grave old German tunes of perhaps equal merit as musical compositions, follow. The appetite is thus only whetted for a religious service, which is unique in my experience of family devotions.

A pile of books is produced after the meal and placed on the breakfast-table before the venerable lady who is the head of the establishment. She reads reverently the texts and stanza of a hymn, which is the daily portion in the Moravian text-book, first in English, then in German, then in French. Next she opens a well-preserved volume, the leaves of which are brown with age, and reviews what her husband wrote therein of his doings and his whereabouts on the day, in the years of his pious activities. She was with him on many of these occasions, and her memory supplies what the concise entry fails to state. Friends are affectionately remembered, dead or alive, as their names appear in the birthday books of the several members of the family.

Public service in the church is refined and melodious, the prayers partly liturgical and partly extemporaneous, everything expressive of good taste, and the doctrinal teaching an uncompromising adherence to the standards of orthodoxy. An abler production than the sermon is seldom heard. The occasion being a baccalaureate discourse, intended primarily for the profit of the class of theological students who are about to undertake pastoral duty. I am much impressed with the music. Surely these people begin their heaven below. If any fault can be found with the rendering of the grand old melodies and anthems from the German Fatherland, it is that they are sung a trifle too slowly; but, be it ever remembered to the credit of the Moravians, they don't offend the ear of the judicious with the weak, tinkling melodies which too often usurp the place of noble sacred music in our American churches. There is a master hand presiding at the organ, and his skilled fingers reproduce effectively the immortal harmonies of a world-honored composer as I slowly leave the sacred structure.

My well-informed reader knows already that the Moravians provide special services for various classes of the brethren and sisters. The married men have theirs, and so the married women, the unmarried men and the women who have not yet entered into the connubial relation, the youths, the maidens and the children. To-day the "older girls" have their annual love-feast, to which their relatives and friends are invited. We enter the church as the trombonists blow a solemn welcome. A bishop presides, unrobed, wearing only his customary suit of solemn black. After the introductory stanza of a hymn has been sung by the whole congregation he makes a prayer. While "guests" are singing another stanza to another tune, becaped and aproned sisters march in double files up the aisles of the church, carrying trays which are loaded with cakes, that are similar in appearance to the pretzels of the outside wicked world, but, as the trial proves, infinitely pleasanter to the taste, and which they distribute, beginning with the bishop, then to the "older girls" and their "guests." They are followed by men carrying mugs of hot coffee. These are handed out in like manner. While this has been going on, the "girls," "parents," and "all" have contributed songs, devout and holy psalms to the music. An examination of the folder I find in the pew shows how wisely the words of the service have been chosen, a liturgy in verse, leading the people along in a systematic act of worship. Now comes the turn of the choir, who sing the Jubilate Deo, during which the congregation disposes of the refreshments given them. Aptly now comes the turn of the "guests," to praise the Lord. In continuation of the devotions, hymn follows hymn, a German anthem being the only deviation from this programme. Other than this, the whole service is in English, but the music is chiefly German, some of it centuries old, and grave and good to admiration. When the bishop pronounces the benediction all feel that they have been sitting in heavenly places.

Mrs. Amanda Smith. (See page 453.)

The Treasure Island of Trinidad. (See page 453.)

At the evening service one of the bishops of the Church makes an able argument, intended to show that the proper, devout discharge of the plain everyday duties of life is a perpetual act of worship. The rest of the evening is spent in conversation blended with music, instrumental and in song, an honored visitor being the chief Moravian bishop, who is styled "brother" by his entertainers, and whose quiet, unpretending dignity befits his ecclesiastical rank.

A WASTER'S FRIEND.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 27: "Likewise I say unto you there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." Luke 15: 10.

THERE was no doubt as to the character of Finlay McInnes. That was thoroughly established. An iron-moulder, using the language of the trade, said he was a "waster," meaning that he was spoiled and useless. A Scotchman said he was a "ne'er-do-weel," and a pious deacon spoke of him as a "reprobate." There was no denying that Finlay was a bad character. But there was good in him. Many a deed of kindness, many a friendly sympathizing act showed that. He was like a neglected garden in which beautiful flowers and fruits were overgrown by rank weeds, which choked them, as well as concealed them.

One curious feature about Finlay was that the man seemed to have lost his individuality. He was gregarious, and sociable. At school he was not so much a bad boy as one of the worst class in the school. He had been one of the hands in a mill. He had been one of the soldiers in a regiment, allying himself, naturally with the worst men in it. He had been one of a herd of "drunks" in the police court, and one of the prisoners in State's prison. Political speakers regarded him only as one of the voters, and probably purchasable. Social reformers meant Finlay McInnes and his friends when they declaimed about the "masses." It seemed as if he had not stamina enough to assert himself, but must be merged with many more before he had any weight in society. He was dirty, idle, shiftless, drunken, and seemed to make no effort to be anything better; which meant, as it always does, that he was sinking to something worse. There are many of his type in every community.

One day, McInnes entered a horse-car. He was in the intermediate condition between sobriety and drunkenness, in which he passed most of his time before evening, when he generally took the step lower. There was only one vacant seat, and he dropped heavily into it. The lady next to him drew her skirts away from his dusty trousers, and the gentleman on the other side shifted his position to leave a few inches between them. McInnes saw it, and smiled grimly. He was used to this avoidance of him by respectable people. But something occurred before he left the car that he was not used to. The car had partly cleared and McInnes had one side almost to himself, when a gentleman entered, whom he did not know. He seated himself close to McInnes, and put out his hand.

"How are you, McInnes? I am glad to see you." McInnes concluded the man must be a politician wanting his vote, but he did not look that kind of man. However, he was always sociable, so he grasped the white hand with a, "Same to you, sir."

"I have a few friends coming to tea with me on Saturday," the stranger went on; "I am a neighbor of yours though you don't know me yet. I would like to have you come, too. We shall have a little music and a little talk and a pleasant evening. What do you say?"

"Where is it?"

"Oh, in the next street to you. I'm the new rector of St. Paul's Church. But this is not to be a sermon. We clergymen are not always preaching, you know. This is to be a night off. You will meet some friends of yours. Several are coming. You can bring your pipe. There'll be smoking."

McInnes looked at the man in amazement, but he was evidently in earnest, so he accepted. The next day was Thursday. McInnes was not sure that he had not dreamed the invitation, but he knew it was fact when one or two of his acquaintances told him they also were invited.

Saturday was always a late night with McInnes. He had his week's wages that night, sometimes minus one or two days, when he was not sober enough to work. His wife, therefore, was surprised to see him come in early and begin industriously to "clean himself." That, too, was new, for he did not make a toilet for the saloon. She was still more surprised when about ten o'clock he came home sober, and announced that he should want her to go to church with him to-morrow. There was a new preacher at St. Paul's, and that was where he was going. She was mystified, but she was glad enough to go, and they went. Her attention was given more to Finlay than to the service, it seemed so strange to have him there. She saw the color come into his face when the clergyman announced that he and a few friends had decided to form a social club and the first meeting to settle the details would be at his house on Saturday night. She asked him about it after service, and he blushed again and smiled proudly. "Oh, yes, I'm going," he said. "ha! I'm one of the friends," he spoke of. He did not know I was one of the clergyman's friends, eh, Mary? Well, I am; he says McInnes straightened up and dropped in a slouching gait.

"I don't quite understand your plan," McInnes said the next Saturday evening. The clergyman, after outlining his idea of a regular weekly meeting, asked him what he thought of it. "But I agree to do what you want. There was a general laugh at the answer. McInnes was not discomposed. He went on. "You have treated me like a man. I begin to have some heart in me. Whatever you've got in your mind is for my good; I'm sure of that and I'll stick with you, sir."

That seemed to be the general impression of the plan was adopted. They would have let the arrangements to the clergyman, but he would not have that. A regular committee must be formed and the men must manage it themselves. He would be president if they liked, would do and read to them, or talk with them, but they must settle it.

After this the saloon saw McInnes no more. He was a friend of the clergyman, and it was not fitting for a clergyman's friend to be in a saloon. He went to church regularly, and the clergyman called at his home. "I was in the saloon but so much rubbish in a heap," he said one day a year afterward to the clergyman, "I picked me out, and made a man of me. I saved you my life."

"No you owe it to Christ who died for you." "Ah, sir, I should never have known Him had not seen Him in you. No one cared for me till you came."

"You are wrong there Finlay. When you turned from your sins there was joy among the angels of God as there always is, when one sinner repenteth, however little value the world sets on him, or he sets on himself."

THE LATE GEN. CLINTON B. FISK.

ALL over this broad land there are hearts that will grieve over the news that Gen. Fisk is dead. Among all our public men there are few whose departure would be more sorely mourned. As a sturdy American citizen, winning his way out of a boyhood of poverty and ignorance, education and affluence, we were proud of him. As a soldier, he won honor and renown. As a philanthropist, he earned the love and gratitude of a struggling race. As a politician, he had the confidence of an influential party. As a Christian man, believing in the Gospel

ing its principles in his life, the esteem of Christian men of all denominations. In the up of every worthy, citizen there is some point of comradeship, in touch with the life of Gen. Fisk.

He had been in failing health for months, having never fully recovered from his attack of la grippe. His death was unexpected. At the beginning of last week he was as usual, and the physicians made their efforts to relieve him impeded by fatty degeneration of the heart. He had symptoms of typhoid fever, which finally precipitated his end. On Wednesday morning crisis came. It was rheumatism of the heart, the doctors said, and the family was summoned to his bedside. They were only just in time. At 3.30 A. M., on July 9, his busy life closed.

Clinton B. Fisk was born in Livingston County, New York, Dec. 8, 1828, a singular coincidence, repeated afterward when he became a member of the Prohibition party, in a house in which he was born a distillery. He was named after Governor DeWitt Clinton. His father was a blacksmith, and the Rev. Wilbur Fisk, an eminent clergyman, removed to the place soon after his son's birth, and he took the place of his settlement. A few years later he died, leaving a wife and six children in

The boy could get no education after his father was apprenticed to a farmer when he was five years old. But he was eager for learning, and in the long nights of winter, studied by the light of the lamp. He learned to write and cipher, and was anxious to take another step in the learning, he carried his pet coon, which he aimed to do tricks, to a circus, and sold it. He bought a Latin grammar with the money. A copy of Shakespeare also came into his possession about the same time, the price of it being two days work hoeing the corn. By similar means, for money he acquired the Pilgrim's Progress and Uncle Tom's Cabin. They were studied as books were sure to be.

In his thirteenth year came an important event in his life. He was sent to school. His father, who was a farmer, was that he should have his employ till he was twenty-one. Fisk had become the wife of a wealthy man who was willing to have his step-son and the farmer good-naturedly released from his apprenticeship. He went to the academy, and he gained more there than at home. He formed the acquaintance of a pretty bright-eyed girl who afterward became his wife. In 1844, his course at the academy being ended, he taught school for a year. A visit to Coldwater, Mich., however, led him to the brother of the girl he loved, and he changed in his occupation. Her father was a lawyer, and he became a lawyer. He was sent to the bright youth, and probably finding what was the attraction that had drawn the visitor there, offered him a partnership in his business. Fisk accepted, and his business talents soon made themselves manifest. The business prospered and young Fisk became practically the head of the firm. He died Feb. 20, 1850.

He was in St. Louis, prospering in business, but he quitted it at the call to arms, and became its colonel, and went to the front. He distinguished himself under General Fremont. He was made Assistant Major-General. He was made Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and held that position until August, 1866, having it with conspicuous ability, tact, and judgment. It was his experience in that office that convinced him that the great need of the colored race was education, and he set himself diligently to the effort of providing the means. Out of his effort grew the Fisk University, at Nashville, Tenn., named after him, and of which he was president until his death. Gen. Grant appointed him also President of the Indian Commission, and that office too he also retained until the end. Beside these he was a trustee of Dickinson College and of Drew Seminary and of Albion College, Mich.

The Late Gen. Clinton B. Fisk.

Early in the Prohibition movement he became an enthusiastic member of the party and worked energetically in its interests. In 1884 he was candidate on that ticket for Governor of New Jersey, and in 1888 he was the unanimous choice of the 1,800 delegates at the Prohibition Convention for the Presidency. In spite of all these public calls on his time and energies, and though he was an active and prosperous business man, Gen. Fisk took a deep interest in religious and philanthropic movements, speaking at public meetings and helping and advising in mission work, and other efforts for the highest welfare of the people. His death leaves a gap in the ranks that it will be hard to fill.

Written expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 446.)

OVER THE BRINK.

THE suspense Metta Chapman endured, while she waited for her brother's answer to her letter, tried her severely. She found herself dreading, as much as longing, for its appearance. Her feelings were a revelation to herself. How much firmer a hold than she knew, must Heritage have gained on her affections, when she could be so agitated by the prospect of having to sever her acquaintance with him!

At last the letter came. Metta clutched it eagerly, and carried it off to her own room to read it in solitude. But even there, she was in no hurry to open it. In truth she dreaded to read. She laid it on her table, and sat irresolute. "This is cowardice," she said, suddenly taking it up. "I must know the truth."

It was as Corrigan had said, Mr. Chapman knew of the affair in a general way, but had not troubled himself about its details, or as to the person to blame, until his sister's letter came. That showed him that there were weighty reasons for his finding out the facts, for Metta had not been able to conceal her interest in the matter. Delos Chapman loved his sister tenderly, and the possibility of her becoming engaged to one unworthy of her, stirred him deeply. He had therefore made inquiries, and had found a young lady among the students who was an intimate friend of Miss Pressley. He broached the subject to her, but she, not knowing how far it was right to disclose the facts her friend had told her, told Mr. Chapman, she would prefer to have him speak to Dolly herself, who would tell him just as much or as little as she chose. He had gone with this lady to see Miss Pressley, and had found her willing to talk of the unhappy affair.

According to Dolly's story, Heritage had sought her out, when she and he were students at the college some four or five years before, had made love to her, won her affections, had become engaged to her, and had a few months afterwards, without any cause that she knew of, broken the engagement and deserted her, leaving her heart-broken. She insisted that she had given him no reason for his conduct, and believed that there was no reason except that he had never been sincere, had only made love to her for his own amusement, and when he became tired of it, had abandoned her. In Dolly's opinion Heritage was false and fickle, a selfish man, who had no compunction about trifling with a girl's affections.

"You must bear in mind, my dear sister, Delos Chapman wrote," this is an ex-parte statement, and there may be some facts, which Miss Pressley did not care to disclose, which may have justified Heritage's conduct. It is not fair to any one to come to a conclusion as to culpability, on the statement of an interested party. But this side of the case is the only one that I can get, here. I have tried to get the other, but Heritage's friends do not appear to know the facts, as he was of a reserved disposition. They do know, however, that there was an engagement, and that it was broken by Heritage. So far, this confirms Miss Pressley's story, but it gives no clue to the reasons he may have had for doing so. We cannot imagine his acting without reasons. He does not appear the kind of man, to act from mere caprice." I have read two chapters of his story, Parted Lives, in the Reflector, and I am bound to say they impress me favorably as the writing of a sincere, earnest, high principled man.

"For my own part, I do not condemn him, and will not, without hearing his explanation. Miss Pressley, even in our short interview, and with all the sympathy that her evident suffering naturally aroused in me, did not impress me as a very desirable wife for a highly intellectual man. She is well educated, but her mind seemed to me small, and her passions strong and not well regulated. I think it possible that unconsciously she may have colored her story, and perhaps, by long brooding have imagined some of the facts.

"Of course I draw my own inferences from your interest in the matter. If they are correct, you will have the right to demand an explanation from Heritage of this affair, and you ought to do so before entertaining any proposition of his for nearer relations. I shall pray that God will give you wisdom to guide you rightly in this momentous matter."

After reading this sensible letter, Metta sat for an hour in her room staring with dry eyes out of the window, her heart standing still with agony. Could it be that the man whom she had respected so highly, the talented educator, the professed Christian, the author of a religious story—could it be that he was a heartless trifler, or if not that, a man of fickle affections and a disposition of utter selfishness?

And did she love him? Her cheeks flushed with a deep crimson as the thought came. How could she help it, when she had thought him the soul of honor, and when he had betrayed his own attachment to her in every word and act since their acquaintance began? But now—what should she do? The hours passed, and the darkness of night wrapped the apartment in gloom, and yet the girl sat absorbed in her grief, trying to see her way clear, and praying for strength.

There may be a "philosophy of disenchantment," yet it is difficult to bear the disenchantment philosophically, and this is true, whether it be a human ideal that has been shattered, or a faith once sacredly and lovingly cherished, that has slipped from our grasp, leaving us to drift without anchor or chart upon the sea of uncertainty. There was a slight parallelism between Metta Chapman's disappointment and the discomposure, or rather discontent, of a young man who, one April day, was driving slowly along one of the numerous highways that led like focussing rays, into the city of Basserine.

A casual glance would have revealed that he was tall, though too largely built to be called slender, that his forehead was high and receding, with the hair combed back and twirled a little to the right, and that his features were all strongly defined, rendered more prominent by the fact that his face was cleanly shaven. A little closer inspection would have shown gray eyes, arched over by heavy brows and made keen and piercing by the intensely black iris. An artist would have declared at once that he was not sufficiently compact in his physique for a model, and even a less artistic judgment would have scarcely pronounced him an Apollo; yet there was a certain heartiness, an impulsive generosity in the rapid and slightly awkward swing of his large frame when he walked past you, that made you like him and give him your full confidence. A certain foreign expression in his face made one feel that he might have Scandinavian blood in his veins, but a few words would have quickly proclaimed him a thorough-going young American. "I wish—I wish," he said aloud, and then giving his horse a slight, absent-minded stroke with his carriage whip, he allowed his thoughts to ramble on at their own free will.

"Ah! yes. 'I wish, I wish.' It was the unsatisfied craving of the human heart, which like the grave itself, is always crying for more, for that which it has not or cannot attain. Even those who have drunk the cup of pleasure to satiety, go about with a wearied blase air, and cannot stifle the yearning for something that will fill the vacuum of the soul, the very discontent written on their faces being an index of the sense of a gnawing emptiness within.

And what was the one thing lacking in the life of Howard Wescott as he bowed along on that pleasant afternoon of April? He was by nature and training, a young man of deep moral earnestness, every fibre of his being revolting against that which was dishonorable and every force of his soul crying out for the attainment of the summum bonum of life. Antecedent to, or perhaps parallel with, this aspiration for moral good, was an intense longing for the truth, for without a knowledge of ultimate truth his logical mind plainly saw that there could be no basis for the ethical. The more hazy our assurance of truth, the more hazy our conceptions of the moral standard. And yet—mournful fact!—while his moral intuitions recoiled from the thought of the obliteration of all ethical relations, his grasp upon any system of truth was very feeble, and he felt himself mentally as well as morally "all at sea."

The causes of this melancholy state of mind may be briefly traced. During the war of secession his father had enlisted with a company of volunteers, and had fought bravely in a number of battles for two years, having gained some promotion; but at last, in one of the most sanguinary contests of that era of strife, he had fallen on the field, and his body had been brought home for burial in the village grave-yard. Howard was but a lad at the time, but as he stood, with his mother and young sister, looking down upon the pale, motionless features of his father, a feeling of fierce rebellion rushed in his heart and seemed to turn his scalding tears into globules of fire.

Yet time had exerted its wonted power, and the keenness of the grief had worn off by degrees. As he grew into young manhood his mother who had been left with a considerable patrimony, sent him to one of the best colleges of the Middle States, where he had graduated with honor a year before our introduction to him. He finally decided to take up the law as his profession, and was now in the office of his sister's husband, who was an attorney in the city of Basserine. He had already taken one course of lectures at a celebrated law school.

His father had been a devoted Christian, and Howard could still hear, in imagination, his voice lifted in earnest prayer in the village church. After her husband's death, Mrs. Wescott had striven to instil the principles of religion in the minds of her children, and Mary, the boy's sister, had at an early age become a professed Christian. For various reasons, chiefly because he was so occupied with his studies, Howard had adjourned coming to a definite decision on the question of religion, until he went to college. At a time of religious awakening in the college, during his Sophomore year when a number of his classmates were converted, he was powerfully moved, and was almost on the point of yielding.

At this crisis in his spiritual life an untoward event occurred. He was walking slowly up the gravel walk that led from the gymnasium to the dormitory, where he roomed, when he was overtaken by one of his fellow-students, a member of the Senior class. Howard's mind was engrossed with the religious themes that had been pressed upon his attention, and so he said, tentatively:

"McDane, what do you think of the religious awakening we are having?"

"I don't think much of it," responded the other, shrugging his shoulders.

"Why not?" in surprise.

"Because it's mere excitement, nothing but gush and sentiment. It is emotion run wild. Some of the fellows are being so carried away with the spasm of feeling that they have cast reason and good sense to the winds. Even several of the professors are losing their mental equilibrium."

"Why, McDane, what makes you take that view of the case?"

"Well, in the first place, no man with a sound, healthy cranium, can accept the Bible as the Word of God, according to my way of thinking, and I've read it a good deal. Yet these fiery, young quasi-evangelists are reading the Bible every day to their hearers, and are basing the whole revival upon it, confessedly so. Am I not right, Wescott?"

"Certainly."

"In the next place," pursued McDane, disdainfully, "the whole thing is unscientific, and therefore unreasonable. Our processes of thought are far in advance of those old Bible times, and I don't believe in going back over eighteen centuries of progress to find the criteria of truth. I should a great deal rather see a revival of scientific inquiry in the college. Why, just look at it! Since this religious frenzy has taken possession of the institution, the work of our literary societies has been lagging, recitations have been neglected, and the proper work of the college is at a stand-still."

"If the speakers are right, this matter of the soul is of more importance than mere mental education," said Wescott.

"But they are not right," said McDane, earnestly. "They are fanatical. They are superstitious. All these anthropomorphic ideas are ridiculous. Come with me and I will lend you a book that will show you how absurd they are.

It will cure you of any inclination toward emotional insanity.

Howard got the book, and hurrying to room, sat down to peruse it. It was in the evening, and as he feverishly devoured after page, lessons were forgotten, even the evening service at which he had promised to present, was banished from his mind. Morning was approaching before he laid the book aside and flung himself upon his couch for a few hours of sleep.

It was his first introduction to rationalist literature. It put the leaven of doubt into his mind. He would not go near the meetings that, and even dismissed the subject a curtly when several of his friends pressed upon his attention.

"It's no use to talk, fellows," he snapped, "don't believe in those meetings, I don't want to go to them, and I won't."

From that time he drifted by degrees from secret rationalism, then into open unbelief, finally into agnosticism, seeing no ground upon which to take his stand.

A few months before our meeting him he had lost his mother, who had died suddenly of a disease, without the opportunity of saying a word of farewell. It was a severe blow to the young man, who loved her with fond devotion and whose chivalrous attention to her had been a subject of remark in the village where he had been brought up. He seemed to regard upon the death of his mother as a piece of injustice to himself, entirely out of keeping with all our conceptions of a kind, over-ruling providence. What had she done, what had he done, what had anyone done, that such a calamity should befall? As he drove along on that day, musing on these problems, his frame of mind became more and more fierce, so that impulsively gave his horse a sharp stroke, and he regretted the next moment.

The quick leap of the animal caused him to look up, and as he did so, he caught sight of a "traction-engine" steaming along the road toward him. The highway at the meeting skirted the steep, sandy bank of a broad river. A tremor ran through the young man's body, for he knew that his horse was a nervous animal and would not want to pass a steam engine. Yet Howard felt that he could not stop the time to turn about and drive around the other road so far out of his way. He determined to try to pass.

Taking the reins firmly in hand, he took the animal, which was now holding his head high in the air and snorting ominously, by the whip. Several times the horse reared, but was urged on by his driver. He came within a few rods of the engine, and turned out to the right to pass by, driving in a few yards of the river-bank. The engine had stopped his engine to let Howard pass, and accidentally, or thoughtlessly, he touched a lever causing the steam to escape with a loud, hissing noise from one of the valves.

This so frightened Howard's horse that he reared wildly and then wheeled like a top around to the right. Frantic with terror the horse plunged from imaginary into real danger. He had been driven so near the bank that he wheeled about, his fore-feet, instead of resting on the solid ground, crashed down at the brink; the loose earth gave way beneath his weight, and the next instant horse, carriage and driver plunged over, rolling over and over the steep, sandy declivity in a tangled mass to the very edge of the river. The horse stopped fiercely, kicking and plunging, until he freed himself from the harness, and then scampering down by the river.

"I'm afraid the young man's killed," claimed one of the enginemen, running to the wreck below. "Oh, it's terrible! What do we do for him, if it's not too late?"

As the men, stood horror-stricken, on the bank, they saw Howard lying motionless on a broken carriage wheel.

(To be Continued.)

TAIN ENLIGHTENED.
The most effective arguments a use in urging sinners to seek of His readiness to receive them. of God, paradoxical as the ex- seem, that keeps them away. An incident is mentioned in the the late Rev. W. H. Burton, used in pressing the argument He says :
The war between England and English merchant ships used to by a man of war, and the hant ships were taken across a similar fashion. A French ssel had set out from some but she and her convoy had d by a storm, and she could protector. My father was the channel just off Plymouth, with this ship in great distress, mping hard to save the vessel and there was a strong south owing, a fair wind right into The French captain was doing uld—doing his very level best ay from the English coast, be- afraid that he would be taken d that his ship would be sold, ade a prisoner. My father told w his vessel went up alongside ssel, and said to the captain, do you not go into Plymouth? aptain looked as if he thought e making game of him, and they will take my ship, and e my men, and we shall be rs. But the fact was that rich merchant ship had left the he war had ceased, peace had , and there was no strife be- land France. When the good d to the French captain, he joy, and at once he took the and ran into Plymouth where tly safe, and his vessel was nd. That is just a picture of s of people are keeping them- rom rest and keeping them- rom peace! Knowing that heart is at enmity with God i, until they find that He has rough the blood of Christ.”

IN OF INFLUENCE.
ows when he labors for the any one what may be the re- ports. It may reach on from r until it may influence the erations yet unborn. One pen-air service in London, a rakened. “I am a crimson- she said. Conversion fol- len brought with her a young also received the Word and ot long afterwards that young lay on her death-bed, sent to her Christian friends: “I a hair’s breadth.” These the title and theme of a tract in a letter to a shipmaster’s ste. The little message was oly Spirit to convey the sav- of Christ to the shipmaster’s sband, on his return from a nazed at her conversion. At d furiously, because she had vivalist.” By-and-by better iled, and he, too, became an eand a diligent worker. And is sons is preparing for the ministry. So far the young last link added to the chain; ay it ends there?

SLIDER’S RETURN.
e evangelist, who has been in the suburbs of Birming- he following report of an ent: “Last Tuesday night, lose of our meeting, we were party of six persons walking , their seats near the front, o, determined way in which it was seen that they had e for a purpose. Seeing look on the countenance of e, well-built man, and feeling ght going on within, I gave While singing, the man, with down his cheeks, rose, went t form, sobbed and cried for e a few minutes had passed away, he could sing, ‘My God is reconciled.’ As he stood upon his feet, he asked to be allowed to say a few words; the request being very gladly complied with, he said, amidst tears and sobs, ‘Brothers and sisters, I was once a superintendent of a Sunday-school, the teacher of a large Bible-class. God having blessed me with good talents, I earned plenty of money, became a member of a Methodist society, but I fell through drink. A friend offered me a glass; I at first refused, but he pressed me again and again, only to take one glass. At last I yielded; I could not stop there, but went from the first to the second, and soon be- come addicted to drinking, lost the favor of God, became a backslider from Him I loved, until I became a drunkard. But I could not rest any longer, I was obliged to come to this meeting, and, thank God,’ he shouted, ‘I am again adopted in His fold.’ We all sang together after the testimony of the converted man. These persons walked from their homes, a distance of over two miles, to bring him to Christ.”

What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumu- lating in the glands of the neck, produces un- aightly lumps or swellings; which causes painful running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which developes ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or many other manifestations usually ascribed to “humors.” It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the worst possible features of both. Being the most ancient, it is the most general of all diseases or affections, for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood’s Sarsa- parilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished, often when other medicines have failed, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. For all affections of the blood Hood’s Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some of the cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms, be sure to give Hood’s Sarsaparilla a trial.

Hood’s Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists, $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. L. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

JOHNSON’S ANODYNE LINIMENT

ESTABLISHED 1810.

Unlike any Other. Originated by an Old Family Physician. THINK OF IT.

In use over 40 YEARS in one Family.

DR. J. S. JOHNSON & Co.—It is sixty years since I first learned of this now celebrated remedy for the com- mon ills of life—Johnson’s Anodyne Liniment; for more than forty years I have used it in my family. I say (unasked by you) I regard it one of the best and safest remedies that can be found, used internal or external, in all cases it is claimed to relieve or cure. O. H. INGALLS, Dea. 2d Baptist Ch., Bangor, Maine.

Should have Johnson’s Anodyne Liniment in the house for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cuts, Bruises, Cramps and Pains. Delays may cost a life. Relieves Summer Complaints like magic. Price, 35 cts. post-paid; 6 bot- tles, $2. Express paid, L. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass.

Every Mother

DO YOU WRITE?

The Nette Bly Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. A perfect pen—as good as the best, except that no gold pen is used. Useful to office men, collectors, salesmen, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Sample sent to any address on receipt of price. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal discounts.

WM. E. PIAGET & CO.,
301 Broadway, New York.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.!
Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

“MRS. WINSLOW’S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING.” SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

AGENTS WANTED.—Reliable man or woman to sell our patents in every county in the United States. Just out, retail for 25 cents to $6. $75 to $250 a month made for working for us. Address with stamp, C. E. Swartzbaugh & Co., Findlay, O.

prove these facts and you'll demand it. The best way is—try it. Costs little and every grocer has it.

Beware

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers are offering imitations which they claim to be Pearlina, or “the same as Pearlina.” IT’S FALSE—they are not.

Dinner Set, No. 131, 118 Pieces.

English Porcelain Stone China.

Premium with an order of $20.00.

Or packed and delivered at depot for $8.00 Cash. We have hundreds of other Sets, plain and decorated.

THE LONDON TEA CO., 805 Washington Street, Boston.

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

on your Boots and Shoes.

Awarded highest honors at

Phila., 1876	Frankfort, 1881
Berlin, 1877	Amsterdam, 1883
Paris, 1878	New Orleans, '84-5
Melbourne, 1880	Paris, 1889

and wherever exhibited.
Paris Medal on every bottle.
Beware of Imitations.

New York City, 21 East 14th Street.

METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC.

The most select musical school in the United States. Exceptional advantages: Voice, Piano-forte, Organ, Violin, Harmony and Languages. Successful musicians and eminent teachers comprise the faculty—all actually employed at the Conservatory. Prominent among them are: Dudley Buck, Albert R. Parsons, Director Piano-forte Department, Harry Rowe Shelley, Louis Arthur Russell, George M. Greene. Applicants without musical talent not accepted. Send for circular. H. W. Greene, Gen'l Mgr. C. B. Hawley, Musical Dir.

TRUITT'S VEGETABLE LOZENGE.

The Great Cure for Dyspepsia. You can eat anything you wish and at same time be cured. 50c. a box. Druggists or by mail J. F. TRUITT, Man'fr, Bridgeport, N. J.

THE HOUSEWIFE

4 months on trial for 10cts.

If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

She reckons well

who does her housecleaning and washing (or has her servants do this work) with PYLE'S PEARLINE.

Why?

Because Pearlina makes the largest saving all around; saves half the time; half the labor—more than half the wear. Do you know you don't have to rub the clothes when washed with Pearlina? This saves the woman and makes the clothes last longer (besides, they look better). What can be harder on woman's health than bobbing up and down over a wash-board? What can be harder on the clothes—anything harder don't exist.

Millions of women know these facts well; it takes many millions of pack- ages of PEARLINE to supply their demands for it. You have only to

WE are IMPORTERS of Tea and Coffee, China and Crockery, and do the largest Tea and Coffee business in Boston (direct with consumers). We also carry a large stock and sell at the lowest possible Cash prices Dinner and Tea Sets, Silver-plated Ware, Lamps, etc. To those who take the time and trouble to get up Clubs for Tea, Coffee, Spices and Extracts, we offer premiums. In buying Tea and Coffee from us you get full value for the money invested, and get a premium, and you get goods that are direct from the IMPORTERS. If you buy Tea and Coffee from your grocer you pay three or four profits and pay for a premium, but do not get it. In an article published in one of the largest dailies in this country, it was claimed the tea bought from the retail grocer showed a profit of 100 per cent. The moral is plain—buy from first hands. We have been doing business in Boston for 16 years, and the publishers of this paper will tell you of our undoubted reliability. We do a business of over $300,000 yearly, and our Cash sales of Dinner, Tea and Toilet Sets, Silver Ware, Lamps, etc., amounted to $41,000 in 1889, aside from our Tea and Coffee sales. (Rogers' Knives $3.50 per dozen). Our illustrated Price and Premium list tells the whole story. We like to mail it to all who write for it; it costs you nothing and will interest you. 120 pages. THE LONDON TEA CO., 805 Washington Street, Boston.

SENSIBLE WOMEN

all want FERRIS'

GOOD SENSE CORSET WAISTS.

THOUSANDS NOW IN USE.

Best for Health, Economy and Beauty.

BUTTONS at front instead of CLASPS. RING BUCKLE at hip for Hose support. Tape-fastened Buttons—won't pull off. Cord-Edge Buttons Holes—won't wear out. FIT ALL AGES—Infants to Adults. Sold by Leading RETAILERS everywhere. Send for Circular.

FERRIS BROS.,

Manufacturers,
341 BROADWAY, New York.
MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO, WHOLESALE WESTERN AGENTS.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY.

DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

Patented 1879-1885 1885-1886

No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An In- vention as Useful as the Sewing Ma- chine.

Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular

THE McDOWELL CO.,

6 West 14th Street, New York City.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

THE VOICE IN THE TWILIGHT.

I was sitting alone in the twilight,
With spirit troubled and vexed,
With thoughts that were morbid and gloomy,
And faith that was sadly perplexed.

Some homely work I was doing
For the child of my love and care,
Some stitches half wearily setting
In the endless need of repair.

But my thoughts were about "the building,"
The work some day to be tried;
And that only the gold and the silver
And the precious stones, should abide.

And remembering my own poor efforts,
The wretched work I had done,
And, even when trying most truly,
The meagre success I had won:

"It is nothing but 'wood, hay, and stubble,'" I said;
"It will all be burned—
This useless fruit of the talents
One day to be returned.

"And I have so longed to serve Him,
And sometimes I know I have tried;
But I'm sure when He sees such a building,
He will never let it abide."

Just then, as I turned the garment,
That no rent should be left behind,
My eye caught an odd little bungle
Of mending and patchwork combined.

My heart grew suddenly tender,
And something blinded my eyes
With one of those sweet intuitions
That sometimes make us so wise.

Dear child! she wanted to help me;
I knew 'twas the best she could do;
But oh, what a blotch she had made it—
The gray mis-matching the blue!

And yet—can you understand it?—
With a tender smile and a tear,
And a half-compassionate yearning,
I felt she had grown more dear.

Then a sweet voice broke the silence,
And the dear Lord said to me,
"Art thou tenderer for the little child Than I am tender for thee?"

Then straightway I knew His meaning,
So full of compassion and love,
And my faith came back to its Refuge,
Like the glad returning dove.

For I thought when the Master Builder
Comes down his temple to view,
To see what rents must be mended
And what must be builded anew,

Perhaps, as He looks o'er the building,
He will bring my work to the light,
And seeing the marring and bungling
And how far it all is from right,

He will feel as I felt for my darling,
And will say as I said for her,
"Dear child! she wanted to help me,
And love for me was the spur.

And, for the real love that was in it,
The work shall seem perfect as mine:
And because it was willing service,
I will crown it with plaudit divine."

And there, in the deepening twilight,
I seemed to be clasping a hand,
And to feel a great love constraining me,
Stronger than any command.

Then I knew by the thrill of sweetness
'Twas the hand of the Blessed One,
Which would tenderly guide and hold me
Till all the labor is done.

So my thoughts are nevermore gloomy
My faith no longer is dim;
But my heart is strong and restful,
And mine eyes are unto Him.

Mrs. Herrick Johnson.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Cause—Hood's Sarsaparilla. Effects—pure blood, all humors cured, a good appetite, healthy digestion, no dyspepsia, brain refreshed, whole system built up and strengthened. Try it.

SWEDISH GIFTS TO MISSIONS.

A VISIT has recently been paid to Sweden by the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission. He was invited there by a Christian pastor, who said he was sure that if his countrymen knew of the needs of China, as Mr. Taylor alone could present them, they would help him to send more missionaries. Mr. Taylor gladly complied, and has returned full of joy and thankfulness. The enthusiasm manifested was beyond his most sanguine expectations, and some of the gifts were a remarkable proof of devotion. He says:

"I was speaking at a large meeting, and told the story of a young lady in China who had taken off her jewelry and ornaments and given them to the Lord so be used in His work. At the end of the meeting a lady, dressed in deep mourning, came up to me and thrust into my hand a handsome little watch. It was a fine little thing of artistic workmanship, and I am sure she valued it very much. As she handed it to me she said, 'It is for the Lord Jesus.' I am sure the Lord thought very much of that gift. It is a true gift when we give to the Lord something which we miss ourselves.

"The average meeting was about two thousand, and if sometimes there might not be that number of people in the hall, it was because the hall was not large enough, but large numbers crowded the street. I have seen a row of men standing on a form, and another row on either side between the forms. When the collection was taken at this meeting there was a great trouble, for the people were so closely packed together that they could scarcely get at their pockets, but every one assisted, and hats were improvised into collection plates and passed round. One old sailor had put his few small coins into the hat, then, not content with that, as the hat was going away he plunged his hand into his pocket, and, taking out a large snuff-box, put it, snuff and all, in among the other offerings. When the collection was made up a gentleman bought the snuff-box and its contents for twenty Swedish crowns (about $6.50). When asked why he offered so much for that comparatively worthless box, the purchaser replied that it was well worth the money as a memorial of what religion could do, for it had been its owner's most treasured possession for many years."

A WORD WITH A MURDERER.

A MAN convicted of murder and lying under sentence of death, fell sick, and was visited by the prison surgeon, who tried to do something for his soul as well as for his body. He also asked pious friends to call upon him. They did so and spoke of the willingness of Christ to receive even the worst who came to Him. Nothing, however, made any impression. He seemed completely hardened. By-and-by a good old man visited the cell, and this is the account the prisoner gave of that visit. "Doctor," he said, "you don't understand how to do good to our souls; you kept saying, 'Repent, repent.' But that dear old man came and sat down beside me, and with an eye full of tenderness said to me, 'John, wasn't it wonderful goodness on the part of the Almighty that He should have loved us so much as to send His only begotten Son into the world to save such sinners as you and I?' Why, doctor, that word 'I' killed me; it killed me dead; I couldn't get over it, that he should put himself on the same level with me, a convicted murderer; I cannot keep it out of my mind." He never could, and it ended in his fleeing to Christ for pardon.

A COMPANION'S TAUNT.

THE UNREASONABLENESS of a drunken associate recently led to a young man's reform, and ultimately to his conversion. The Rev. William Ross states that he knew a youth, who was one of a party of friends who spent their evenings in a convivial manner. They persuaded a keeper of a liquor saloon to set apart, for their special use, a room in his basement, and they went there every night to drink, smoke and sing songs. One of the young men was converted, and the place knew him no more. Another of the party, who was his most intimate friend, separated from him when the change came, and continued his attendance at the club. His mother became ill, and desired him to stay at home with her; but even her pleadings were of no avail, he preferred the noise of the wine cellar to the quiet of his home. One evening his mother became so anxious and disturbed about him, that her daughter, fearing her anxiety might seriously affect her mind, volunteered to go and bring him home. The mother consented, and soon the girl stood at the door of the liquor saloon in which her brother sat. She sent in her name, and at once he came out. When he was told how anxious his mother was, on his account, he immediately agreed to return home, and going back to his companions, bade them good-night. As he passed out, he heard the remark, "It is a pity so clever a fellow as he should be tied to his sister's apron strings! I suppose he will be getting converted, like his friend?" The words rasped upon his feelings. They implied an unnatural disposition on the part of the speaker. It seemed to the young man that he must be very far sunk not to recognize in the sickness of a mother a call of duty. He wondered if he himself would sink as low as this if he continued to drink and associate with them. He felt it was possible, and he resolved that that should be the last time he would ever enter that place. And he kept his resolution, bringing joy to the hearts of his mother and sister, which joy was redoubled when a short time afterwards he gave his heart to Christ.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

BOUNTING BILLOWS
ON THE SEA.

or the pure Mountain Breezes will soon invite your presence. Make your leisure twice the pleasure, by taking along our entertaining music.

(If you have no Guitar, Mandolin, Banjo, Flute or Violin, call or send for lists of fine instruments at our branch store, J. C. HAYNES & Co., 33 Court Street, Boston.)

OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Price, $1.00. Arranged for Piano.

YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces. Price, $1.00.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. 38 beautiful Melodies, finely arranged. Price $1. Vol. 2 of Miss Eleanor W. Everett's ALBUM OF SONGS. 12 first-class Songs by the best authors. Price $1.

COLLEGE SONGS. New, enlarged edition. 82 jolly songs. 200,000 sold. Price 50 cents. OLD FAMILIAR DANCES. For the Piano. 100 of them. Easy, and as merry as they can be. 50 cents.

FOR MUSIC FESTIVALS.

THE ATLAS. By Carl Zerrahn. 29 splendid Choruses. Sacred and Secular. Most of them quite new. $1.

Any book mailed for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.

C. H. DITSON & Co., 367 Broadway, New York.

PIANOS
$150 to $1500

PRICE
$180

Sent Direct to families. No Middle-men.

UNIVERSITY
ESTAB. 1850. INCOR. 1877

They Lead the World!

Sent for trial in your own home.

ABSOLUTELY PERFECT

Guaranteed Six Years.

DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!

Cat. Free.

MARCHAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
235 E. 21st St., N.Y.

ORGANS
$35 to $500

WINNOWN SONGS By Ira D. Sankey. Is the latest, largest, strongest, cheapest and best Sunday School Song Book published. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If by mail 5 cents per copy additional.

Biglow & Main, New York & Chicago. The John Church Co., Cincinnati & New York.

FRUIT DIET is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 77 Broadway, New York City.

WANTED.—A situation in a school or private family is desired by a graduate of three years' experience. Will teach English, Mathematics, French, Latin, Vocal and Instrumental Music. Best references. Please state terms. Address MISS MOFFETT, Brownsburgh, Rockbridge Co., Virginia.

Rubifoam

FOR THE TEETH

DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED DENTIFRICE
Cleanses, Preserves, Beautifies

LARGE BOTTLES, PRICE 25 CENTS

Sample Vial sent free to any address

PREPARED AND GUARANTEED BY
E. W. HOYT & Co., LOWELL, MA.

MANUFACTURERS OF THE Celebrated Hoyt's German Cologne

To Mothers

If for any reason you cannot give your child, we can assure you that there is but one Food that is tically a perfect imitation of Milk in composition and digestibility and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly of milk.

All manufacturers of Infant make the broad claim that it is the best, but few, if any, tell you what it is composed of or of what it is composed of facts told to any intelligent mother would condemn most of them. CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is adapted for Infants from six weeks upwards, and for Invalids, Age and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of giving any other Food, do not fail to send us for a pamphlet of 64 pages Our Baby's First and Second Year by Marion Harland, which contains a minute description of Lactogen and Carnrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Send for it. Read the above pamphlet, ask your Physician which Food is the nearest approach to mother's milk. REED & CARNRICK, New York.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

CHANCE FOR TRIAL

To Enjoy a Cup of Tea, send for a TRIAL of 3 1/2 pounds of Fine Oolong, Japan, Imperial, or Young Hyson, Mixed Breakfast or Sun Tea, by mail on receipt of 25 cents. Circular and state what you want. Greatest inducement ever offered for our celebrated Teas, Coffees, and Powder. For full particulars address THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., P.O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., N.Y.

TYPEWRITE

Largest like establishment in the world. Second-hand Instruments at half price. Unprejudiced advice given on all machines sold on monthly payments. All machines manufactured shipped, privilege of EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Wholesale to dealers. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

TYPEWRITER { 70 Broadway, N.Y.
HEADQUARTERS. { 144 La Salle St., N.Y.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST

His life in those days when he gathered His last out of both Jew and Gentiles, that their spirit, soul and body served blameless to receive the Lord at His coming. Rom. ix, 4; Isa. xl, 11, 12; Rev. vii, 4; Rev. xiv, 1; 1 Thess. v, 20, 21, 22; 1 Cor. Phil. iii, 21; Mark xlii, 20; Math. xxiv, 14, 11, 22, 23; Rev. xxi, 1, 4, 5; John xiv, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23; 1 John ii, 28, 29. Information can be obtained in two directions in German and English, at 12c, each. J. WEILE, 143 N. Sixth St., Brooklyn.

RIDGE'S FOOD

Will be found in every household. Cholera, dysentery, and all summer ailments. Children or adults. Medicine not with it. A sustaining food when else fails. 4 sizes.

A LADY WANTED in every woman's hands. Just issued. Quick Sale. Home Circles Free. E. B. TREAT, Publisher.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 30. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 23, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, 1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PICTURES FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BROUGHT FROM JERUSALEM BY DR. TALMAGE.
THE WIDE-OPEN DOOR. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
THE MEWARD BOUND. A Story of the S. S. Text.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: An Ingenious Time Register, Etc.
THE PRODIGAL SON. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE INSPIRING EXPECTATION. By Dr. Baldwin.
JOHNSTOWN A YEAR LATER. By Viator.
The Trouble in Japan—An Operation Averted—A Rescued Unfortunate—An Indian's Thanks—A Priest's Dilemma—A Dying Welshman's Trust—Mr. Stanley's Lost Gun—How an Infidel was Convinced, Etc.
PICTURE OF DR. PARKE TREATING LIEUT. STAIRS' WOUND.

ALL THE DAY LONG. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: The Palestinian Census—Jesus in the Temple.
PICTURE OF THE CENTRAL AFRICAN DWARFS FEASTING ON SNAKES.
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)

PICTURES FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BROUGHT FROM JERUSALEM.

1. The Damascus Gate of Jerusalem—2. Women in Oriental Costume—3. The Ecce Homo Arch—4. The Walled-up Golden Gate of Jerusalem.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

THE WIDE-OPEN DOOR.

"And, behold, a door was opened in heaven." Rev. 4: 1.

The Exiled Apostle—Suffering for Faithful Preaching—A Contrast Between Him and Napoleon—A Barren Home—Other Seers Uncomfortably Located—Bunyan's View of the Open Door—Its Suggestions—A Door through which God Looks—Nothing too Humble to Attract His Notice—An Entrance for Prayers—Rhetoric Unnecessary—An Opening for Human Vision—Consolations the Sight Imparts—An Entrance for the Christian—The Door Still Open—An Invitation to Sinners.

JOHN had been the pastor of a church in Ephesus. He had been driven from his position in that city by an indignant populace. The preaching of a pure and earnest gospel had made an excitement dangerous to every form of iniquity. This will often be the result of pointed preaching. Men will flinch under the sword strokes of truth. You ought not to be surprised that the blind man makes an outcry of pain when the surgeon removes the cataract from his eye. It is a good sign when you see men uneasy in the church pew and exhibiting impatience at some plain utterance of truth which smites a pet sin that they are hugging to their hearts. After the patient has been so low that for weeks he said nothing and noticed nothing, it is thought to be a good sign when he begins to be a little cross. And so I notice that spiritual invalids are in a fair way for recovery, when they become somewhat irascible and choleric under the treatment of the truth. But John had so mightily inculcated public iniquity that he had been banished from his church and sent to Patmos, a desolate island, only a mile in breadth, against whose rocky coasts the sea rose and mingled its voice with the prayers and hymnings of

The Heroic Exile.

You cannot but contrast the condition of this banished apostle with that of another famous exile. Look at the apostle on Patmos and the great Frenchman on St. Helena. Both were suffering among desolation and barrenness because of offences committed. Both had passed through lives eventful and thrilling. Both had been honored and despised. Both were imperial natures. Both had been turned off to die. Yet mark the infinite difference: one had fought for the perishable crown of worldly authority, the other for one eternally lustrous. The one had marked his path with the bleached skulls of his followers, the other had introduced peace and good-will among men. The one had lived chiefly for self-aggrandizement and the other for the glory of Christ. The successes of the one were achieved amid the breaking of thousands of hearts and the acute, heaven-rending cry of orphanage and widowhood, while the triumphs of the other made joy in heaven among the angels of God.

The Exile of St. Helena.

The heart of one exile was filled with remorse and despair, while the other was lighted up with thanksgiving and inextinguishable hope. Over St. Helena gathered the blackness of darkness, clouds lighted up by no sunrising, but rent and fringed and heaving with the lightnings of a wrathful God, and the spray flung over the rocks seemed to hiss with the condemnation: "The way of the ungodly shall perish." But over Patmos the heavens were opened, and the stormy sea beneath was forgotten in the roll and gleam of waters from under the throne like crystal, and the barrenness of the ground under the apostle was forgotten as above him he saw the trees of life all bending under the rich glow of heavenly fruitage, while the hoarse blast of contending elements around his suffering body was drowned in the trumpeting of trumpets and the harping of harps, the victorious cry of multitudes like the voice of many waters and the hosanna of hosts in number like the stars.

What a dull spot upon which to stand and have such a glorious vision! Had Patmos been some tropical island, arbored with the luxuriance of perpetual summer and drowsy with breath of cinnamon and cassia, and tessellated with long aisles of geranium and cactus, we would not have been surprised at the splendor of the vision. But the last place you would go to if you wanted to find beautiful visions would be the island of Patmos. Yet it is around such gloomy spots that God makes the most wonderful revelation. It was looking through the awful shadows of a prison that John Bunyan saw the gate of the celestial city. God there divided the light from the darkness. In that gloomy abode, on scraps of old paper picked up about his room, the great Dream was written. It was while John Calvin was a refugee from bloody persecution and was hid in that he conceived the idea of writing his immortal Institutes. Jacob had many a time seen the sun breaking through the mists and kindling them into shafts and pillars of fiery splendor that might well have been a ladder for the angels to tread on, but the famous ladder which he saw soared through a gloomy night over the wilderness. The night of trial and desolation is the scene of the grandest heavenly revelations. From the barren, surf-beaten rock of Patmos, John looked up and saw that a door was opened in heaven.

A House at Angouleme,

Again: The announcement of such an opened entrance suggests the truth that God is looking down upon the earth and observant of all occurrences. If we would gain a wide prospect, we climb up into a tower or mountain. The higher up we are the broader the landscape we behold. Yet our most comprehensive view is limited to only a few leagues—here a river and there a lake and yonder a mountain peak. But what must be the glory of the earth in the eye of Him who, from the door of heaven, beholds at one glance all mountains and lakes and prairies and oceans, lands bespangled with tropical gorgeousness and arctic regions white with everlasting snows, Lebanon majestic with cedars and American wilds solemn with unbroken forests of pine, African deserts of glistening sand and wildernesses of water unbroken by ship's keel, continents covered with harvests of wheat and rice and maize, the glory of every zone, the whole world of mountains and seas and forests and islands taken in a single Glance of their Creator.

As we take our stand upon some high point, single objects dwindle into such insignificance that we cease to see them in the minutiae, and we behold only the grand points of the scenery. But not so with God. Although standing far up in the very tower of heaven, nothing by reason of its smallness escapes His vision. Every lily of the field, every violet under the grass, the tiniest heliotrope, aster and gentian are as plainly seen by Him as the proudest magnolia, and not one vein of color in their leaf deepens or fades without His notice. From this door in heaven God sees all human conduct and the world's moral changes. Not one tear of sorrow falls in hospital or workshop or dungeon but He sees it and in high heaven makes record of its fall. The world's iniquities in all their ghastliness glower under His vision. Wars and tumults and the desolations of famine and earthquake, whirlwind and shipwreck, spread out before Him. If there were no being in all the universe but God, He could be as from the door of heaven. But there He stands, no more disturbed by the fall of a kingdom than the dropping of a leaf, no more excited by the rising of a throne than the bursting of a bud, the falling of a deluge than the trickling of a raindrop. Earthly royalty clutches nervously its sceptre and waits in suspense the will of inflamed subjects and the crown is tossed from one family to another. But above all earthly vicissitude and the assault of human passions, in unshaken security stands the King of kings, watching all the affairs of His empire from the introduction of an era to the counting of the hairs of your head.

Happy with Such an Outlook

Again: I learn from the fact that a door in heaven is opened, that there is a way of entrance for our prayers and of egress for divine blessings. It does not seem that our weak voice has strength enough to climb up to God's ear. Shall not our prayer be lost in the clouds? Have words wings? The truth is plain. Heaven's door is wide open to receive every prayer. Must it not be loud? Ought it not to ring up with the strength of stout lungs? Must it not be a loud call, such as drowning men utter or like the shout of some chieftain in the battle? No; a whisper is as good as a shout, and the mere wish of the soul in profound silence is as good as a whisper. It rises just as high and accomplishes just as much.

But ought not prayer to be made up of golden words if it is to enter such and live beside seraphim and archangel? Ought not every phrase be rounded into perfection, ought not the language be musical, and classic, and poetic, and rhetorical? No, the most illiterate outcry, the unjointed petition, the clumsy phrase, the sentence breaking into grammatical blunders, an unworded groan, is just as effectual if it be the utterance of the soul's want. A heart all covered up with garlands of thought would be no attraction to God, but a heart broken and contrite, that is the acceptable sacrifice. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," rising up in the mighty harmony of a musical academy may overpower our ear and heart, but it will not reach the ear of God like the broken voiced hymn of some sufferer amid rags and desolation looking up trustfully to a Saviour's compassion, singing amid tears and pangs, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

A Splendid Door

I suppose that there was more rhetoric and classic elegance in the prayers of the Pharisees than of the publican, but you know which was successful. You may kneel with complete elegance on some soft cushion at an altar of alabaster, and utter a prayer of Miltonic sublimity but neither your graceful posture nor the roll of your blank verse will attract while over some dark cellar in which Christian pauper is prostrate in the straw, angel bend from their thrones and cry one to another "Behold, he prays!" Through this open door of heaven what a long procession of prayers continually passing! What thanksgivings! What confessions! What intercessions! What beseechings! "And behold a door was opened in heaven."

Heavenly Attention,

Again: The door of heaven is opened to allow us the opportunity of looking in. Christ when He came from heaven to Bethlehem, left open, and no one since has dared to shut it. Matthew threw it still wider open when he came to write, and Paul pushed the door further back when he spoke of the glory to be revealed, and John in Revelation actually points us to the harp and the waters, and the crowns, and the throne. There are profound mysteries about that blessed place that we cannot solve. But look through this wide open door of heaven and see what you can see. God means us to look and catch up now something of the rapture, and attune our hearts to its worship.

A Sight of Christ.

It is wide open enough to see Christ. Behold Him, the chief among ten thousand, all the bannered pomp of heaven at His feet. With your enkindled faith look up along these ranks of glory. Watch how their palms wave and hear how their voices ring. Floods clapping their hands, streets gleaming with gold, uncounted multitudes ever accumulating in number and ever rising up into gladder hosannas. You cannot stand to look upon that joy for at least one hour, how could you endure to dwell among it forever? You would wish yourself out of it in three days and choose the ear again or any other place where it was not always Sunday.

My hearer in worldly prosperity, affluent, honored, healthy and happy, look in upon the company of the redeemed, and see how the poor soul in heaven is better off than you are, brighter in apparel, richer in estate, higher in power. Hearers, afflicted and tried, look in through the open door that you may see to what gladness and glory you are coming, to what life, to what riches, to what royalty. Hearers pleased with fascination with this world, gather up your purs for one appreciative look upon riches that never fly away, upon health that never falters, upon sceptres that never break, upon expectations that are never disappointed. Look and see if there are not enough crowns to pay us for all our battles, enough rest to relieve our fatigues, enough living fountains to quench all our thirst, enough glory to dash out forever and ever all earth's sighing and restlessness and darkness. Battles ended, tears wiped away, thorns plucked from the bosoms, stabs healed, the tomb riven—what a scene to look upon!

To Admit the Believer.

Again: The door of heaven stands open for the Christian's final entrance. Death to the righteous is not climbing high walls or fording deep rivers, but it is entering an open door. If you ever visit the old homestead where you were born and while father and mother are yet alive, as you go up the lane in front of the farm-house and you put your hand on the door and lift the latch, do you shudder with fear? No, you are glad to enter. So your last sickness will be only the lane in front of your Father's house from which you hear the voice of singing before you reach the door. And death, that is the lifting of the latch before you enter greetings and embraces of the innumerable family of the righteous. Nay there is no latch, for John says the door is already open. What company of spirits have already entered those portals, bright and shining. Souls released from the earthly prison house, how they shout! As they went through! Spirits that sped up from the flames of martyrdom making heaven richer as they went in, pouring their notes into the celestial harmony.

Still Open.

And that door has not begun to shut. If redeemed by grace, we all shall enter it. This side of it we have wept, but on the other side of it we shall never weep. On this side we may have grown sick with weariness, but on the other side of it we shall be without fatigue. On this side we bleed with the warrior's wounds, on the other side we shall wave the victor's palm. When you think of dying what makes your brow contract, what makes you breathe so deep and sigh? What makes you gloomy in passing a graveyard? Follower of Christ, you have been thinking that death is something terrible, the measuring of lances with a powerful antagonist, the closing in of a conflict which may be your everlasting defeat. You do not want much to think of dying. The step beyond this life seems so mysterious you dread the taking of it. Why, who taught you this lesson of horrors? Heaven's door is wide open, and you step out of your sick room into those portals. Not as long as a minute will elapse between your departure and your arrival there. Not half so long as the twinkling of an eye. Not a millionth part of an instant. There is no tumbling into darkness. There is no plunging down into mysterious depths. The door is open. This instant you are here, the next you are there. When off the French coast, while the crew were upon the beach, a cage of birds in the ship's cabin, awakened, began to sing most sweetly and when the last man left the vessel they were singing yet. Even so in the last hour of our dissolution when driven on the coast of the other world may our disembarkation from this rough, tossing life be amid the eternal singing of a thousand promises of deliverance and victory!

A Vessel Struck the Rocks

For all repenting and believing souls the door of heaven is now wide open, the door of mercy, the door of comfort, for the poorest as well as the wealthiest, for the outcast as well as for the moralist, for Chinese coolie as well as his emperor, for the Russian boor as well as the Czar, for the Turk as well as the Sultan. Richer than all wealth, more refreshing than all fountains, deeper than all depths, higher than all heights, and broader than all breadths is the salvation of Jesus Christ which I press upon your consideration. Come all ye travellers of the desert under these palm-trees. Oh, if I could gather before you that tremendous future upon which you are invited to enter—dominions and principalities, day without night, martyrs under the throne and the four and twenty elders falling before it, stretching off in great distances the hundred and forty and four thousand, and thousands of thousands, host beside host, rank beyond rank, in infinite distance, nations of the saved beyond nations of the saved, until angelic visions cease to catch anything more than the faint outline of whole empires yet outstretching beyond the capacity of any vision save the eye of God Almighty. Then, after I had finished the sketch, I would like to ask you if that place is not grand enough, and high enough, and if anything could be added, any purity to the whiteness of the robes, any power to the acclaiming thunders of its worship. And all that may be yours.

THE TROUBLE IN JAPAN.

THE work of the missionaries in Japan, which some months ago was most hopeful, and promised better results than work in any other field, has suddenly become difficult and meets with opposition. A writer in the Spirit of Missions gives a clue to the cause of the change. He says that much of the difficulty has arisen from the supercilious behavior of Americans and Europeans in their manner to the Japanese. Their assumption of superiority, and neglect of the courtesies of ordinary life have hurt native pride, and stirred the resentment of the people. The Japanese people are very sensitive, and they have had just cause for indignation and resentment. A minister of the United States to Japan, in a public address just before he left for his post, spoke of the Japanese as "as our little brown friends over the water." The Emperor of Japan and his ministers naturally took umbrage at such words spoken on such an occasion by one who was the accredited representative of his country, and many are the affronts and the aggressions which the sensitive Japanese have had to endure from both the official and unofficial classes of foreigners. The presence of non-missionary foreigners is, after a time not desired in any Asiatic country because of their contemptuous and overbearing conduct toward the natives of the lower class, and the condescending and patronizing air of many of even the better class of foreigners.

This is much to be deplored, and it is not exaggerated. Even in ordinary life at home we see much of it. There is no man in humble life who does not have to submit to this thinly concealed contempt from his superiors in wealth and station. There is more truth than at first sight appears in the Apostle's remark, that the greatest of all gifts is love, that is not puffed up and that thinketh no evil.

AN OPERATION AVERTED.

AN incident of Divine healing, of a well attested character, is reported by Mrs. Montgomery (Carrie Judd) in her Triumphs of Faith. It occurred recently in Toronto where a Home in which healing through faith in Christ is taught and practised, has been opened. It is called Bethany Home, and Mrs. R. I. Fletcher, who conducts it, tells the story. The following are the facts taken from her narrative:

The first guest in the Home was a dear Scotch girl about twenty, a stranger in a strange land, suffering with ovaritis. After being in the general Hospital for three months, she left rather worse than on entering. She then spent six months in "St. John's Hospital," and while there, at a consultation held by five doctors, it was decided she must choose between a fearful operation, or a life of suffering. She decided for the latter and left the hospital suffering intensely and thoroughly disheartened; her physician remarking to her at that time that she would be back to them in a few weeks, thankful to undergo it, as she could not long endure the life of suffering that was before her. About a week later the Lord led me to her, and as I told her of the Great Physician who still goes about healing all manner of diseases, and of the wonders God had done for me under similar suffering, the spirit carried the truth home to her heart.

She afterward called at the Home for conversation on the subject and was persuaded to remain with us for at least a week. One week from that day she accepted the Lord as her Healer, and such a transformation as immediately took place in her was indeed marvellous to behold.

The next day she was on foot from early morning until late at night, and when retiring, remarked: "I have hardly had an ache or pain this whole day." Only those who had witnessed her sufferings for a whole year previous, and knew how much she was obliged to lie in bed, could fully realize all that this meant. The day following she left us, perfectly healed by the Lord Himself. Since then she has called to see us fairly radiant—Christ being literally the "health of her countenance." And above all the Master is using her greatly in making her life a blessing to others.

A RESCUED UNFORTUNATE.

THOSE who are sceptical about the success of efforts to reach the girls who are leading immoral lives in our great cities, have no difficulty in finding facts to support their belief, but there are many instances of a different character which prove that the attempt to rescue individual women is worth making, and is often blessed with success. Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston, tells the story of one such case in his Watchword. It shows how the kindly word of Mrs. McCosh, the wife of the eminent ex-President of Princeton, touched a heart apparently beyond the reach of Christian influence, and led to the salvation of many souls. The story, which is told at length by Dr. Gordon, is briefly as follows:

Margaret was led astray very early: found herself at the age of fifteen betrayed and left; broke out into passion and riot in the open street, and was laid hold of by the police; and thus began a wretched, independent life, though mercifully preserved from falling much farther at the time. Living with a blind fiddler, James McLaughlin, a Roman Catholic, somewhere in Belfast, she was much addicted to drink.

One day a lady called at her door and asked her to attend a meeting. It was Mrs. McCosh, and she spoke so simply and kindly that the rough hard heart was touched, and Margaret promised to come. She returned from the meeting a more miserable woman than she went. She continued thus miserable for five months; and, as she said, thoughts of self-destruction more than once crossed her mind. The sight of three funerals at one time, proceeding along near a place where three roads met, was also the means of deepening her conviction; a voice within kept asking: "If one of these were yours, where would your soul be?"

At length, one day, as she walked around a well-known square in Belfast, revolving such thoughts, and regardless of the presence of passers-by, her soul went up in a cry to God that He would save her! "She would wear sackcloth forever, if only God would save her!" And there, as she walked, the answer came. She passed unconsciously into peace with God, through the shed blood of Jesus Christ. There was then, much to do. One of the first things was that she and James had to be married! He too was brought too Christ, and seemed even more in earnest than his wife. Packing all their earthly goods into a barrel, they crossed by steamer to Glasgow, not knowing anyone there. They took up their abode in the lowest and most vicious quarter of the city, and there, earning their own living, and working for Christ among those who were leading the life they had quitted, many were led to believe by them who had resisted all other efforts. Margaret and her husband died last year rejoicing in faith having given their last years to Christ and His work.

PICTURES FROM JERUSALEM.

ANOTHER group of illustrations, reproduced from the photographs brought by Dr. Talmage from the Holy Land, will be found this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The publisher is glad to learn that these pictures are much appreciated by the readers of this journal, and that preachers, Sunday-school teachers, and Christian workers are helped by them to a clearer understanding of the Bible. The scriptural allusions to Oriental places, manners and customs are often obscure to the Western mind, and in consequence we frequently miss the teaching they are intended to convey. It is worthy of note that the better these allusions are understood, and the more the ancient cities and buildings are examined, and the habits of the people observed, the more beautiful, and full of truth and meaning the Bible becomes. Like God's works in nature, and unlike man's work in art or manufacture, His word bears the most minute study, and gains by increased light being shed upon it. One of the pictures in this number gives an idea of the garb of Oriental women, and the other three are of scenes in the walls of Jerusalem. Looking at them we may in imagination obey the injunction of the poet King: Walk about Zion and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following."

The Damascus Gate,

which is the subject of the illustration in panel No. 1 is one of the most ancient portions of the wall now standing. It is believed to have formed part of the wall erected by Antipater, the father of the Herod who, in B. C. 43, rebuilt and beautified the city. If that is true, and the best students and archaeologists believe that it is so, this gate existed in the time of Christ, and from its position, would probably be the gate through which He passed bearing His cross on the way to Calvary. The very possibility that it may have been the exit from which he emerged when "He suffered without the gate," calls up in the beholder the most solemn and tender emotions as of a place sanctified by His humiliation, a type of the path the Christian is called to tread as he goes after Him without the camp, bearing His reproach.

The Damascus Gate is one of the four chief gates in the wall which now surrounds Jerusalem, and which probably follows with some variations the ancient wall which Nehemiah repaired under such difficulties as he describes in his fourth chapter. From the remarkable massiveness of its construction, it is believed to antedate the portions of the wall connected with it. In former numbers of this journal, the characteristics of the gates of a city have been pointed out, with the significance of the references to them as places of concourse, of judgment, and of solemn covenant. These characteristics applied to the Damascus Gate, which, as it would be the one used by merchants and traders going to and from Damascus would naturally be of the first importance.

Connected with the Damascus Gate, by a passage, are the vast underground quarries on which, as well as out of which, the city may be said to be built. From them have been hewn, in past ages, the massive limestone blocks which appear in the walls and elsewhere. In these dark chambers one may, with the help of torches, wander for hours, scrambling over mounds of rubbish; now climbing into one chamber, now descending into another, noting the various cuttings, grooves, cleavages, and hammer marks and wondering at the different shapes—bars here, slices there, boulders there, thrown up together in utter confusion. These are no doubt the subterranean retreats referred to by Josephus as occupied by the despairing Jews in the last days of the siege of Jerusalem.

The Golden Gate,

(a picture of which appears in panel No. 4 of the first page illustration) is the most famous of all the gates of Jerusalem, though, being walled up, it is a gate, in the usual sense, no longer. The tradition exists among the Moslems, that if ever the city is wrested from their hands, it will be by a conqueror who will enter by the Golden Gate, and to prevent such a loss they have securely built up the gate. Another tradition in which they sincerely believe is connected with this gate. From the wall at its side projects the fragment of a beautiful porphyry pillar springing from the side of the massive slab over the gate. On this the Moslems believe that Mohammed will take his stand at the last day to judge the nations who will be assembled in the valley of Jehoshaphat beneath the wall.

The gate is a double arch of exquisite workmanship in the eastern wall of the Temple area. There can be no question of its great antiquity, in the mind of any spectator. The surface of the stone is actually crumbling into dust with the passage of the centuries. The blocks beneath it, which at once close the entrance and support the arch, are modern and in sharp contrast to the arch itself. They have been placed there since the Crusades; for at that time the gate was in use once a year. It was opened on Palm Sunday and closed on all the other days of the year. Its opening on that day was to commemorate the one day of triumph in the life of the Saviour when He entered the city for the last time. Tradition has it that it was by the Golden Gate that He came in, riding on the ass, while the people strewed garments and branches of trees in the way, and cried, Hosanna to the Son of David! In this case there is a strong probability in favor of the tradition, as the road from Bethany, where He spent the previous day, would naturally lead Him to the Golden Gate.

What emotions rise in the mind as the devout traveller takes his stand on the gate and thinks of that most memorable scene! All the excitement going on in the city, the people wondering if the Great Teacher would come to the Feast; the fear that He would not come giving place to joy that He was coming; then the news that He was approaching; the rush of the enthusiastic people out to meet Him; those whom He had healed, and those whose friends He had healed on His former visits, telling strangers about Him. The priests and elders and scribes and Pharisees looking on in alarm, fearing that their places and honors would be lost if the popular movement carried the young Nazarene into eminence and power—their jealousy and envious rage drawing them into unwonted association with former opponents by the common danger. Their secret meeting for consultation with the plea that opposition was necessary lest the Romans should deem the movement a seditious rising—were not these people already speaking of Jesus as the King of the Jews?—and should scourge the city with fire and sword. Then the course of proceeding arranged and all got in readiness for that last night, when, His friends being scattered, the populace at rest, Jesus was taken, hurriedly tried and condemned in the night, and executed before the news could spread through the city. From the Golden Gate can be seen nearly the whole of that two miles of road from Bethany over which He passed, knowing that he was going to lay down His life that the whole people perish not.

The Ecce Homo Arch,

a picture of which fills panel No. 3, has a mournful interest for the Christian visitor. Tradition says that it was underneath that arch that the Saviour was scourged, and that it was upon it that Jesus was led forth, wearing the crown of thorns and the purple robe and exhibited to the crowd of priests and soldiers, Pilate proclaiming Him with the words, "Behold the Man." (John 19: 5.) That the scene of ribald mockery took place on some such prominent position as this there can be no doubt, and the very thought that it may have been here, solemnizes the beholder as he reflects on the humiliation that the Son of God voluntarily endured, that sinners might be saved. The arch springs out from a solidly built tower on the east side of the Government buildings, which form the present fortress and arsenal of the city. It is believed to occupy the site of "the palace," of which Nehemiah speaks. Thence to the Damascus Gate there runs the road called the Via Dolorosa, or, "Way of Sorrow," over which the Lord passed bearing the cross, until Simon the Cyrenian was compelled to bear it.

The Two Ladies

in Oriental garb, whose pictures fill panel No. 2, also reproduced from photographs, are attired in the present style, and doubtless much as were the women of Bible times. The woman on the left is wearing the garment technically termed the Mitpachath, a large, loose, outer garment, which she could draw over her face if men were present, or easily throw off in their absence. This, like the beged, was used for a variety of purposes. In the night it served for a bed covering, as is intimated in Deut. 24: 13. Ruth used it to carry corn (Ruth 3: 15), and the Israelitish women carried their dough in it on that hurried journey out of Egypt. It is to this custom that Solomon alludes when he asks if the waters can be bound up in a garment (Prov. 30: 4). The woman on the right wears the Raal or special veil, which completely hides the features. To appear publicly without this veil is regarded to this day as a sign of immodesty, and for any person to lift a woman's veil is the grossest insult that can be offered. It is of this that the woman complains (Cant. 5: 7): "The keepers of the walls took away my veil from me." This kind of veil is made of muslin, richly embroidered with colored silks and gold. It is probably the "wimple" mentioned in Isaiah 3: 22, in the list of feminine adornments. The white garment, is the ordinary out-door attire of the poor women. It is made of muslin, and covers all the garments except the veil. The upper classes have a similar garment of black silk for married ladies and white for unmarried.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 3: "Father, I have sinned," etc. Luke 15: 18.

"NOT much work for you, doctor, this voyage," I said to the surgeon of the ship on which I was making a trip to Europe.

"No, we have a pretty clean bill of health; but I have one case down in the steerage."

"What is that?"

"Well, I scarcely know. The symptoms are simple, and the man ought to have recovered, but I fancy there are obstacles which are out of my province. I think a clergyman could do more good than I can, but it is a strange thing: there is not one on board. It is very seldom that we have not one among the passengers."

"Should you mind my seeing him?" I asked.

"I am an amateur clergyman."

"See him by all means," the doctor answered. "I hate to have him die on my hands. He seems to be a good fellow at bottom, but I judge he has led a wild life."

I went down with the doctor at once to the close, foul-smelling hole in which the man lay. He was a fine, handsome man, of about thirty years of age. He had large, dark eyes, which were naturally large and bright, and which, in his emaciated condition, looked unnaturally so. He turned them anxiously on the doctor as we approached, with a look of appeal I shall never forget. After a few inquiries about his condition, the doctor left us together.

"You feel pretty lonely down here, I suppose," I said, by way of opening the conversation. "The doctor told me about you, so I thought I would come down and have a chat."

"That is very kind of you," said the sick man. "I am not strong enough to talk much, but I am glad to have you come. It is hard to die down here with no one to say a word to one."

"Do you think you are going to die?"

"I am afraid so; and yet there has never been a time when I so longed to live. I am going home, sir, and that means more to me just now than it does to many people. But I fear I shall never live to see it."

"Are your friends expecting you?"

"No, they know nothing about me. They do not know if I am alive. It is twelve years since they saw me, or heard from me."

"You must have been quite a boy, then."

"Yes, eighteen. I ran away from home. My father is a clergyman in England, one of the best men that ever lived. He gave me a good education, and was always kind to me, but after my mother died I drifted into bad ways, and I had bad companions. He knew of it and tried to reform me, but I was a bad case. I was in an office in London, and was living a fast life. I insisted on my leaving and coming down in the country to live with him. We had a sad time, for I would not go, and he insisted. Finally I went, but I could not stay. The dullness was insupportable to me. At last I could bear no longer, and one day, when he had a lot of money belonging to the church in his hands, I took it and ran away."

Where did you go?"

"Well, I was afraid to remain in England, because I did not know what my father might do. I was not his money, and he might feel it his duty to have me arrested, if he could find me. I came to America. I thought I should get work to do, but I did not hurry about it as I had plenty of money. It soon went, and in the vilest ways. It was awful! I was down to my last dollar bill before I realized how quick it was gone. I could not get suitable work, so I took what I could get. I have been a hostler, a bartender, anything. Always as soon as I got money I spent it in dissipation, and lost my employment. At last I was laid up in hospital, and made up my mind then to go home if I got well, and so I started, but I suppose I was not strong enough for the voyage."

Do you think your father will forgive you?"

"I don't know. I am going to ask him any day, if I live."

And if you do not live? Do you think God will forgive you?"

"I have thought of that while I have been in here, but I don't suppose He will. I have been a fearful sinner. I deserve the worst. I told him of the invitations God has given to the worst of sinners, and of His infinite love, then having prayed with him, left him for a while. The next day I saw him again, and found him in a much weaker condition. He was glad to see me, and asked me to read a chapter in the Bible. "Read the parable of the Prodigal Son," he said. "That just suits my case." I read it and I saw the tears run down his cheeks.

Do you think," he asked, "that when I told that story, He meant to imply that I had acted so?"

"Certainly, that was His object."

Well He knew."

The doctor came to make his regular visit at that moment, and I left him. When I saw him again, there was a restfulness in his face that was very different from the eager, anxious look I had worn before. "I have been praying," he said. "I have not prayed before, since I was a boy at my mother's knee. I believe God has heard me."

I talked with him, and found that he had gone on, humbly confessing his sins, and had received mercy on the faith of Christ's assurance, and was at peace. He was drowsy after our long talk, so I left him. Later in the day the doctor came into the saloon where I was sitting at dinner, and beckoned to me. "He has died," he said. "He is almost gone." I ran down quickly.

"I am dying," the sick man said, "I should like you to find my father and tell him about me. It will comfort him. Tell him I was coming to him—tell him all."

I took down his father's address, and then ran down to commend his soul to God. As I came down I saw the pale lips moving. Bending over, I caught the whispered prayer. The man grew fainter, and I thought he was gone. The doctor said, "It is all over." But as we were looking down on him the eyes opened, and a strange voice, he said, "Father, I have sinned," and then he was really dead, but there was a light on his face and a smile on his lips as if he had heard the answer, and received his pardon.

I made it my first business on landing, to go to his father's country parsonage, and there I learned that his father had been dead nearly a year. I was not disappointed. He knows now, I thought, all I came to tell him.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A New Device to Detect the Irregularities of employees has recently been patented. It is called the Insumgraph. It consists of a level surface, such as the top of a desk, in which there is a small opening. Beneath the aperture, run by an electric movement, with a clock attachment, is a metal ribbon, with a piece of paper on its upper surface at regular distances. Once an hour the paper is brought below the aperture and remains there for three minutes, and then passes on, and no paper appears there for an hour. It is intended that the clerk or watchman whose duty it is to be in punctual attendance shall write his name on the paper when it is presented at the aperture. When the ribbon is unrolled next day, if one of the slips bears no signature it is at once evident that the employee was absent when that slip was presented. The object of the insumgraph is to defeat the trick of men who, when they wish to absent themselves contrary to orders, hire a substitute to wind the clock which registers their attendance. A boy can do that, but a boy could not write the man's signature on the paper. In future at establishments in which the insumgraph is used, the clerk or watchman who has to do with it, will be detected if he does not do his duty himself. There is reason to fear that if such a record were in use in churches many Christians would stand indicted by it. Only too many who should be at work for Christ in the Sunday-school or elsewhere are apt to leave their duty for others to perform. (1 Cor. 15: 58.)

A Marriage of Two Strangers is Reported from Ottawa, Canada. On July 12th as the train from Owen Sound drew up at the junction, a bright, prettily dressed lady, stepped from the cars, and glanced over the crowd on the platform. In a minute, a gentleman stepped out of the waiting throng and approached her. He asked her a question in an undertone and received an affirmative reply. The two shook hands looking with some scrutiny at each other, as they did so. Then the lady took the gentleman's arm, and they left the depot and went straight to the house of a minister, and were married. Inquiries about the strange proceeding elicited the fact that they had never seen each other before. Some slight business transaction had led to a correspondence. They had exchanged photographs, and eventually, without having seen the lady, the gentleman proposed marriage. The lady had been favorably impressed by his letters, and by the photograph, so she accepted him with the result above stated. They have now to find out whether the congeniality which they inferred from their correspondence, bears the test of close personal relations. They were confident that it would, believing that the letters which had passed, had sufficiently disclosed their respective characters. They showed a faith and confidence that it is difficult to get people to exercise, with infinitely better reason. Though Christ's character, and His unspeakable perfections are so clearly revealed, there are comparatively few who say, "Whom having not seen we love." (1 Peter 1: 8.)

The Bite of a Centipede Caused the Death of a lady in Jersey City, N. J., last week. The lady, who was only twenty years old, was sitting on the stoop of her home with her mother on the evening of July 10. She had been there nearly an hour when she felt an irritation of her cheek. She touched it with her hand, and found there was something on it that felt like a caterpillar. She brushed it off quickly, but as she did so there was a stinging sensation in the flesh. A centipede, or thousand-legged worm, fell dead in her mother's lap. Next morning the cheek itched and, as she scratched it, a tiny pimple with a minute black spot in the centre, appeared. It increased in size, and sharp pains radiated from it. It grew larger and more painful, so the girl went to a druggist, who told her it was a boil and advised her to poultice it. On July 13, her whole face was swollen and she was suffering agony. Then a physician was called in who pronounced her case one of blood poisoning. He applied the usual remedies, but she grew worse, became delirious, and on Tuesday she died. The doctor said he was called in too late, the poison from the insect's bite had gone all through her system before he saw her. Thus the very insignificance of the creature had been the cause of the girl's death. Had it been the bite of a snake, her parents would have perceived her danger and had medical assistance in time to save her. Many souls have been lost in the same way. A grave sin shocks us at once, and measures are taken to prevent its repetition, but the sins we call little ones are suffered to continue and increase in power until the whole nature is poisoned. (Heb. 3: 13.)

How a Man Unconsciously Delayed his Dinner recently, is told by the Times of Louisville, Ky. He returned home at the usual hour and was much annoyed at finding that dinner was not ready. His cook said that she had not received the vegetables, which he had promised to order on his way to business. He started out immediately to scold the grocer for not sending them. The grocer apologized, and promised to send them at once, and in his presence, gave the basket to his colored errand-boy. The man, being aware that the vegetables would have to be cooked before he could have dinner, did not go straight home, but went around to a friend's store for a talk. When he concluded it was about time to go, he rose, and through the window, he saw, to his vexation, the errand-boy sitting on the opposite curbstone, with the market basket beside him. He crossed over, and asked angrily, why he had not taken it to the house as ordered. "Why," stammered the frightened boy, "I didn't know the way, and they told me to follow you, sah, and I followed you." Unhappily, worse consequences often come from a similar cause. Men do not know who may be following them in their daily walk and conversation, and taking example from them. The Christian would often be more careful what he said and did if he realized that some child or servant who did not know the road to God felt safe in following his footsteps. (Phil. 2: 15.)

A Steamship was Sunk by her Own Machinery recently. News reached New York on Thursday last that the steamer Benguella, which left the port on June 20, with fifty-six passengers and a cargo of corn, for Lisbon, had been wrecked in mid-ocean. She encountered a storm when three days out, but she weathered it, and it was supposed that the danger was over, though the vessel pitched a good deal. While the passengers were at breakfast they heard a sudden crash, and directly afterward the vessel began to settle at the stern. There was only just time to lower the boats, and get all on board before the vessel sank. The boats were fortunately picked up by a passing steamer and all lives saved. The explanation of the wreck is curious. It appears that the Benguella was a small steamer only 235 feet long. There were very high seas on the morning of the wreck, and when the vessel rose on the crest of a great wave, her propeller was out of water and raced at a terrific speed. As she descended the green incline, the screw was again submerged and the sudden resistance strained the shaft mightily. At last it broke under the strain, and before the engine could be stopped, the revolving shaft-head had knocked a big hole in the bottom of the ship. The incident suggests a lesson that may be useful in these days of religious conventions and camp-meetings. The power of religion in the soul is not to be measured by its rate of progress in the camp-meeting, where there is no opposition, but by what it can bear in the world among opposing elements. That is where it is most liable to break down. The same Peter who wanted to live with Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration, denied Him soon afterward among His enemies. (Matt. 26: 34, 35.)

THE PRODIGAL SON.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 3; Luke 15:11-32; Golden Text Luke 15: 18.

A Type of the Race—Claiming Privileges of Sonship—Withholding its Duties—His Demand—The Father's Compliance—The Rapid Dissipation—The Prodigal Neglected of His Friends—Hardship Inducing Humility—His Direct Appeal to His Father—Welcomed Home—The Elder Brother's Discontent.

THE prodigal son is a true type of fallen humanity. Made in the image of God, but that image defaced by sin; made to have dominion over all created things, and especially over his own lusts and passions, and yet degraded to become their slave—such is poor, fallen, lost man. The younger son in our parable used the relationship in which he stood to his father for no other purpose than to make requirements from him. He did not say, "Father, thou hast done much for me, by what service may I testify my gratitude to thee?" It would seem as though no such thought entered his mind. "Father," he said, "give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." He asked it as a right, not as a favor; he claimed that his father should do a father's part; while he was far from doing a son's part. And thus it is with lost man. If everything goes well with him, he looks upon it as only that which he has a right to expect; if anything goes ill with him, he complains that God is not good, that he is being treated hardly, and he does not see the reason why he should suffer more than others, he has done no harm; and thus he claims from God, in his ignorance and pride of heart, exemption from evil, and a share of goods for which he has not labored, as that which falleth to him. All the time, however, he ignores that if God is a Father and has a Father's responsibilities, then he himself is a son, and has

A Son's Responsibilities.

If he claims protection and sustenance from God as Father, then God has a right to claim trust, honor, and obedience from him as a son. Either he must relinquish his claim upon God, or he must acknowledge God's claim upon him. But to this claim most men are utterly blind, and act as though God were extremely culpable, and man much to be pitied. God's Word puts all things in their true place: it says of men, "They are without excuse, because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened" (Rom. 1: 20, 21.) Neither were thankful. The younger son said no word of thanks to his father for all his patient love and kindness, for the care he had bestowed upon his nurture and education; in heartless selfishness, he demanded the portion of goods which fell to him, a demand with which the father complied, although it was a loss to himself. The only communication of which we read between the father and the son is unwarrantable demand on the one hand, and ready giving on the other, a fit type of the relation between God and the unthankful, unworthy creature who is called man.

When the son came into the possession of his demanded portion, what did he do with it? Did he seek to increase his father's prosperity, or strengthen his hands in his old age? On the contrary, he gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living." Oh, how true a picture is this of the miserable ready to accept all at the hands of God, only to use His grace and gifts to His dishonor! "Do ye thus requite the Lord, Oh, foolish people and unwise? Is not He thy Father that hath bought thee?" (Deut. 32: 6.) Created to serve a noble purpose, to commune with God, to take part in His interests, to maintain His honor in His creation, man has sunk into a miserable degradation in slavery to sin itself.

Selfishness of Unconverted Men,

It was not long before the unhappy, despicable young man had spent all. Riotous living without any incoming soon made away with his father's gains, "and he began to be in want."

Many a prodigal runs a similar course; looking upon God's undeserved gifts as his right, and squandering them upon self-gratification, every resource soon fails him; money, credit, friends, reputation, all fail, and he begins to be in want. This is man's moment to oppress, and God's moment to hold out mercy." He went and joined himself (or hired himself) to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine, and he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him." Those who had eaten and drunk with him in the days of his riotous living were ashamed to know him now in his degradation, loss and misery; such is the friendship of the world! "The poor is hated even of his own neighbors; but the rich hath many friends." (Prov. 14: 20.)

Alone and Friendless,

the prodigal began to think of his neglected father. He did not seem at first to have been imbued with a sense of his sin against him. It was his misery which spoke when he said, "How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!" This is the first step. God allows prodigals to eat the fruit of their own way, until they learn to contrast their life with that of those who are in the Father's house. Formerly His service had been distasteful, now they are willing to take the lowest place, if only they may find an entrance there. He said, "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, I am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants." Now, for the first time he felt his responsibility, and saw himself and his father in a true light. Now he claimed nothing as a right, and although a son, he asked to be make a servant.

"And he arose," it was a purpose acted out, "and came to his father." He did not go round and curry favor with some of the servants and ask them to intercede for him; he did not go first to his elder brother; no, he would have it out with his father himself, and, wretched, miserable, as he was, he made straight for the old home. This is the right way for a sinner; straight to God, no shying, no subterfuge. When a sinner is determined to look his case in the face, and to come face to face with God about it, he is half way saved. Then it is that he discovers the precious truth, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." (II. Cor. 5: 19.) Then it is he finds that his whole life has been one heartless sin against love. "When he was yet a great way off his father saw him (for love is very far-sighted), and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him." What was this? No word of reproach? No taking advantage of his humiliation to let him know how much sorrow and shame he had brought upon his father? Not one word. And this was the love he had despised and trodden under foot? "The son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

Oh, how many would be afraid to receive thus a returning prodigal! They would say, "Let him prove first that he really is penitent, then it will be safe to receive him." But the father saw with a father's eye that the feeble tread was, nevertheless, not a wavering one; his eye of love could read whether there was reality or deceit in the downcast look, he could detect whether there was the ring of truth in that short but full confession, and the father, who had everything to gain or everything to lose, was satisfied, and took the wanderer to his heart. And more—before he had time to entreat his father to put him among the servants, the father said, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and be merry; for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found." The father did not love the son for what he was, or for what he deserved, but he could see what a broken heart might yet become, and his son was dearer to him now that he was come back than if he never had gone astray.

God Breaks Hearts by Love, and not by severity. Nothing makes a sinner so keenly feel his sin as the undeserved, unexpected mercy of God. The elder son, who had had no experience of the bitterness of outward sin, who had never wandered like his brother from the father's house, but had, perhaps, often denounced and condemned him, could not understand his father's joy at his return. What the scoundrel who had wasted his property, dishonored his name, disgraced the family, was he then to be received back with the same joy as if he were a credit to them? The elder brother could not understand it, and would not join in the mirth. He thought his father was both lowering himself, and also slighting him. "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment, and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf." But this is all self. A Christian full of self feels that the sin of a fallen brother reflects on him, that he himself is a loser by him, that his own reputation is at stake, and this self-consideration shuts out mercy. Christ teaches us to renounce all self-consideration except to consider ourselves lest we be also tempted. Then we can restore a fallen brother. (Gal. 6: 1.) The father explained to him, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine;" as though to add, "In thy joint heirship with me, take in also my joy over the returning prodigal. It was meet that I should make merry and be glad, for this thy brother (as much as my son) was dead and alive again; and was lost and is found."

JOHNSTOWN A YEAR AFTER.

BY VIATOR.

FOR miles before I stepped off at Johnstown station, on the Pennsylvania Railway, reaching it from Altoona, the train passed evidences of the great disaster of the early summer of 1889. Groups of trees lay where the flood had laid them, their withered heads pointing down stream. After more than a year had passed, places the soil showed ridges made by the great waters as they swept along towards the doom town, plain as if of only yesterday's making. On both banks of the ravine through which the train runs, the height gained by the flood in its majestic dominance was indicated by destructive consequences to shrub and tree, leaving places bare which had formerly been beautiful with various vegetation. It was difficult for me to think that so long a time had elapsed since the woeful tale of death and disaster with which the name of Johnstown is identified, had reached me. Nearing the town I saw many frame houses recently completed or in course of erection dotting the way of the flood, as had their predecessors before the calamity took place; and above on the heights stood the surviving buildings, homes from which their appalled occupants had seen ruin rush relentlessly on. A new depot, of course, and everything sprang up about it, save where a structure, sturdier than its neighbors, had withstood the onset of the waters, escaping with more or less damage an angle of brickwork on some of these repetitions that washed away, and some marked leg enough at the height reached by the flood of the fourth story. Fronting the station, at the opposite side of the track, I found a stairway new and unpainted, which invited to an extensive observation of the resurgent and nascent town. Half-way up the steep ascent, while taking breath at a landing, I found a dapper young fellow whose home, he told me, still was and still been on the heights above. In this way he counted for his presence as my informant on the occasion, and as one of the few survivors of old Johnstown who did not mourn bereavement caused by its destruction.

My interview with this interesting young man was followed by several others with leading merchants of the town, who had begun life fresh. Every one of them had lost friends and relatives in the flood, and all or nearly all their personal property. A man who had recommenced the practice of the barber's art, associated as in olden times, with those of cupping and bleeding, apologized for the homely newness of his place of business—a wooden shed gaily painted. "I had a good brick place and home," said he, "but this place is an improvement on the one I had first after my all had been swept away." A fifteen months' old baby was shown me, a survivor of the flood, but no one knew exactly how its little life had escaped destruction.

"Five thousand of us gone, and the population now, I suppose, as large as it was. You understand that the most of the faces one meets on the street are those of strangers. More people are coming in all the time, we feel like survivors of a past age." So said an old resident, a very intelligent man, who expressed himself as one who had felt after the flood what he believed had been the common experience, that of a stunned, blunted sensibility, succeeding the awful excitement accompanying the calamity. Accommodating themselves to their renewed business life, he and such men as he, are soberly cheerful and confident to admiration. They stand well together, and Johnstown is fairly prosperous.

On one subject its leading citizens are firm and inflexible. Some months ago, the club, the bursting of whose reservoir, which they owned for sport, caused the great flood, talked of repairing their broken property. The men of Johnstown who had lived through the horrors of the time, with the severe and dignified determination to which their misfortunes had given them the right, said "Never." And the attempt to repair the reservoir never has been made, and it never will be made.

AN INDIAN'S THANKS.

It is often said that the Indian shows no gratitude; but a different story is told by Bishop Whipple, who in this, as in all else, is a valiant champion of the red man. He publishes in his Minnesota Missionary, an incident in proof. He says: "Some time ago an Indian brought me a lock of hair, saying, 'My Christian wife is dead, could you have it made in a cross? When I look at it I shall think of her and of Jesus who died on the Cross for her.' I sent the poor man the cross, and here is his letter in acknowledgment. sweet, simple, grateful. Truly, all hearts are alike, when touched by the love which comes from the Saviour: 'Dear Bishop: I received that which I asked you to have made for me, the little cross. Indeed, I was pleased when I saw it. As long as I live I will keep it, and I shall try to live as He who saved us by the Cross would wish to have us live. I shall try to live so. In my heart I remember this, saying there, 'I thank you.' That is all I say to you about that. I was sick four weeks: to-day, for the first time, I am well. But to my Saviour I delivered up myself, to do with me as He pleased. Now He destines me to be well, and I thank Him. That is all. I salute you and your wife. I am the one who loves you. MADJIGISHIG.'"

A PRIEST'S DILEMMA.

FOR some time past M. Eugene Reveillaud, one of the most efficient helpers Mr. McAll has had in his mission in France, has been laboring among the Roman Catholic priests, and is much encouraged by finding so many of them willing to listen to his presentation of evangelical truth. He has, however, very few open converts. It is with them as it was with men in Christ's day, a consideration for the feelings and needs of those they love, keeps them from making public profession of their faith. M. Reveillaud quotes a letter which he recently received from one of these priests, to whom he has had to present the alternative, hard to human nature, which the Master laid down, "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." (Matt. 10: 37.) The priest writes: "I am a Protetsant at heart: I have long been so, and shall always remain so. In vain have I tried to shut out the light, and struggle against the grace of God. They have penetrated my heart in spite of myself, and destroyed forever, any attachment I may have had from childhood for the Roman Catholic Church. I remain, alas! in that church, but I entreat you to believe that I am only constrained to do so by circumstances. Had I neither father, mother, brother or sister, or were my relatives wealthy and independent of persecution, I should not hesitate for a moment. I do not dread persecution for myself, but I dread it for my father, weak, and in bondage to the opinion of his village; for my mother, having no really evangelistic pastor at hand, who could give her consolation and exhortation; for my poor invalid sister, who could not exist in the midst of troubled surroundings without greatly increased suffering."

THE INSPIRING EXPECTATION.

By Rev. M. Baldwin, D. D.

The Effect of Waiting for the Lord's Coming—A Means of Growth in Grace—A Source of Comfort—The Crown for Those who Love His Appearing—Gifts of All Kinds—A Closer Union—Increased Activity—Miss Havergal's Experience.

JUST in proportion as we expect our Lord's coming, and look for that coming, do we grow in the divine life. In the third chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, eighteenth verse, the apostle says: "We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." Now I gather that however difficult this passage may be, and however many interpretations may have been given as to its proper meaning, that it simply teaches us that the view of Christ transfigures us. There is elevating power in the study of the coming of the Lord. None of us deny for one moment that people have taken up unscriptural ground on the subject, that people have run into wild excess, and have brought the subject in the eyes of many into discredit, but the truth is here. It is before us, and just as we keep Christ before us and do we ourselves become changed into the likeness of His image, so that if He tarries, and we have fallen asleep, we shall awake satisfied with His likeness. We shall see Him when this corruptible shall have been exchanged for the incorruptible, and this mortal shall be changed into the immortal, and we know not what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.

His Coming Glory

I might speak, too, of the comfort of this doctrine. We are sometimes called to comfort those who mourn, and I think that so often, whilst people comfort the mourner with whatever doctrine they have at their command, they fail to see the mode in which the Apostle Paul would comfort those that weep over the loss of friends. So often people get no further than the language of David when he said the child could not come to him, but he could go to the child. True, but we go to the house of mourning with the apostle and say—at least we try to say—that there is strong consolation that that body which represents the home of a sleeping saint is just laid—perchance for a little while—to rest there, perhaps only a day, a week, a month, a year, and then Christ shall come, and shall rise first. We point them to the fact that the believer's falling asleep is, as it were, momentary; that that body is precious to God; that it has been redeemed as well as the soul; that the Lord knows its resting-place, and that He shall call it forth again, purified, beautified, and made meet for the eternal home. "Comfort one another with these words." Tell them that the night is far spent and that the day is at hand. In the day of mourning people are told to bear their sorrows, and it is most proper and most true; but there is this further to be said, that while we do bear our sorrow, and whilst we mourn, it is not as those who have no hope; that we know it is only for a little while. If I am called to go to the bedside, and afterward to follow to the grave one who has sunk without hope, what can I say? I say, I know he shall rise, but I know not when; the Lord knoweth. There is a darkness and a gloom, but that darkness and that gloom do not rest on the believer's hope—it is bright. It is "the Lord shall come again."

The Dead in Christ

In the Second Epistle to Timothy, fourth chapter and eighth verse, we read: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing." Have you ever thought that that crown is for all who love His appearing? It is for those who are looking for it. The Greek verb signifies the waiting for His coming. That crown is not spoken of as being given to those who have achieved great results, not even to those that even the Church have thought the most worthy, but to those who love His appearing; to those who through good and evil report have waited and answered with the cry: "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

In First Corinthians, first chapter and seventh verse, is a remarkable statement. The apostle says that they, the Corinthians, came behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of the "Lord Jesus Christ." In other words, that just as they waited they were endowed with

The Various Gifts

of the Holy Ghost. Now, just as the Gospel of Christ is proclaimed with the Holy Ghost it is with power, and the men who, anterior to Christ's first advent, proclaimed that Christ would come, were men of power. They were the great and mighty of Israel—the men who like Isaiah and Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor prophets, lifted up their voices, and said that Messiah cometh. They were men of power having the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Now, then, we come to our day, and I gather that the apostle's teaching is this: that the men who to-day proclaim the second advent shall have the especial charisma which belongs to the Church of Christ—that, in other words, the Holy Ghost will endow with special powers those that boldly, fearlessly, and emphatically make known the hope of the Church in the speedy coming of Christ.

Those true servants in Corinth came behind in no gift. I might expatiate on the subject, but I will only say that these gifts of the Holy Ghost were to dwell in the Church, and just as this truth of the Second Advent is brought forward the servant of Christ

May Expect Power.

Let us, therefore, live very near to our Divine Master in abiding, holy, blessed union; for "he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit," Christ in me bringeth forth much fruit, and the whole effect of this blessed doctrine is to bring us into closer personal union with Jesus Christ. It is that we may die and He live. Oh, that we may learn more and more the powers of our daily death and His daily life!

It will lead us to be more earnest in the reclamation of those that have wandered away; it will make us more in earnest in trying to win the lost and erring souls to the Lord Jesus: it will make us preach with more fervor, more earnestness, the Gospel of love to sinners; it will make us feel as Frances Ridley Havergal said she felt, that sainted woman who fell asleep so recently; "I try to see my Lord in every person I meet, and I try to minister to every one, that I may minister in every one to my Lord and Master Jesus Christ."

And, dear fellow Christians let this word dwell richly in you. Let Him be the Alpha and He the Omega. Let him come with many crowns upon His head into your heart, and let Him sit upon the throne, and you lie low at His feet. Let Him speak, and do you obey, and just as you dwell in this attitude you will find His yoke is easy and His burden is light, and you will get faith each day to pray for His blessed coming.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

SALT-WATER TONIC.

I AM glad that the ocean is trying to make amends for the damage it has done all along the centuries. It has become a hydropathic doctor, and is every summer curing the aches and fatigues of those who go to it. Sea-bathing is one of the mightiest of medicaments. Shakespeare has been fiercely mauled by the critics for confusion of metaphor in speaking of taking up "arms against a sea of troubles." The smart fellows say, how could a man take arms "against a sea?" In other words, it is not possible to shoot the Atlantic Ocean. But what Shakespeare suggests, is at this season being done all around the coast from Florida to Newfoundland, especially regiments going out from Cape May, Long Branch, East Hampton, Newport and Nahant; ten thousand bathers, with hands thrown into the air, "taking up arms against the sea." But the old giant has only to roll over once on his bed of seaweed, and all this attacking host are flung prostrate upon the beach.

The sensation of sea-bathing is about the same everywhere. You get into the garments cautiously, then you issue forth ingloriously, your head down in consciousness that you are cutting a sorry figure before the world. Barefoot as a mendicant, your hair dishevelled in the wind, the stripes on your clothes strongly suggestive of Sing Sing, your appearance a caricature of human kind, you wander up and down the beach a creature that the land is evidently trying to shake off and the sea is unwilling to take. But you are consoled by the fact that all the rest are as mean and forlorn looking as yourself; and so you wade in, over foot-top, unto the knee, and waist deep. The water is icy cold, so that your teeth chatter and your frame quakes until you make a bold dive; and in a moment you and the sea are good friends, and you are not certain whether you have surrendered to the ocean or the ocean has surrendered to you.

At this point begin the raptures of bathing. You have left the world on the beach, and are caught up in the arms of experiences that you never feel on land. If you are far enough out, the breaking wave curves over you like a roof inlaid and prismatic, bending down on the other side of you in layers of chalk and drifts of snow, and the lightning flash of the foam ends in the thunder of the falling wave. You fling aside from your arms, as worthless, amethyst and emerald and chrysoprase. Your ears are filled with the halloo of sporting elements, and your eyes with all tints and tinges and double-dyes and liquid emblazonment.

It is astonishing how many sounds mingle in the water; the faint squall of the affrighted child, the shrill shriek of the lady just introduced to the uproarious hilarities, the carouse of the diver, the snort of the half-strangled, the clear giggle of maidens, the hoarse bellow of swamped obesity, the whine of the convalescent invalid, the yell of unmixed delight, the tehee and squeak of the city exquisite learning how to laugh out loud, the squash of the brine, the cackination of a band of harmless savages, the stun of the surge on your right ear, the hiss of the surf, the saturnalia of the elements; while overpowering all other sounds are the orchestral harmonies of the sea, which roll on through the ages, all shells, all winds, all caverns, all billows heard in "the oratorio of the creation."

Oh, the glee of sea-bathing! It rouses the apathetic. It upsets the supercilious and pragmatical. It is balsamic for mental wounds. It is a tonic for those who need strength, and an anodyne for those who require soothing, and a febrifuge for those who want their blood cooled; a filling up for minds pumped dry, a breviary for the superstitious with endless matins and vespers, and to the Christian an Apocalyptic vision where the morning sun gilds the waters, and there is spread before him "a sea of glass mingled with fire." "Thy way, O God, is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters!"

INTERVAL LAND.

I WAS sailing down the St. John River, Canada, which is the Rhine and the Hudson commingled in one scene of beauty and grandeur, and while I was on the deck of the steamer a gentleman pointed out to me the places of interest, and he said: "All this is interval land, and it is the richest land in all the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia." "What," said I, "do you mean by interval land?" "Well," he said, "this land is submerged for a part of the year; spring freshets come down and all these plains are overflowed with the water, and the water leaves a rich deposit, and when the waters are gone the harvest springs up and there is the grandest harvest that was ever reaped." And I instantly thought, "It is not the heights of the Church, and it is not the heights of this world, that is the scene of the greatest prosperity, but the soul over which the floods of sorrow have gone, the soul over which the freshets of tribulation have torn their way, that yields the greatest fruits of righteousness, and the largest harvest for time, and the richest harvest for eternity." Bless God if your soul is "interval land."

CENSORIOUSNESS.

It is impossible to be much with the hypercritical and acerb without ourselves becoming hypercritical and acerb. Avoid those who would rather believe evil of others than good. Keep out of the patch of nettles and walk in the garden of the Lord. Waste no time in hearing the gossip scandalize others. As soon as she unties the strings of her hat and leans back to have a good talk, excuse yourself and get out into the fresh air, and look up at the stars, and thank God. "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." In the first year of my ministry I heard that which has impressed me to this day. In Central New York, I heard in a parlor a minister of religion in conversation with another minister, most vividly condemn the sins of another minister of the gospel, saying that he, the speaker, could never be tempted to such a crime. It was right he should condemn the sin, but I did not like the self-righteous declaration that he never could have been tempted that way. Before two years had passed, that minister of religion was tried for the same crime and condemned, the jury out only a few moments, so evident was the guilt. The condemned man died of a broken heart, and his body went to Greenwood, and his soul to that God who, I hope, was more merciful to him than he had been to his fallen brother. I pick up my Concordance to find how many times the word "mercy" occurs in the Bible. Guess! Two hundred and eighty-five times it either appears alone or as a part of some other word.

ORDINARY PEOPLE.

THE longer I live the more I like common folks. They do the world's work, bearing the world's burdens, weeping the world's sympathies, carrying the world's consolation. Among lawyers we see rise up a Rufus Choate, or a William Wirt, or a Samuel L. Southard, but society would go to pieces to-morrow if there were not thousands of common lawyers to see that men and women get their rights. A Valentine Mott or a Willard Parker rises up eminent in the medical profession, but what an unlimited sweep would pneumonia, and diphtheria, and scarlet fever have in the world if it were not for ten thousand common doctors. The old physician in his gig, rolling up the lane of the farmhouse, and coming in to take hold of the pulse of the patient, while the family, pale with anxiety, are looking on and waiting for his decision in regard to the patient, and hearing him say: "Thank God, I have mastered the case, he is getting well," excites in me an admiration quite equal to the mention of the names of the great metropolitan doctors, Pancoast or Gross or Joseph C. Hutchinson of the past, or the illustrious living men of the present. The most of the good done in the world, and the most of those who win the battles for the right, are ordinary people. One Doctor Duff among missionaries, but three thousand missionaries that would tell you they have only common endowment. One Florence Nightingale to nurse the sick in conspicuous places, but ten thousand women who are just as good nurses, though never heard of. The Swamp Angel was a big gun that during the war made a big noise, but muskets of ordinary calibre and shells of ordinary heft did the execution. President Tyler and his cabinet go down the Potomac one day to experiment with the Peacemaker, a great iron gun that was to affright with its thunder foreign navies. The gunner touches it off and it explodes and leaves Cabinet ministers dead on the deck, while at that time all up and down our coasts were canons of ordinary bore able to be the defence of the nation, and ready at the first touch to waken to duty. The curse of the world is big guns. Every four years, after the politicians who have made all the noise, go home hoarse from angry discussion on the evening of the first Monday in November, and the next day the people with the silent ballots settle everything, and generally settle it right, a million of the white slips of paper they drop, making about as much noise as the fall of an apple blossom.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Problem of the Surplus which has Puzzled Congresses appears to have been solved by the present Congress. It is thoroughly done that the deficit is before us. Instead of a hole in the ground. At the session Mr. Windom stated that the revenue was $385,000,000. Allison informed the Senate on July 14, appropriations already made aggregated $100,000,000 and that this did not include the expenditure involved under the new Pension Act, which will certainly be $50,000,000. The expenditure already authorized is in excess of the estimated $50,000,000 as its promoters think, will be considerable. Mr. Windom, however, issued a statement showing that there will be no inconvenience, as some of the surpluses have already been paid out of the Treasury, and others will not have to be this year. It seems clear, however, that the apprehended some years ago from the imputation of a large surplus no longer whether the people approve the means has taken for averting it will be known when the elections take place.

Death of Eugene Schuyler, United States General at Cairo, Egypt, occurred on Mr. Schuyler was one of the very few diplomats that this country possessed. He was in the service of the Department with brief intervals since 1866. In that year he was Consul at Moscow, subsequently he was Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg. In 1876, he was employed to investigate and report on the Turkish massacres in Bulgaria. In 1878 he was Consul at Birmingham, England, and in 1880 Consul-General at Bucharest. Two years later he was made Minister-Resident in Greece, Roumania and Servia. President Harrison, on his accession, nominated him Assistant-Secretary of State, but withdrew the nomination in deference to personal objections on the part of a Senator. He was then nominated Consul at Cairo, and continued in that position until his death.

Mr. Schuyler was fifty years of age. He was the author of several interesting works, the most notable one on American Diplomacy, which has a large circulation.

Effort to Provide Cheaper and Better Telegraph Facilities is being made. On July 1, Senator Sawyer introduced a bill authorizing the Postmaster General to establish a telegraph in every post-office where there is free delivery of letters, and in any other post-office where it is convenient. He is also authorized to contract with the existing telegraph companies for the service, the term of contract to be not more than five years. Rates proposed are as follows:—For the first twenty words or less, counting address and signature, between postal stations in the same State and less than 300 miles apart, fifty cents. Between stations not less than 300 miles apart and not in the same State, twenty cents for the first twenty words or less. For the remainder of the message, the rate shall be greater than fifty cents for the first twenty words. There is no logical reason why the Government should not control telegraphic communications as it does communications by mail. The English Government does so, and provides the people with a better and cheaper service than they had under the old companies. It may be hoped that this bill will be passed.

Day of Horror in Minnesota was Sunday. A tornado swept across the lake region of the State. It gathered in the vicinity of Lake, about eight miles from St. Paul. It gained in force and speed till it culminated on Lake Gervais. Seven persons were killed and about twenty injured on its way, as it uprooted houses and uprooted trees. The greatest fatality, however, was on Lake Pepin, an arm of the Mississippi, where it overturned the Lake steamer Sea Wing. The steamer was crowded with excursionists, and it had a barge in tow, also full of pleasure seekers. When the storm struck the steamer it became unmanageable and the captain ordered it beached. It was too late, as she was broadside to the waves and turned keel upward, emptying the passengers on deck into the lake. A few of the stronger swimmers clambered on the bottom of the boat and held their position until taken off by row-boats after the storm had passed. The barge was cut adrift before the steamer capsized and most of its passengers escaped. The number of dead bodies taken from the cabin of the steamer and found floating on the lake was one hundred and it is believed that others must have been carried away by the river.

The Western Union Building in New York, the greatest telegraph centre in the world, was partially destroyed by fire on July 18. The accompanying illustration shows how magnificent an edifice it was before the fire broke out. It was a ten story building into which twelve hundred wires went, communicating directly or by connection with every business centre in the world, and from which an average of 112,000 messages a day are sent out. The fire was caused by an electric light wire crossing a telegraph wire and charging it with a current so strong as to destroy its insulation. The burning rubber set fire to other wires, and these to the flooring of the room above, which was on the seventh story, in which there were 1,600 operating instruments. The operators, used the patent fire-extinguishers, and abundance of water, but without avail, and then ran out of the building, and sent out a fire-alarm. Five of them in an inner room were cut off from escape by the stairs, and were rescued by a ladder from an adjacent roof. There were other narrow escapes from the eighth and ninth stories, where there was a restaurant. The height of the building made the firemen's work difficult, as they had to fight the fire from below, but by ten o'clock it was under control. The Western Union lost their instruments, and switch-board, which was the largest in the world. The Associated press had its offices on the eighth floor and it lost its records, which were highly prized and cannot be replaced. There was no insurance, as the building was believed to be fire-proof.

The Cholera is said to be Spreading in Spain. The correspondent of a London journal, who has visited the province of Valencia states that new cases and many deaths are occurring in spite of the vigorous measures taken to suppress the disease. At Castello de Rugat, fifty cases had broken out, of which seventeen proved fatal. Thirty-five cases, and ten deaths were registered in the province of Valencia in one day. The existence of the epidemic is suspected in many towns, but is concealed to prevent their being isolated.

Formal Notification has been Served on the Sultan of Turkey that he must protect the Christians of Armenia from Moslem outrages. The English minister has added to the protest that if they are continued, England will reconsider her promise to protect the Sultan's Asiatic dominions. The Sultan contends that Russian agents have incited the disturbances, to afford their Government a pretext for seizing the province. There is a possibility of this plea being well-founded, as it is known that Russia pursued those tactics in Bulgaria and is still doing so. No definite action beyond the massing of troops on the Armenian frontier will be taken by Russia until after the Emperor of Germany has paid his visit to the Czar on August 10. As the Emperor is to visit England before going to Russia, there is ground for the expectation that the meeting will not be very cordial. The Berlin correspondent of the Associated Press even goes so far as to state that there is a possibility of the Emperors parting on hostile terms.

The Fall of the Bastille was Commemorated in Paris on July 14. It was the one hundred and first anniversary of the event. The noted fortress and prison a portion of which is shown in the sketch, was attacked and taken by the Parisian people on July 14, 1789. It was dismantled and its wretched inmates released. This was the real beginning of the famous revolution. On Monday last the day was observed as a general holiday, the school children paraded the streets and several patriotic societies joined in a procession. There was also a celebration in New York by French citizens. Deputations waited on the French consul, and patriotic speeches were made. Later in the day a picnic of the French colony went on an excursion, and enjoyed the anniversary in enthusiastic fashion.

THE BASTILLE.

BRIEF NOTES.

The whole number of missionaries employed by the Baptist Home Missionary Society last year was 833.

Rev. Joseph R. Ludgate is holding midsummer revival services with much success at the Oakland St. Methodist Church, Brooklyn.

Bishop Mallalieu gave a memorial address in Boston on July 12th, to commemorate the first Methodist service held in that city a hundred years ago.

The statistical returns of the Society of Friends show that in the past denominational year the increase in membership has been larger than in any recent year.

The Young Women's Christian Temperance Union of Honolulu is flourishing. It has contributed $100 to the salary of the Missionary of the Union this year.

At the last confirmation services at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York City, seven Chinese and seven Syrians were presented by the rector, the Rev. Dr. David H. Greer.

The National Temperance Convocation at Lake Bluff Ill., July 5-20, was largely attended. Among the speakers were Mary A. Woodbridge, Frances E. Willard, and Mary Allen West.

A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized in Wisconsin State's prison. It has nearly a hundred members. There are several societies now in institutions for the deaf and dumb.

During the Summer months many pastors have placed their Sunday evening prayer service in the hands of the young people of the Christian Endeavor Society and often with the best results.

The viceroy of Nankin China has asked the Emperor of China to recognize the service rendered to the poor during the recent famine by Mr. Drummond of Shanghai, by making him a Mandarin.

A Cincinnati paper reports that the resignation of the Rev. E. P. Foster, pastor of Storrs' Congregational Church, has been asked for, on the ground that "the congregation did not want the Gospel applied to social and labor questions." That is not the only church in which the pastor's resignation would be asked for, if he preached all the doctrines Christ taught.

The Christian Endeavor Bible School opened at Chataqua Lake Assembly July 5th., under favorable auspices. A large number of the members of this organization were on the ground. Bishop Vincent proposes to establish a Chautauqua Society of Christian Endeavor under whose auspices conferences and Bible schools shall be held, and lectures given every year, in the interest of Christian training of young people.

The results of Missionary work in the Samoan group of islands in the Pacific, as tabulated by missionary Charles Phillips should be noted, that they may be given to persons who are sceptical as to the value of Foreign Missions. They are in part as follows: "Heathenism utterly abolished; the people gathered within the influence of the Gospel; churches and pastors' houses erected by themselves in nearly every village; a native educated ministry provided and supported by themselves; the Bible and other volumes translated into the native language, and the cost fully paid for; native missionaries sent forth as pioneers to many islands that are now evangelized, and still being sent to New Guinea."

'ALL THE DAY LONG.A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let not thine heart envy sinners; but be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long. For surely there is an end; and thine expectation shall not be cut off." Prov. 23:17, 18.

Solomon's Second Wisdom—The Product of Painful Experience—I. The Course Prescribed for the Believer—A Filial Fear—Continuous—Not a Religion of Spasms—Nor Periodical—The Details of the Day—A Good Beginning—God in Business How to Bear Failure or Success—Reasons for Continuous Fear—The Omniscience of God—The Lord May Come at any Hour—Off and On Religion—II. The Probable Interruption—III. The Helpful Consideration—The End of Trial.

HERE we have a command given of the Holy Spirit through the wisest of men; and therefore both on the divine and on the human side it is most weighty. I said that Solomon was the wisest of men, and yet he became, in practice, the most foolish. By his folly he gained a fresh store of experience of the saddest sort, and we trust that he turned to God with a penitent heart, and so became wiser than ever—wiser with a second wisdom which the grace of God had given him, to consecrate his earthly wisdom. He who had been a voluptuous prince became the wise preacher in Israel: let us give our hearts to know the wisdom which he taught. The words of Solomon to his own son are not only wise, but full of tender anxiety; worthy, therefore, to be set in the highest degree as to value, and to be received with heartiness as the language of fatherly affection.

I. Oh, for grace to practice what the Spirit of God says with regard to our first point, of the believer—"Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long!" The fear of the Lord is a brief description for true religion. It is an inward condition, betokening hearty submission to our heavenly Father. It consists very much in the holy reverence of God, and a sacred awe of Him. This is accompanied by a child-like trust in Him, which leads to loving obedience, tender submission, and lowly adoration. It is a filial fear. Not the fear which has torment; but that which gives joy, when we "rejoice with trembling."

The Prescribed Course

We must, first of all, be in the fear of God, before we can remain in it "all the day long." This can never be our condition, except as the fruit of the new birth. To be in the fear of the Lord, "ye must be born again." The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. "The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear Him." This holy fear of the living God is the life of God showing itself in the quickened ones. This fear, according to the text, is for all the day, and for every day: the longest day is not to be too long for our reverence, nor for our obedience. If our days are lengthened until the day of life declines into the evening of old age, still are we to be in fear of God; yea, as the day grows longer, our holy fear must be deeper.

A Religion of Show.

This is contrary to the habit of those persons who have a religion of show; they are very fine, very holy, very devout, when anybody looks at them; this is rather the love of human approbation than the fear of the Lord. The Pharisee, with a halfpenny in one hand and a trumpet in the other, is a picture of the man who gives an alms only that his praises may be sounded forth. The Pharisee, standing at the corner of the street, saying his prayers, is a picture of the man who never prays in secret, but is very glib in pious assemblies. "Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward." Show religion is a vain show. Do nothing to be seen of men, or you will ripen into a mere hypocrite.

Neither may we regard godliness as something off the common—an extraordinary thing. Have not a religion of spasms. Religion must not be thought of as something apart from daily life; it should be the most vital part of our existence. Our praying should be like our breathing, natural and constant; our communion with God should be like our taking of food, a happy and natural privilege. Brethren, it is a great pity when people draw a hard and fast line across your life, dividing it into the sacred and the secular. Say not, "This is religion, and the other is business," but sanctify all things.

Ours must never be a religion that is periodic in its flow, like certain intermittent springs, which flow and ebb, and flow only to ebb again. Beware of the spirit which is in a rapture one hour, and in a rage the next. Beware of serving Christ on Sunday, and Mammon on Monday. Beware of the godliness which verifies the calendar. Every Sunday morning some folks take out their godliness and touch it up, while they are turning the brush round their best hat. Many women, after a fashion, put on the fear of God with their new bonnet. When the Sunday is over, and their best things are put away, they have also put away their best thoughts and their best behavior. We must have a seven days religion, or else we have none at all. Periodical godliness is perpetual hypocrisy.

Let us practically note the details which are comprised in the exhortation, "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." The sun is up, and we awake. May we each one feel, "When I awake I am still with thee."

Begin Well.

If I am bound to be in the fear of God all the day long, I am bound to begin well with earnest prayer, and sweet communion heavenward, and so let thy first breathings be prayer. And now we are downstairs, and are off to business, or to labor. As we hurry along the street, think of these words, "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." Leave not thy God at home: thou needest Him most abroad. Endeavor, when thou art plying the trowel, or driving the plane, or guiding the plow, or using the needle or the pen, to keep up constant communication with thy Father and thy Lord. Whether you work long hours or short hours, "Be in the fear of the Lord all the day long." But it is time for meals. Be thou in the fear of the Lord at thy table. The soul may be poisoned while the body is being nourished, if we turn the hour of refreshment into an hour of indulgence. Some have been gluttonous, more have been drunken. Do not think of thy table as though it were a hog's trough, where the animal might gorge to the full; but watch thine appetite, and by thanksgivings make thy table to be the Lord's table.

During the day our business calls us into company. Our associations in labour may not be so choice as we could wish; but he that earns his bread is often thrown where his own will would not lead him. If we were never to deal with ungodly men, it would be necessary for us to go out of the world. He that is in the fear of God all the day long, and language, and actions, that these may be such as becometh the gospel of Christ in whatever society his lot may be cast. Seek not to be a hermit or a monk; but be a man of God among men. When making a bargain, or selling thy goods, be thou in the fear of God.

Will Watch His Own Spirit,

The evening draws in, the shop is closed, and you have a little time to yourself. Our young people in shops need a rest and a walk. Is this your case? "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." In the evening, as well as in the morning, be true to your Lord. Beware of ill-company in the evening! Take care that you never say, "Surely the darkness shall cover me." "Be thou in the fear of the Lord" when sinners entice thee, and at once refuse any offer which is not pleasing to God.

"Recreation," says one. Yes, recreation. There are many helpful and healthy recreations which can in moderation be used to advantage; but engage in no pastime which would hinder you continuing in the fear of the Lord. In your recreation forget not your higher re-creation wherein you were created anew in Christ Jesus. Our chief rest lies in a change of service for our Lord; our fullest pleasure in fellowship with Jesus. Night has fallen around us, and we are home with our families: let us not forget to close the day with family prayer and private prayer, as we opened it. From dawn to midnight be thou in the fear of the Lord.

Let us now remember special occasions. Days are not quite the same. Exceptional days will happen, and these are all included in the day. You sustain, perhaps, one day, a great and unexpectedly find yourself far poorer when you left your bed. "Be thou in the fear of the Lord" when under losses and adversity. Possibly you may have a wonderful day of success; but be not always gaping for it. Yet ship may come home; your windfall may be at your feet. Beyond anything you have expected, a surprising gain may fall into your lap; not unduly excited, but remain in the fear of the Lord. Take heed that thou be not lifted with pride, so as to dote upon thy wealth; then thy God may find it needful to afflict thee out of love for thy soul.

Sudden Assaults.

It may happen, during the day, that you are assailed by an unusual temptation. Christians are well armed against common temptations, but sudden assaults may injure them; therefore, "be in the fear of the Lord all the day long," and then surprises will not overtake you. You shall not be afraid of evil tidings; neither shall you be betrayed by evil suggestions; if you are rooted and grounded in the fear of the Lord.

It may be, that during the day you will have to act in a very difficult business. Common transactions between man and man are easy enough to honest minds; but every now and then a point is raised, a point of conscience, a point not to be decided off-hand: "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." Spread thy case before the Lord. Judge a matter as it will be judged before His bar; and if this be too much for thy judgment, then Wait Upon God for Light.

But, alas! you are feeling very unwell; the will differ from those of activity. You cannot go to business; you have to keep to your bed; not but "be in the fear of the Lord all the day long." If the day has to last through thy sickness, because sleep forsakes you, be still with thy thoughts soaring toward heaven, your heart quiet in your Father's bosom, and your soul happy in the sympathy of Christ. To have the whole being bathed and baptized in the Holy Ghost is to find health in sickness, and peace in pain.

I have sketched the matter roughly. I now suggest to you excellent reasons for being always in the fear of the Lord. Ought not to be in the fear of the Lord all day long? He sees us all the day long? Walk in the fear of the Lord at all times, because you always long to Christ. The blood-mark is always on you; will you ever belie it? How could you do down your God-given and heaven-born character of a child of God? Nay, rather, for ever to your adoption, and the heritage secures you. Furthermore, remember this:

Your Lord May Come at Any Hour.

Before the word can travel from my lips, your ear Jesus may be here. While you are in business, or on your bed, or in the fire, flaming heavens may proclaim His advent; and therefore, with your loins girt and your robes trimmed, ready to go in to the supper when ever the Bridegroom comes. Or you may be in a moment, suddenly, we may be called to let every action be such that we would not regret to have it quoted as our last action every day be so spent that it might fitly be called close of life on earth. Let our near approach to the end help to keep us "in the fear of the Lord all the day long."

If we keep in that state, observe the results! To abide in the fear of the Lord is to dwell safely. To forsake the Lord is to be to court danger. In the fear of the Lord there is strong confidence, but apart from Him there is no security. How honorable is the state! Men ridicule the religion which is uniform. I heard of a brother who claimed to have long been a teetotaler; but some day when he was asked how long he had been an abstainer, he replied, "Off and on, for very many years." You should have seen the magic upon all faces. An abstainer off and on! Example did not stand for much. Certain professors are Christians "off and on"; and nobody respects them. Such seed as this will grow; there is no vitality in it. Constancy is proof of sincerity. "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long."

Now I have rightly taken up the most of time with the principal topic, and we will have a word or two upon the next theme. Let us consider

The Probable Interruption.

It happened to godly men in all ages to see wicked prosper; and they have been staggered by the sight. You see a man who has no conscience, making money in your trade while you make none. Sometimes you think that your conscientiousness hinders you; and I hope nothing else. You see another person living and cheating; to him honesty is a policy, and Sabbath labor is no difficulty; the Word of God is nothing to him. You do not do as he does, and therefore you do not get on as he does. Be it so; but let his prosperity grieve you. There is something better to live for than mere money-making.

If your life pleases God, let it please you. Do not even in your wish deprive the ungodly of their transient happiness. Their present prosperity is the only heaven they will ever know. Let them have as much of it as they want. I have heard of a wife who treated her husband and ungodly husband with great gentleness for this very reason. She said, "I have loved for him and entreated him to think of his soul; but at last I have come to fear he will die in his sins, and therefore I have put up my mind that I will make him as happy as I can in this life."

He is the more tried because these men are apt to boast. They crow over the sufferer, saying, "What comes of your religion? You are worse off than I am. See how readily I get on without God!" Care nothing for their boasting; it will end so soon. Their rue walketh through the earth, but it only shows their vanity. It is galling to see the Enemies of God Triumphant.

For policy for a time beats the plainness of the lover of truth. Their deceit baffles the plain man. The lovers of error outnumber the men of God. Such men tread on the heads and trust-deeds and every other legal objection of honest people. What care they? They despise the old-fashioned folk whom they despise. Remember Haman, in the Book of Esther, and note how glorious he was till he hung up on the gallows.

Dear friends, if you envy the wicked it does you serious harm. Envy helps in nothing but it hinders in many ways. If you envy the wicked you may soon wish to be like them. Do so wish, you are like them now! He would be willing to be wicked in order to prosper, is wicked already. He who says, "I would like to do as they do, that I might grow as they do"; why, he is a man that has his feet, and would sell his soul if he could meet a purchaser. No, not for all the world would we have the lot of unbelievers. We would sit the gate with Mordecai sooner than feast with the king with Haman. God help us, dear friends, that we may not be disturbed by seeing the prosperity of the wicked.

We close with

The Helpful Consideration.

The text says, "For surely there is an end; and the expectation shall not be cut off. First of all, there is an end of this life. These things are not forever; on the contrary, all that we see is dissolving view. Surely, every man walketh in vain show: even as a show it is in vain. Talk of spiritual things as though they were lows; but in very truth these are the only substance. Temporal things are as the mirage of the desert. The things about us are such as dreams are made of; and when we truly see we shall despise their image.

Next, there is an end of the worldling's prosperity. He makes his money; What then? He makes more. What then? He makes more. What then? He dies; and there is a little notice in the newspaper which says that he died worth so much; which, being interpreted, means that he was taken away from so much which he never possessed, but guarded for his heir. There is an end in death, and after death the judgment; "for God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing. What an end will that be! The sinner may live as carelessly as he pleases, but he must answer for it at the judgment-seat of Christ. Loud may be his laughter, sarcastic and bitter may be his criticisms upon religion; but there is an end; and when the death-sweat beads his brow, he will lower his key, and need help from that very gospel which he criticised." "There is an end." Let us not spend our lives for that which hath an end: an immortal soul should seek immortal joys.

Dear friends, to you there is an end in quite another sense. God has

An End in Your Trouble

and exercise. Your difficulties and trials are sent as messengers from God with gracious design. "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long"; for every part of the day hath its tendency to work out your spiritual education, your preparation for the heaven to come. In everything that happens to you your heavenly Father has an end. The arrows of calamity are aimed at your sins. Your bitter cups are meant to purify the inward parts of the soul. Fret not, but trust. There is an old proverb, that you should never let children and fools see half-finished works: even so, the work of God in providence cannot be judged of by such poor children as we are; for we cannot see to the end of the Lord's design. My brethren, when we see the end from the beginning, and behold God's work complete, we shall have a very different view of things from what we have now, while the work is still proceeding.

Lastly, whilst there is an end to the wicked, there will be no failure to your expectation. What are you expecting? That God will keep His promise? And so He will. That God will give you peace in the end? And so He will. That He will raise you from the dead, and set you in heavenly places with Christ? And so He will. And that you shall be forever with the Lord, and He will grant you glory and bliss? And so He will. "Your expectation shall not be cut off." Every Christian is a man of great expectations, and none of them will fail. Let him cultivate his hope, and enlarge its scope! for the hopes which are built on Jesus and His grace will never disappoint us. In our case the birds in the bush are better birds than those in the hand; and they are quite as sure. The promise of God is in itself a possession, and our expectation of it is in itself an enjoyment. By faith grasp the eternal. Treasure the spiritual. Rejoice in God, and "be in the fear of the Lord all the day long." God grant you this in His great grace, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Palestinian Census.*

To Bethlehem as the birthplace of the Messiah, not only Old Testament prediction, but the testimony of Rabbinic teaching, unhesitatingly pointed. Yet nothing could be imagined more directly contrary to Jewish thought—and hence nothing less likely to suggest itself to Jewish invention—than the circumstances which according to the Gospel narrative, brought about the birth of the Messiah in Bethlehem. A counting of the people, or census taken at the bidding of a heathen Emperor, and executed by one so universally hated as Herod, would represent the ne plus ultra of all that was most repugnant to Jewish feeling. That the Emperor Augustus made registers of the Roman Empire, and of subject and tributary states is now generally admitted. This registration for the purpose of future taxation, would also embrace Palestine. Even if no actual order to that effect had been issued during the lifetime of Herod, we can understand that he would deem it most expedient, in view of the probable excitement which a heathen census would cause in Palestine, to take steps for making a registration rather according to the Jewish, than the Roman manner.

According to the Roman law, all country people were to be registered in their own city—meaning thereby the town to which the village or place where they were born, was attached. According to the Jewish mode of registration the people would have been enrolled according to tribes, families, or clans, and the house of their fathers. But as the ten tribes had not returned to Palestine, this could take place to only a very limited extent, while it would be easy for each to be registered in his own city. In the case of Joseph and Mary, whose descent from David was not only known, but where, for the sake of the unborn Messiah, it was natural that, in accordance with Jewish law, they should have gone to Bethlehem. Indeed, so strong was this feeling, that it afterwards required special direction to induce Joseph to relinquish this chosen place of residence, and to return into Galilee. In these circumstances, Mary, now the wife of Joseph, though standing to him only in the actual relationship of betrothed, would, of course, accompany her husband to Bethlehem.

Jesus in the Temple.

We read in the Talmud that the members of the Temple-Sanhedrim, who on ordinary days sat as a court of appeal from the close of the morning, to the time of the evening sacrifice, were wont on Sabbath and feast-days to come out on the terrace of the Temple, and there to teach. In such popular instruction the utmost latitude of questioning would be given. It is in this audience, which sat upon the ground, surrounding and mingling with the Doctors that we must seek the child Jesus. The presence and the questioning of a child of that age did not necessarily imply anything so extraordinary, as to convey the idea of supernaturalness to those Doctors, or others in the audience. Scientific theological learning would not be necessary to take part in such popular discussions. If we may judge from later arrangements, not only in Babylon, but in Palestine, there were two kinds of public lectures and two kinds of students. The first, or more scientific lecture implied considerable preparation on the part of the lecturing Rabbis and at least some Talmudic knowledge on the part of the attendants. On the other hand there were "Students of the Court" who during ordinary lectures sat separated from the regular students by a kind of hedge, outside, as it were, in the court, some of whom seem to have been ignorant even of the Bible. But if there was nothing so unprecedented as to render His presence and questioning marvellous, yet all who heard Him were amazed at His combinatorial insight, and discerning answers. Judging by what we know of such discussions, we infer that His questioning may have been connected with the Paschal solemnities. Or perhaps He would lead up by His questions to their deeper meaning, as it was to be unfolded when Himself was offered up, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.

Other questions, also, almost force themselves on the mind—most notably this: whether on the occasion of this, His first visit to the Temple, the virgin-mother had told her Son the history of His infancy, and of what had happened when, for the first time He had been brought to the Temple. It would almost seem so if we might judge from the contrast between the virgin-mother's complaint about the search of His father and of her, and of His own emphatic appeal to the business of His Father. The reply of Jesus to their expostulation sets clearly these three things before us: He had been so entirely absorbed by the awakening thought of His being and mission, however kindled, as to be not

* From Jesus the Messiah. By Alfred Edersheim. An abridged edition of The Life and Times of Jesus of Nazareth. The lamented professor intended to have done this work himself, feeling that the message he had to deliver did not reach, in the larger work, all whose interest he desired to attract to the greatest of all Subjects; but he died before he could carry out his intention, and now the work has been done by others. It was a difficult task, but it has been very ably performed. Pp. 645; Price 9s.; Published by Anson D. F. Randolph, 38 West Twenty-third St., New York.

Dr. Parke, Physician to the Stanley Expedition, Drawing Poison From the Wound of Lieut. Stairs.

neglectful, but forgetful of all around. Secondly, we may venture to say that He now realized that this was emphatically His Father's house. And, thirdly, so far as we can judge, it was then and there that, for the first time, He felt the strong and irresistible impulse—that divine necessity of His being—to be about His Father's business.

DR. PARKE TREATING A WOUND.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the impressive incidents related by Mr. H. M. Stanley in his narrative of the expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha is depicted in the accompanying illustration. Stanley says that on August 13, 1887, they had a fierce fight with the natives at Avi Sibba, in which Lieut. Stairs was wounded. The expedition had crossed a river, and had camped in a little village when some arrows were shot at them by natives on the opposite bank. The Zanzibaris in Stanley's party replied by firing with their rifles, when Lieut. Stairs, who was second in command, promptly collected a party and took boat to repel the enemy. When about half way across the river a poisoned arrow struck the lieutenant just below the ribs, inflicting a dangerous wound. He broke off the arrow, leaving about an inch of the head in the flesh. On the return of the party, Dr. Parke, the surgeon of the expedition, examined the wound, and extracted the tip of the arrow which still remained in it. Finding that, as usual, the natives had steeped it in poison, he knelt down by the side of the wounded man and, applying his lips to the hole the arrow had made, he sucked the poison from the wound, which would otherwise have proved fatal. This was not the only deed of the kind performed by Dr. Parke. On several occasions he saved the lives of native members of the expedition who had been wounded, in a similar manner.

Dr. Parke acted on his belief that the poison in which the natives had steeped their arrows belonged to that class of poisons which is fatal when brought into contact with the blood, but is not fatal if taken into the stomach. There are many such poisons, and it was natural that the natives in preparing an arrow to do its deadly work, would use a poison of that kind. It was well for Lieut. Stairs, that someone was at hand who knew this fact, and had sufficient faith in his knowledge to venture his life upon it. It was in this case as in religion: mere knowledge, and theoretical faith were not sufficient. Dr. Parke did not shrink from acting on his faith, and thereby proved his sincerity as well as saved the life of his friend. That kind of faith is rare among Christians. Many who would indignantly deny that they doubt God's promises are afraid to venture their income and their lives upon them.

AMONG THE AFRICAN DWARFS.

(See Illustration.)

RUMORS have been current for several years that there existed in Central Africa a tribe of diminutive savages, near akin to apes in appearance, and little superior to them in intelligence. Not much credence was given to these reports until 1865, when Paul du Chaillu, the intrepid explorer made his second expedition into the interior. He tells us in his interesting work on Equatorial Africa* that he came upon an extraordinary village in the midst of a dense jungle, the inhabitants of which fled at his approach. He examined the village at his leisure and found the huts to be evidently the homes of very small people. They were of low oval shape, the highest part, which was in the centre, being only four feet from the ground. They were made of flexible branches of trees arched over and fixed in the ground at each end, the longest branches being in the middle, and the others successively shorter, the whole being covered with leaves.

In the course of his journey, M. du Chaillu had the satisfaction of finding another village of the dwarfs. In this case, as before, there was a general stampede when he was seen, but one old woman, who was too old to run, remained. To her the explorer gave some beads and told her that he should return with more beads the next day, and wanted the other women to be there to receive them. On the following day the village was completely deserted, not even the promise of beads having succeeded in allaying their fears. M. du Chaillu however was determined to see the strange people and remained in a village of the Oshango tribe not far away, and made frequent excursions to the village of the dwarfs.

A Nomadic Race.

From the Oshango people he learned that the dwarfs were called Obongo, and were an isolated people. The Oshangoes disdainfully declared that they were no kin of theirs, and evidently despised them. They tolerated their presence for selfish reasons. The Obongoes were skilled trappers, and were anxious to exchange the animals they caught after satisfying their own appetites, with the Oshangoes for water-jars, cooking utensils, and iron implements, which they could not manufacture for themselves. They were also expert fishermen. They never stayed long in one place, but when the wild animals and fish became scarce would move to another locality.

M. du Chaillu succeeded in getting sight of some of the men when they came to the village to barter. They were less than four feet high. One who was considered unusually tall was nearly five feet. They would not suffer him to measure them or even to come near them. In color they were much lighter than their neighbors, the Oshango. They were a kind of dirty yellow, and the men had tufts of dark hair growing on their arms, legs and breasts. Their eyes had an untameable wild glare in them. Their foreheads were low and narrow, their legs were short, but their arms were not disproportionately long.

After many failures, M. du Chaillu found several of the women in the village and gave them beads, but failed to win their confidence, or to overcome their dread of him. They were even smaller than the men, and seemed to be utterly destitute of intelligence. In the illustration they are represented devouring non-poisonous snakes, of which they are very fond.

Mr. Stanley and the Dwarfs.

At Ugarrowwa's Station, during his recent expedition, Mr. Stanley encountered the dwarfs for the first time. It is remarkable that these little people were known to the nations of antiquity, but until M. du Chaillu found them it has been considered by modern writers that they were only a fabulous people. Thus an Encyclopædia published as recently as 1862, remarks, "The pygmies were a fabulous nation of dwarfs, who were said to live near the sources of the Nile, or according to some, in India. They are mentioned by Homer."

Mr. Stanley thus describes a female dwarf, the first specimen of the tribe that he saw: She measured thirty-three inches in height, and was a perfectly formed young woman of about seventeen, of a glistening and smooth sleekness of body. Her figure was that of a miniature colored lady, not wanting a certain grace, and her face was very prepossessing. Her complexion was that of a quadroon, or of the color of yellow ivory. Her eyes were magnificent, but absurdly large for such a small creature—almost as large as that of a young gazelle; full, protruding, and extremely lustrous. Absolutely nude, the little demoiselle was quite self-possessed, as though she were accustomed to be admired, and enjoyed observation."

Mr. Stanley made the acquaintance of several

* Published, price $1.75 by Harper and Brothers, New York.

The Dwarfs of Central Africa Feasting on Snakes.

of the dwarfs during his journey. He "Scattered among the Balesse are the Butti, variously called Batwa, Alka, and Gu. They vary in height from three feet to four feet six inches. A full-grown adult male weighs ninety pounds. They are perfect scouts, and contrive by their knowledge of the intricacies of the forest, obtain early intelligence of the coming of others, and to send information to their settlements. They are thus like voluntary pickets, guarding the clearings and settlements. A road from any direction runs through the camps. Their villages command every way. Against any strange natives, disposed to be aggressive, they would combine with their taller neighbors, and they are by no means despicable allies. When arrows are arrayed against arrows, poison against poison, and craft against craft, probably the party assisted by the pygmies would prevail."

Expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 462.)

LIGHT ON A DARK PROBLEM.

It certainly did look like a fatal disaster, as he fell from the top of the bank. The young man lay so still, and his face was so pallid that he seemed like one dead. The men were horrified as they looked, and with that strange sympathy, that a calamity calls forth even in the most, least sentimental of men, they hurried to the young man's side to see if they could do anything for him. Sympathy should not be rare in such a case, but the common brotherhood of men is so often forgotten that its reaction in emergencies causes surprise. The man who would have cared nothing for him, and well, now hurried to the stranger's side, tensely anxious for his welfare.

"Please do not wrench my arm, men; I'm afraid it is broken."

These were among the first words that Howard Scott spoke to the men who had rushed to his rescue, when he came back to consciousness, and his apprehensions proved correct,

His arm was broken and he was otherwise badly bruised. After extricating him from the debris of the wrecked carriage and broken harness, the men carried him to the top of the bank, and then having procured a wagon, conveyed him to town, to the house of his sister, where he was placed at once under a surgeon's care.

It was a little trying for an active young man like Howard to be confined to the house for several weeks, and he chafed at his detention from work. One day when his invalid's chair was drawn into the room where his sister sat, he said, somewhat petulantly:

"I don't see through this thing, Mary. There were so many things I wanted to do this spring. There's that assignment case that has been put into Will's hands for settlement"—Will was the attorney, Howard's brother-in-law—"I was very anxious to see how he managed it. Besides, I had planned several excursions to the country in April and May; and here I am shut up in the house with a lame arm, while the glorious days are slipping past. It's a little hard to see what good will result from such an accident. Don't you think so, Mary?"

His sister allowed him to finish his complaint without interruption, and then said: "No doubt it is sometimes. But I think I'll have to give you a lesson on the 'moral uses of dark things.'"

"That doesn't go to the root of the matter," interposed Howard. "Why can't we have the moral use minus the dark things? That's what I'd like to know."

"Well, you know," laughed his sister, "I haven't been to college as you have, and I am afraid I can't argue the question very skilfully. But I don't see how our moral powers could be developed without trial, without a test, without something that would call the will into exercise. If there were no trials and temptations, we might be very happy, but I don't see how we could be called morally good."

"I declare, Mary, you're becoming a second Aristotle," exclaimed Howard. "I'm surprised at your depth."

"Oh! spare your compliments and let me finish my argument," said the woman, with a smile. "Taking up the thread of thought where it was dropped, let me ask, for example, how patience, which is one of the most beautiful of the virtues, could be cultivated if there were nothing to test human endurance? We call a man morally strong and grand when he is able to stand firm against temptation, but if there were no temptation there would be no opportunity for developing moral strength; there would be no chance for moral heroism."

"There you go again, my metaphysical sister, like an old Greek sage. Your argument seems plausible, and I feel too weak to make the mental effort to refute it, even if refutation were possible. But I have a question to ask, though I'm half ashamed to put it. Wouldn't it have been just as well to have made man happy and free from cares and trials of all kinds, without so much regard to his moral character?"

The young man's face flushed as he made the inquiry.

"Howard," said his sister, laying her sewing upon her lap and looking at him intently, as if to read his inmost thought, "is that what your opposition to Christianity is doing for you? I never heard you speak so before. You certainly cannot mean that you are beginning to care less for the good than for the pleasurable. That might prove ruinous to your—"

"Oh! Mary, don't lecture me, please," interrupted Howard; "I'm not in a mood for it to-day. I only put the question to bring you out and see how astute you were. I didn't mean to announce it as a principle of my own life. Nothing of the kind. Yes, you are correct; it is better to do right than to be happy, where the two won't go together. I wish I knew, though, what is the moral use of my tumbling over a river-bank and breaking my arm."

"I have no doubt good will come out of it," replied his sister. "'All things work together'—you know the verse."

Howard lay back upon the chair, feeling that his accident might not be so sad a calamity after all, if he could be patient, and soon his regular breathing showed that he had fallen asleep. A few days later while he and Mr. Bollis, his brother-in-law, sat in the room talking over some legal matters, their conversation was cut short by the entrance of the young man's sister, whose face was radiant with pleasure.

Well, Mary, you must have heard good news," said her husband. "Your face shines like — Venus; I mean the star, not the Greek goddess."

"Yes, I've found something in this paper that pleases me very much," she cried, jubilantly, holding up the journal. "It is the Weekly Reflector. It is always good, but it is better than usual now. It contains a serial story by Robert Heritage. You know Heritage, don't you, Will? He's the Principal of the High School here, and a member of our church. Don't you remember seeing him? He teaches the young men's Bible class."

"Perhaps if I went to church and Sunday-school as often as you do, Mary," replied her husband, with a smile, "I should have seen him there. But I do know Heritage. Meet him on the street almost every day, and he's been in my office two or three times. Came in to get light on some legal points, though he didn't say what his object was. Smart fellow. Clever, too, as he can be."

"But what about his literary venture, Mary?" inquired Howard.

"It is a religious story, or rather a theological one —"

"Oh! a Sunday-school tale, is it? Does the good little boy die?" and there was an undertone of sarcasm in Howard's tones.

"It is nothing of the kind," declared Mrs. Bollis. "The story is not of the clumsy, goody-goody sort, I assure you. It is a strong work, and you can see that it is written by a man who thinks and knows how to picture real life, and who doesn't make his characters either preternaturally good or preternaturally bad. The story deals with doubt, with rationalism, Howard."

"Is that so? I'm all attention."

"The author traces the steps by which a young man becomes a doubter through reading rationalistic books, and finally an open unbeliever; describes in a most vivid style his mental perplexities, his struggles, his ennui, and his unsatisfied longing for the truth; and, more than all, throws light on many of the questions that disturb the restive, unsettled mind. So much as far as I have gone. It has been running four weeks, but I have been so busy that I did not see it till to-day, and I have read them all now and am longing for more. Howard, I want you to read the story."

"I'm afraid it won't benefit me much," Howard replied, nonchalantly. "Stories are generally written by men and women who are not capable of writing anything solid."

"Take care, Howard," put in the lawyer; "you forget George Eliot's Romola. She could write solid books as well as stories."

"And Scott's Ivanhoe and Guy Mannering," added Mrs. Bollis.

"And Victor Hugo and Thackeray," supplements Bollis, with a hearty laugh.

"You don't mean to say that Heritage is to be classed with the masters, do you?" exclaimed Howard. "Is it possible that a genius has fallen from the sky and taken up his abode in Bas-serine? If so, I'm his devotee, for I worship genius."

"Genius or no genius, this is a healthful and instructive story, and I hope you will read it," said Mrs. Bollis, laying the papers on the table and starting from the room.

"May I read it, too?" called the attorney, laughing gayly, as his wife stood in the door.

She came back, and, giving her husband a fond caress, said, in low, earnest tones: "I hope you will, dear. It will help you to think more seriously of spiritual matters. I long so to see you a Christian man, Will."

"Well! Mary has taken quite a serious turn to-day," remarked the lawyer, a little more thoughtfully than usual, after his wife had left the room. "Do you want to read the story now, Howard? I must go to the office for a few hours."

"I believe I will look it over," said the young man, taking the journals from the other's hand.

Left alone, Howard began the perusal of Parted Lives. It must be confessed that he took it up with a profound prejudice and no little aversion, first, because the very thought of a religious novel was repugnant to his ideas of literary art, and, second, because he expected it to consist of a series of misrepresentations and caricatures of the characters and lives of unbelievers, such as he had found in several one-sided, apologetic works he had tried to read a few years before. He therefore began to read languidly. But he had not gone far before a sentence arrested his attention, and he soon felt interested. A little farther on, the author's purpose became clear, and the young reader saw that it was not vituperation, not abuse, not even controversy with the opponent of Christianity, that formed the motive of the story, but a sincere desire to picture truthfully the difficulties of the doubter, and then point out the way to assurance and mental quietude. More than all, it was the writer's honest sympathy with the doubter, and his kindly treatment of his perplexities, that won the confidence of the young man, and even touched his feelings. As he read, he saw a picture of his own mental life, and could not help fancying himself the hero of the story.

"The author must have gone through all these spiritual throes himself, or he could never have described them so accurately," was Howard's mental comment. Then he read on through the next chapter, and the tears stole from his eyes and followed one another down his cheeks.

"I declare! I never was so touched in my life," he said, brushing away the tears and looking through their film at the lines before him. "How did the author get hold of my spiritual biography, I wonder? It seems almost like a case of divination, or clairvoyance, or mind-reading."

When he reached the end of the fourth chapter, it was almost with a shock that he ran against the bracketed "To be continued," and became conscious that he could read no more until the next number of the paper came to hand. He sat musing for a long time, gazing abstractedly out at the gathering dusk, and when his sister came in to light the gas, he said, steadying his voice as much as he could:

"Mary, did you say Robert Heritage was the teacher of a Bible-class at your church?"

"Of a young men's Bible-class—yes."

"If I'm well enough next Sunday, may I go with you to the school, and will you introduce me to Heritage and ask him to let me join his class?"

"My dear Howard!" said the good woman, bursting into tears. "I shall be only too glad—" But she could say no more. Hurrying to her room, she fell upon her knees in devout thankfulness. As she had predicted, some good was coming already of Howard's accident.

Howard's resolution was not a mere momentary impulse. The next Sunday morning found him, his arm still in a sling, in the family carriage with his sister and brother-in-law, whom he had persuaded to accompany them to the place of worship. The Sabbath-school was held in the morning before the preaching service.

Perhaps the young doubter was a little disappointed in Robert Heritage when he was introduced to him that morning. He expected to find a man of striking appearance, whose genius shone from his features. Instead, however, of the ideal man of his conceptions, he found him a man of medium height, rather heavily and compactly built, with a round, genial, almost rosy face, which beamed with good-nature and jollity, and which would have been boyish in its expression, had it not been for the dark, heavy moustache, that proclaimed him about thirty.

However, his disappointment was soon changed into admiration, when Heritage came and sat down by his side and gave him a warm welcome to the class, taking his name and address. Then he made several inquiries, not too tentative, and yet sufficiently pertinent to give him some idea of the young man's attitude toward Christianity. Howard's reserve melted away, and he unbosomed himself more freely than was his wont with strangers, and finally acknowledged that he had been reading Heritage's Parted Lives, the perusal of which had brought him to the class.

"I am thankful," said Heritage, modestly and reverently, "that God has given me an opportunity to do good in more ways than one."

Howard was struck by the man's evident sincerity and singleness of aim. While he was indifferent to praise—no man is—he yet more anxious to do good than to win human plaudits. The conversation between the men had taken place before the opening of school, while the hushed hum of conversation was going on in the room. Heritage had gone to speak to some other young men of the class, and Howard sat looking over the throng.

It is seldom that one has a prevision that epoch is about to occur in one's life, for it usually comes in the most unlooked-for fashion. Certain it is that when Howard Wescott went to church that morning, he had no premonition that he should see two individuals whose paths were to be closely interlaced with his in the most intricate and romantic way. It is that the planisphere of our "tangled life" is hidden from our sight.

Suddenly Howard became conscious, by a subtle and mysterious telegraphy, that some one was walking up the aisle on the opposite side of the church. Involuntarily he glanced that direction, his eye falling upon the form of a young lady, who moved up the aisle a half-way to the front and then took her place in a pew with a class of small girls. They clustered about her in an affectionate way, and it plain that she was their teacher and held a warm place in their hearts. To say that the girl made a vivid impression upon Howard would be to put the case mildly. It almost seemed, in the language of romance, that he "met his destiny." He watched her during the routine exercises of the school, when the lesson was begun and she turned her chair around, he had an opportunity of studying her face.

Others may not have thought her beautiful. Even Howard was undecided on that point, her face seemed to put every standard of æsthetic judgment to the blush. For Howard it seemed a charm, a fascination, which he could not account for. The spell lay more in its expression than in any special attractiveness or symmetry of the features. He saw that her eyes were large and of that gray blue cast with hazel near the iris, which is so common everywhere; and yet the slightly languid drooping of the lids seemed unique. By a great effort he withdrew his mind from her and gave attention to Heritage's explanation of the lesson, and was pleased to note the clear, logical character of his comments. There was no attempt to go into subtleties, and yet no dull point was slurred over. Several questions that Howard put were answered with the candor and courtesy.

"You will come regularly, I hope," Heritage said, when the school was dismissed.

Howard readily gave his promise, and having found his friends, went with them to the audience room for the preaching service. While the solemn tones of the organ "voluntary" welcomed the gathering congregation, the young man noticed that the members of the choir were taking their places. A woman presently advanced from the rear of the choir to the chair that had been left vacant for her, and Howard saw, with a thrill of pleasure, that it was the girl who had interested him so in the Sunday-school room. He could not suppress the question that rose to his lips.

"Who is the young lady sitting next to you, the one that I should judge sing next?" he whispered to his sister.

"Her name is Addie More."

(To be Continued.)

WELSHMAN'S TRUST.
 dency to rest hope for salvation rms and ceremonies exists in all among all people; but it is surt it should be so in the face of the clation of God's word. Men told now as much as Nicodemus must be born again." An in-point is related by Mr. John Pugh preacher. He says: "I rememin Wales who lay dying. He good living man, and attended gularly. As it became evident had not long to live in this wife sent for his minister, who he Sacrament, and after speaking iring words left him. After he however, the wife began to be even though he had partaken
 's Supper there was something nd so excited did she become, ver the thought, that she sent for a very young man then, and stomed to these scenes; but I as my duty, as a minister of the speak the whole truth. Seating his bed, I said to him, 'Now you very verge of eternity, and are ared?' 'Yes,' was the reply, erciful, and I rest on his great
 'That is true,' I answered; 'God
 l. More so than either you or I ne; but is that sufficient? You He requires a complete change d He promises to give it to those him through Christ. He cannot is mercy at the expense of His But in His wonderful grace He a way whereby He can be both nd just. Jesus has taken our sins n, and paid the penalty, and now, vledging Him as our Substitute, ring pardon in His name we can
 The poor dying man saw where en wrong, and humbly and ear-ight pardon through his Saviour."

STANLEY'S LOST GUN.
 timony of Mr. H. M. Stanley is phatically and unequivocally to of mission work in Africa. He nally witnessed the change, and ony is therefore entitled to credit.
 ers, in the course of a recent ad-dresd to that testimony, and related ing incident which he had heard Stanley, and which occurred on expedition: Mr. Stanley said: "I my soldiers dragging a native for being found in possession of guns. I examined it, and saw was no doubt that it belonged to ition. I questioned him but he of 'Stanley' and could not an-at last he said, 'I am a son of uld not steal.' These were the s he would say, and he repeated nd again. Then it dawned hat this must be one of the mis-sers, and I resolved to give him un and see what he would do as soon as he received the gun he and when I arrived at the next ere was the gun waiting for me.
 and picked it up and not knowing t belonged, had, as soon as freed en it to the missionary, who had that station that I might get it Christianity in the African makes change in the character. They tianity into the every-day duties

INFIDEL WAS CONVINCED.
 t that Christianity has the prom-life that now is, as well as of that o come was realized lately by a was an infidel lecturer, but is earnest Christian. He was not by argument nor by fear of a ishment, but by a conviction that dfforded no protection to the mor-Christianity, even if it were not give that protection. The Rev.
 ls, who was associated with him an work, was amazed when he he had once been a pronounced of the faith he was preaching, him if it was true. He replied, quite true; but my infidelity was on the day when my first boy was hen detected myself resolving that ot bring him up as an infidel, as I did not wish him to run any risks to his morals. I had myself escaped those immoral snares, but then I had had the advantage of a Christian training! With an outburst of internal laughter, I then said to myself, 'You are a fine fellow; you hold a creed you dare not teach your boy. If it be not good for the son, how can it be good for the father? You who deny God, would you like to see the wife whom you love, and the children who look up to you as all that is good, following in your footsteps?

 Then why pursue that course yourself?
 Your instinct tells you it is wrong for those you love; yet, blinded by a false pride, you hold to it for yourself.' From this point he went on his argument with himself to consider that if Christianity was, as he had been forced to admit, a good thing for the morals of a boy, it must be a good thing in itself. A bad thing cannot bring forth good.
 He then reconsidered the whole question afresh with a tendency in its favor. When he had considered it at first his bias had been against it. His earnest seeking led to his conversion and he was soon conscious by actual proof in his own soul that he was changed by supernatural power.

THE ESTEY OR-GAN Co. have sold enough organs
 in the last fifty years to supply one to every nine farms in this country to-day.
 This is true of no
 other organ.

PIANOS UNIVERSITY
 $150 to $1500
 ESTAB. 1859. INCOR. 1877
PRICE They Lead the World!
 Sent for trial in your own home.
 * ABSOLUTELY PERFECT Guaranteed Six Years.
 Sold Direct to families. No Middle-men.
 DON'T BUY A POOR PIANO!
 Cat. Free.
MARGAL & SMITH PIANO CO.
 235 E. 21st St., N.Y.
ORGANS $35 to $500

P. D. & S. Pens
 SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.
 Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

"Demonology or Spiritualism," Ancient and Modern. "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject." "Startling disclosures. History facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and Christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.
"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP
 for CHILDREN TEETHING. SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cts. a bottle
BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

HOOD'S
 COMPOUND EXTRACT
SARSAPARILLA
 TRADE MARK
 Hood's Sarsaparilla has by its peculiar merit and its wonderful cures won the confidence of the people, and is to-day the most popular blood purifier and strengthening medicine. It cures scrofula, salt rheum, dyspepsia, headache, kidney and liver complaint, catarrh, rheumatism, etc. Be sure to get Hood's Sarsaparilla, which is peculiar to itself. Hood's Sarsaparilla sold by druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared by C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.
100 Doses One Dollar

EVERY MOTHER
 Should Have It in The House.
 Dropped on Sugar, Children Love to take JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cramps and Pains. Relieves all Summer Complaints, Cuts and Bruises like magic. Sold everywhere. Price 35c. by mail; 6 bottles Express paid, $2. L. S. JOHNSON & CO., Boston, Mass.

LADIES!
 Use Only BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING on your Boots and Shoes.
 Sold by all Dealers.

WINNOWN SONGS By Ira D. Sankey.
 Is the latest, largest, strongest, cheapest and best Sunday-school Song Book published. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If by mail 5 cents per copy additional.
Biglow & Main, New York and Chicago. The John Church Co., Cincinnati & New York.

CARMEL
CARMEL SOAP is made only from sweet Olive Oil by a Mission Society in Palestine. Being ABSOLUTELY PURE and possessing the emollient properties of Olive Oil, it is unsurpassed for the Toilet and Bath, and superior to all other soaps for the Teeth and Hair. It is the only perfectly safe soap for the NURSERY and Invalids. If your druggist or grocer does not keep it, send 10 cents for sample cake to the importer, A. KLIPSTEIN, 52 Cedar St., New York.

HOW TO BUILD A HOUSE.
 If you are thinking about building a house you should send 5 cents for my new book containing plans and specifications for houses, all sizes, from 2 rooms up, costing from $300 to $5,000. A book of great value to all who desire to build a house, and will suit you almost as well as if you paid $5 for a book. Sent post-paid on receipt of 5 cents. Address J. S. OGILVIE, Publisher, 57 ROSE ST., New York.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts.
 If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.
SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address
CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

OIOLOGRAPHY AGENTS WANTED.—$5 to $10 per day collecting small pictures for us to copy and enlarge. Satisfaction guaranteed and a $4 outfit free. Address A. DUNNE & CO., 56 Reade St., N.Y. Name Ch's'n Herald.
Sample Vial "RUBIFOAM" sent free by E. W. HOYT & CO., Lowell, Mass.

THIS WEEK
 We shall offer in our salesroom, in the basement, several well assorted lots of Fancy Silks, Surahs, Figured Indias in Woven and Printed Designs, Brocade Satins and various other styles of Novelties, at the uniform price of 50 cents per yard.
ON THE MAIN FLOOR
 Several thousand yards of Plain Dress Silks, Surahs, etc., in lengths of 20 yards and under, at half price. Our stock of Figured India and China Silks has also been reduced in price. Great advantages will be offered in this department.

James McCreery & Co
 Broadway, cor. Eleventh St., NEW YORK.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY.
DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.
 Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.
 Patented 1879-1885 1885-1886
 No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylab, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine.
 Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.
THE MCDOWELL CO.
 6 West 14th Street, New York City.
 We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

FRUIT DIET Is the best now. It you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds, in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 777 Broadway, New York City.

BAILEY'S
 Compound light-spreading Silver-plated Corrugated Glass REFLECTORS
 A wonderful invention for lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.
BAILEY REFLECTOR CO.
 708 Penn Ave. Pittsburgh, Pa.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.
VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA
 "Best & Goes Farthest."
 Ask your Grocer for it, take no other. [63]

"Good sense is the master of all human life," and it is a good proof of common sense to use

SAPOLIO.
 It is a solid cake of Scouring Soap. Try it,

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE-ROLLERS
 Beware of Imitations.
NOTICE
 AUTOGRAPH OF Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Talmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly taught by mail or personally. Situations procured all pupils when competent. Send for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oswego, N.Y.

"ROCK OF AGES."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—

Thoughtlessly the maiden sung;
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, gleeful tongue;
Sang as little children sing;
Sang as sing the birds in June;
Fell the words like light leaves down,
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Let me hide myself in Thee"—

Felt her soul no need to hide;
Sweet the song as song could be—
And she had no thought beside;
All the words unheedingly
Fell from lips untouched by care, Dreaming not they each might be
On some other lips a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—

'Twas a woman sung them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully;
Every word her heart did know,
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air,
Every note with sorrow stirred—Every syllable a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—

Lips grown aged sung the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly—Voice grown weak and eyes grown
"Let me hide myself in Thee;" [dim,
Trembling though the voice and low,
Ran the sweet strain peacefully
Like a river in its flow.
Sung as only they can sing
Who life's thorny paths have pressed;
Sung as only they can sing
Who behold the promised rest—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—

Sung above a coffin lid;
Underneath, all restfully,
All life's joys and sorrows hid,
Nevermore, O storm-tossed soul,
Nevermore from wind or tide,
Nevermore from billow's roll,
Wilt thou need thyself to hide.
Could the sightless, sunken eyes,
Closed beneath the soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer, Still, ay, still the words would be
"Let me hide myself in Thee."

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Pimples, boils and other humors of the blood are liable to manifest themselves in warm weather when the blood gets heated. To prevent or cure them, take Hood's Sarsaparilla. 100 doses $1.

A HINDOO HOME MISSIONARY.

At a missionary meeting in London recently, the Rev. J. S. Ellison of Mymensing, India, said that he had left his work in India in charge of a very remarkable man. He first met him on a journey, in the course of which, he called on Mr. Bean, another missionary. Mr. Bean said to him, "Mr. Ellison, there is a young man here from Mymensing who wants to be baptised." "I saw the young man," says Mr. Ellison,

"and found he was very anxious to be baptised as soon as possible, for he feared that his relations would steal him away. I consented to baptise him on the ensuing Sunday. However, on the Sunday his relatives prevented his coming to the mission house, and he could not come on the Sunday to be baptised. I found it out afterwards and visited him. I found that he was in a house full of young men who were students in that college. By request he came down from an upper story and sat on a bench before them all, and I said to him, 'They have prevented you from being baptised, but they cannot prevent you from believing in Christ.' He said, 'No; my faith is firm in Him.' He went to Calcutta. His brother and others did all they could to persuade him to go back into Hinduism, but all in vain. Eventually he was baptised there, and after a few months he went to Seramore College. There he was trained for the native ministry for two years, and then he went to Barrisal, and served our society for two years there. And just a few months before I left India he was transferred to the Mymensing district. He was appointed by the Conference as an assistant missionary. But when I had to leave my work on account of ill-health, the whole burden of the mission was put upon him. Now, here you have an instance of a young man who was converted during my stay there, who passed through his college course, and served an apprenticeship in the ministry, and now he is a home missionary."

A VOLUNTARY SLAVE.

In a church in Algiers a recent visitor noticed a memorial tablet to the Rev. Devereux Spratt, bearing a remarkable inscription. He made inquiries respecting the man, and was referred to Admiral Spratt who belonged to his family. From him he learned a history of self-sacrifice rarely recorded. It appears that Devereux Spratt was on board a ship that was captured by Algerine pirates in the year 1641. The crew and passengers, 120 in number, were carried to Algiers, and sold into slavery. Mr. Spratt's family brought influence to bear on the British Government in his behalf, and eventually the Dey of Algiers was induced to grant his manumission. Mr. Spratt, however, had made use of his opportunity to preach the gospel to his fellow captives. A good work had begun among them and many in their slavery had become free men in Christ. To the Christians there, also, Mr. Spratt's teaching had become very precious supporting them under their trials and hardships. The thought of losing him was very bitter to them though they rejoiced that the good fortune, denied them, had fallen to him. But Mr. Spratt could not bear to leave his fellow captives to whom God had made him useful. He therefore declined the offer of emancipation and voluntarily remained in slavery till the day of his death, that he might continue to minister to the unhappy slaves. His was the spirit of Christ who "took upon Him the form of a servant . . . and became obedient unto death," that he might save His people.

A PILLOW IN A HOSPITAL.

It is remarkable how ignorant and learned, poor and rich, humble and distinguished, alike find in Christ support and comfort in their hours of trial. No better proof could be furnished of the divinity of Christ and the supernatural origin of His teaching. When Benjamin Parsons, the saintly Congregational minister lay dying at the close of a long and useful life, Dr. Paxton Hood went to visit him. He was shown into the room where the veteran preacher lay. After some conversation, Paxton Hood said, "Well, brother, on what are you resting?" "Oh, I am resting easily, on a three-fold pillow." "A three-fold pillow! What is it?" "Infinite love, infinite wisdom, infinite power. All met in my Redeemer." And resting on that pillow the good old saint went home to the Lord whom he had served so long and faithfully. Dr. Hood, the following Sabbath told the story in his Church. Seated in one of the back pews during his address, was a young girl who felt that she must have that same pillow, and by God's grace she was soon the happy possessor of it. A few days afterward she became unwell, and was removed to the infirmary, where she had to undergo an operation. As she was placed on the operating table, the doctor withdrew, one by one, the pillows on which she lay, until he came to the last one, that which supported her head. Looking up into the doctor's face, she said, "Doctor, must that go also?" "Yes," said the big-hearted doctor, in his kindest voice, as he gazed down at her with tears in his eyes, "it is necessary that you should be flat on the board." "Then take it," was the resigned reply, "but you cannot take Benjamin Parsons' pillow from me." "Benjamin Parsons' pillow! What is that?" "Infinite love, infinite wisdom, infinite power, all met in my Redeemer."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

BOUNDING BILLOWS

ON THE SEA,

or the pure Mountain Breezes will soon invite your presence. Make your leisure twice the pleasure, by taking along our entertaining music.

(If you have no Guitar, Mandolin, Banjo, Flute or Violin, call or send for lists of fine instruments at our branch store, J. C. HAYNES & Co., 33 Court Street, Boston.)

OPERATIC PIANO COLLECTION. The best of the music of 19 operas. Price, $1.00. Arranged for Piano.

YOUNG PLAYERS' POPULAR COLLECTION. 51 very easy and very good pieces. Price, $1.00.

SABBATH DAY MUSIC. For Piano. 38 beautiful Melodies, finely arranged. Price $1.

Vol. 2 of Miss Eleanor W. Everest's ALBUM OF SONGS. 12 first-class Songs by the best authors. Price $1.

COLLEGE SONGS. New, enlarged edition. 82 jolly Songs. 200,000 sold. Price 50 cents.

OLD FAMILIAR DANCES. For the Piano. 100 of them. Easy, and as merry as they can be. 50 cents.

FOR MUSIC FESTIVALS.

THE ATLAS. By Carl Zerrahn. 29 splendid Choruses. Sacred and Secular. Most of them quite new. $1.

Any book mailed for retail price.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.

C. H. DITSON & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

HIRES'

ROOT BEER.

The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME TEMPERANCE DRINK in the world. Delicious and Sparkling. TRY IT.

Ask your Druggist or Grocer for it.

C. E. HIRES, PHILADELPHIA.

CHANCE FOR ALL

To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER of 3 1/2 pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., P. O. Box 289, 51 and 53 Vesey St., New York.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores and Residences. ARTISTIC

H. S. NORTHROP, 18 Rose Street, New York.

Will be found invaluable for Children, Infants and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. Its mild medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

W. S. WYSE, DEAR SIR:—I was a sufferer from kidney disease for several years, and made every effort to obtain relief, but failed in every effort until I procured a bottle of Wyse's New Remedy. I took half a bottle, which to my great relief relieved me of all the troublesome symptoms very short space of time.

I am so much improved that I consider myself out of all danger, if not entirely cured of the disease.

JAMES S. BARKER.

329 West 23d Street, New York.

TESTIMONIALS.

From AMOS J. CUMMINGS, Member Congress; Ex-Senator ALBERT G. GETT; Ex-Police Commissioner DEAN C. WHEELER, and others. Sent by mail.

WYSE'S

NEW REMEDY

FOR

DISEASES OF THE KIDNEYS AND BLADDER.

WYSE'S NEW REMEDY

Has become celebrated for the successful treatment and cure of the following cases:

Diabetes, Bright's Disease, Brickbat, Mucous Inflammation of the Kidneys and Bladder, Pain in the Back, Weak Kidneys, retention of Urine, Gleet, Gravel and all cases affecting the Urinary Organs.

WYSE NEW REMEDY COMPANY

PROPRIETORS,

157 W. 23d St., New York

For sale by all druggists. Sent by express receipt of One Dollar. Mention this paper.

8 Per Cent. Dividends.

Free

NATIONAL BANK STOCK.

UNION INVESTMENT
CO.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

OFFERS $500,000 OF THE INCREASE OF

OF A

NATIONAL BANK

IN PORTLAND, OREGON

$450,000 subscribed by the Officers, Directors, Business Men of Portland. $50,000 taken in Kansas City, Mo. Send for circulars with full particulars.

UNION INVESTMENT

References: American National Bank, Kansas City, Mo. Kansas City Savings Bank and Safe Deposit Co.

20 YEARS SUCCESS

Without loss to investors a good plan for buying the Debenture Bonds of the Mortgage Loans of the AMERICAN INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION, $2,000,000.00. Highest rate of interest with the choicest security. Pamphlet address:

E. S. ORMSBY, A. L. ORMSBY, President, H. E. SIMMONS, 150 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. C.

IDLE

Send for circulars to Wm. H. FARMER, General Agent of the WINNER INVESTMENT CO., 60 STATE STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

MONY

SAFE INVESTMENT
FARRAND & VOTE
ORGANS
DETROIT, MICH. U.S.A.

MEN WANTED

Great inducements. Outfit free. Address: AUSTIN SHAW, Nurseryman, Brooklyn, N.Y.

A LADY WANTED in every town. WOMAN'S HAND. Just issued. Quick Sales. Home Circ'lrs Free. E. B. TREAT, Publisher.

DEAFNESS & HEAD NOISES Treated by the INVISIBLE TUBES. CUSHIONS. Whispers heard. Fortable. Successful where all Remedies fail. Sold only, 858 Broadway, New York. Write for book of prices.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

XIII., No. 31. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

MISSIONARY WORK IN INDIA: PORTRAIT OF BISHOP J. M. THOBURN OF CALCUTTA.
 BLOODY MONSTER. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
 DEEPER THAN GOLD. A Story of the S. S. Text.
 BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Million-Destitute Widow—A Crusade Against Green
 es, Etc.
 RICH MAN AND LAZARUS. S. S. Lesson by
 M. Baxter.
 FIRE OF THE TRADITIONAL HOUSE OF RICH MAN. (From a Photograph.)

DAVID'S LONGING. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H.
 Spurgeon.
 THE IDENTITY OF ANTICHRIST. By James Smith.
 MR. STANLEY'S VISIT TO MR. ALEX. MACKAY.
 PORTRAIT OF EX-SENATOR PALMER, President of the World's Fair Commission.
 GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: The Sacred College, Etc.
 A Mysterious Present—A Child's Bequest—A Baker's Gift—A Strange Coincidence—A Remarkable Pre-sentiment—A Pointed Rebuke, Etc.
 WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev.
 Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)

REV. J. M. THOBURN, D. D., M. E. MISSIONARY BISHOP FOR INDIA.

The Idol Juggernaut—3 Bethany Farm—4. Voluntary Torture by Swing—5. Group of Native Preachers—6. Rev. A. W. Prautch, the Colporteur.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON. A BLOODY MONSTER.

"It is my son's coat; an evil beast hath devoured him." Gen. 37: 33.

Jacob Deceived—Parents Who May Say it Truthfully—What Drunkenness Does in Society—The Sabbath Sacrificed—The Strain on Righteous Indignation—A House in Two Stages—Two Scenes in a Man's Life—The Prey of the Scythe—Merchants, Physicians and Clergymen Mown Down—How to Fight the Evil—Begin in the Home—Exhibit the Helots—At the Polls—By Organized Societies—By the Pledge—By Asylums—By Example—An Appeal to the Erring—The Doom of the Tempter.

JOSEPH'S brethren dipped their brother's coat in goat's blood, and then brought the dabbled garment to their father, cheating him with the idea that a ferocious animal had slain him, and thus hiding their infamous behavior. But there is no deception about that which we hold up to your observation to-day. A monster such as never ranged African thicket or Hindostan jungle hath tracked this land, and with bloody maw hath strewn the continent with the mangled carcasses of whole generations; and there are tens of thousands of fathers and mothers who could hold up the garment of their slain boy, truthfully exclaiming, "It is my son's coat; an evil beast hath devoured him." There has, in all ages and climes, been a tendency to the improper use of stimulants. Noah, as if disgusted with the prevalence of water in his time, took to strong drink. By this vice, Alexander the Conqueror was conquered. The Romans at their feasts fell off their seats with intoxication. Four hundred millions of our race are opium-eaters. India, Turkey, and China have groaned with the desolation; and by it have been quenched such lights as Halley and De Quincey. One hundred millions are the victims of the betelnut, which has specially blasted the East Indies. Three hundred millions chew hashish, and Persia, Brazil, and Africa suffer the delirium. The Tartars employ murowa; the Mexicans, the agave; the people at Guarapo, an intoxicating quality taken from sugar-cane; while a great multitude, that no man can number, are the disciples of alcohol. To it they bow. Under it they are trampled. In its trenches they fall. On its ghastly holocaust they burn. Could the muster roll of this great army be called, and they could come up from the dead, what eye could endure the reeking, festering putrefaction? What heart could endure

The Groan of Agony?

Drunkenness: Does it not jingle the burglar's key? Does it not whet the assassin's knife? Does it not cock the highwayman's pistol? Does it not wave the incendiary's torch? Has it not sent the physician reeling into the sick-room; and the minister with his tongue thick into the pulpit? Did not an exquisite poet, from the very top of his fame, fall a gibbering sot, into the gutter, on his way to be married to one of the fairest daughters of New England, and at the very hour the bride was decking herself for the altar; and did he not die of delirium tremens, almost unattended, in a hospital? Tamerlane asked for one hundred and sixty thousand skulls with which to build a pyramid to his own honor. He got the skulls, and built the pyramid. But if the bones of all those who have fallen as a prey to dissipation could be piled up, it would make a vaster pyramid.

Who will gird himself for the journey, and try with me to scale this mountain of the dead—going up miles high on human carcasses to find still other peaks far above, mountain above mountain white with the bleached bones of drunkards?

The Sabbath has been sacrificed to the rum traffic. To many of our people, the best day of the week is the worst. Bakers must keep their shops closed on the Sabbath. It is dangerous to have loaves of bread going out on Sunday. The shoe-store is closed: severe penalty will attack the man who sells boots on the Sabbath. But down with the window-shutters of the grog-shops! Our laws shall confer particular honor upon the rum-traffickers. All other trades must stand aside for these. Let our citizens who have disgraced themselves by trading in clothing, and hosiery, and hardware, and lumber, and coal, take off their hats to the rum-seller, elected to particular honor. It is unsafe for any other class of men to be allowed License for Sunday Work.

But swing out your signs, and open your doors, O ye traffickers in the peace of families, and in the souls of immortal men! Let the corks fly, and the beer foam, and the rum go tearing down the half-consumed throat of the inebriate. God does not see! Does He? Judgment will never come! Will it?

I do not know but that God is determined to let drunkenness triumph, and the husbands and sons of thousands of our best families be destroyed by this vice, in order that our people, amazed and indignant, may rise up and demand the extermination of this municipal crime. There is a way of driving down the hoops of a barrel so tight that they break. We have, in this country, at various times tried to regulate this evil by a tax on whiskey. You might as well try to regulate the Asiatic cholera or the small-pox by taxation. The men who distil liquors are, for the most part, unscrupulous, and the higher the tax, the more inducement to illicit distillation.

Oh! the folly of trying to restrain an evil by government tariff! If every gallon of whiskey made—if every flask of wine produced, should be taxed a thousand dollars, it would not be enough to pay for the tears it has wrung from the eyes of widows and orphans, nor for the blood it has dashed on the Christian Church, nor for the catastrophe of the millions it has destroyed for ever.

Two Homes.

I sketch two houses in one street. The first is bright as home can be. The father comes at nightfall, and the children run out to meet him. Luxuriant evening meal. Gratulation, and sympathy, and laughter. Music in the parlor. Fine pictures on the wall. Costly books on the stand. Well-clad household. Plenty of everything to make home happy.

House the second: Piano sold yesterday by the sheriff. Wife's furs at pawnbroker's shop. Clock gone. Daughter's jewelry sold to get flour. Carpets gone off the floor. Daughters in faded and patched dresses. Wife sewing for the stores. Little child with an ugly wound on her face, struck in an angry blow. Deep shadow of wretchedness falling in every room. Door-bell rings. Little children hide. Daughters turn pale. Wife holds her breath. Blundering step in the hall. Door opens. Fiend, brandishing his fist, cries, "Out! out! What are you doing here?"

Did I call this house the second? No; it is the same house. Rum transformed it. Rum embruted the man. Rum sold the shawl. Rum tore up the carpets. Rum shook his fist. Rum desolated the hearth. Rum changed that Paradise Into a Hell!

I sketch two men that you know very well. The first graduated from one of our literary institutions. His father, mother, brothers and sisters were present to see him graduate. They heard the applauding thunders that greeted his speech. They saw the bouquets tossed to his feet. They saw the degree conferred and the diploma given. He never looked so well. Everybody said, "What a noble brow! What a fine eye! What graceful manners! What brilliant prospects!" All the world opens before him, and cries, "Hurrah! hurrah!"

Man the second: Lies in the station-house. The doctor has just been sent for to bind up the gashes received in a fight. His hair is matted, and makes him look like a wild beast. His lip is bloody and cut. Who is this battered and bruised wretch that was picked up by the police, and carried in drunk, and foul and bleeding? Did I call him man the second? He is man the first! Rum transformed him. Rum destroyed his prospects. Rum disappointed parental expectation. Rum withered those garlands of commencement day. Rum cut his lip, Rum dashed out his manhood. Rum accursed RUM!

This foul thing gives one swing to its scythe, and our best merchants fall; their store are sold, and they sink into dishonored graves. Again it swings its scythe, and some of our best physicians fall into sufferings that their wisest prescriptions cannot cure. Again it swings its scythe, and ministers of the Gospel fall from the heights of Zion, with long resounding crash of ruin and shame. Some of your own households have already been shaken. Perhaps you can hardly admit it; but where was your son last night? Where was he Friday night? Where was he Thursday night? Wednesday night? Tuesday night? Monday night? Nay, have not some of you felt the power of this habit? You think that you could stop? Are you sure you could? Go on a little further, and I am sure you cannot. Think, if some of you should try to break away, you would find a chain on the right wrist, and one on the left; one on the right foot, and another on the left. This serpent does not begin to hurt until it has wound round and round. Then it begins to tighten, and strangle, and crush, until the bones crack, and the blood trickles, and the eyes start from their sockets, and the mangled wretch cries, "O God! O God! help! help!" But it is too late; and not even the fires of woe can melt the chain when once it is fully fastened.

In Your Own Bodies

I have shown you the evil beast. The question is, Who will hunt him down, and how shall we shoot him? I answer, First, by getting our children right on this subject. Let them grow up with an utter aversion to strong drink. Take care how you administer it even as medicine. If you find that they have a natural love for it, as some have, put in a glass of it some horrid stuff, and make it utterly nauseous. Teach them, as faithfully as you do the Bible, that rum is a fiend. Take them to the almshouse, and show them the wreck and ruin it works. Warn them into the homes that have been scourged by it. If a drunkard hath fallen in a ditch, take them right up his face, bruised, savage, and swollen, and say, "Look, my son. Rum did that!" Looking out of your window at some one who, intoxicated to madness, goes through the street, brandishing his fist, blaspheming God, a howling, delirious, shouting, reeling, raving, and foaming maniac, say to your son, "Look; that man was once a child like you." As you go by the grog-shop, let them know that that is the place where men are slain, and their wives made paupers, and their children slaves. Hold out to your children all warnings, all rewards, all counsel lest in after-days they break your heart at a curse your gray hairs. A man laughed at his father for his scrupulous temperance principles, and said: "I am more liberal than you. I always give my children the sugar in the glass after we have been taking a drink." Three of his sons have died drunkards, and the fourth is imbecile through intemperate habits.

Where They Can See

Again: We will battle this evil by voting of for sober men. How many men are there who can rise above the feelings of partisanship, and demand that our officials shall be sober men?

I maintain that the question of sobriety is higher than the question of availability; and that, however eminent a man's services may be if he have habits of intoxication, he is unfit for any office in the gift of a Christian people. Our laws will be no better than the men who make them. Spend a few days at Harrisburg, or Albany, or Washington, and you will find out upon these subjects, it is impossible to get rigorous enactments.

Again: We will war upon this evil by organized societies. The friends of the rum traffic have banded together; annually issue their circulars; raise fabulous sums of money to advance their interests; and by grips, pass-words, signs, and stratagems, set at defiance public morals. Let us confront them with organ-ns just as secret, and, if need be, with grips, pass-words, and signs, maintain our position. There is no need that our philanthropic societies tell all their plans. I am in favor of lawful strategy in the carrying on of this conflict. I wish to God we could lay under the one-casks a train which, once ignited, would make the earth with the explosion of this monstrous iniquity!

Again: We will try

The Power of the Pledge,

ere are thousands of men who have been seduced by putting their names to such a document. I know it is laughed at; but there are some men who, having once promised a thing, stick to it. "Some have broken the pledge." Yes; they were liars. But all men are not liars. I do not say that it is the duty of all persons to make such a signature; but I do say that it would be the salvation of many of you. The glorious work of Theobald Mathew can never be estimated. At his hand four millions of people took the pledge, and multitudes in Ireland, England, Scotland, and America, have kept it till this day. The pledge signed to thousands has been the proclamation of emancipation.

Again: We expect great things from inebriate deliriums. They have already done a glorious work. I think that we are coming at last to treat inebriation as it ought to be treated, namely, as an awful disease, self-inflicted, to be sure, but nevertheless a disease. Once fastened upon a man, sermons won't cure him; temperance lectures will not eradicate it; religious tracts will not remove it; the Gospel of Christ will not arrest it. Once under the power of this awful thirst, the man is bound to go on; and, if the foaming glass were on the other side of perdition, he would wade get it. A young man in prison had such a strong thirst for intoxicating liquors that he cut his hand at the wrist, called for a bowl of blood in order to stop the bleeding, thrust his hand into the bowl, and then drank the contents.

Through the Fires of Hell

Stand not, when the thirst is on him, between man and his cups. Clear the track for him. Away with the children; he would tread their heads out. Away with the wife; he would dash her to death. Away with the cross; he would trample it down. Away with the Bible; he would burn it up for the winds. Away with heaven; he considers it worthless as a straw. "Give me the drink! Give it to me! Though the sands of blood pass up the bowl, and the soul tumbles over the pit—the drink! give it to me! Though it be pale with tears; though the froth of everlasting anguish float on the foam—give it to me! I drink to my wife's woe, to my children's rags; to my eternal banishment from earth, and hope, and heaven! Give it to me! Give me the drink!"

Again: We will contend against these evils by trying to persuade society to the banishment of alcoholic beverages. You who move in elegant and refined associations; you who drink the best liquors; you who never drink until you lose your balance, look each other in the face on this subject. You have, under God, in your power the redemption of this land from drunkenness. Empty your cellars and wine-closets of the beverage, and then come out and give us your aid, your vote, your prayers, your sympathies. That, and I will promise three things: First, that you will find unspeakable happiness in doing your duty. Secondly, you will probably save somebody—perhaps your own child. Thirdly, you will not, in your last hour, have a regret that you made the sacrifice, if sacrifice it be.

The Respectable Classes

As long as you make drinking respectable, drinking customs will prevail, and the plow of death, drawn by terrible disasters, will be turning up this whole continent, from end to end, with the long, deep, awful furrow of drunkards' graves.

Oh! how this rum fiend would like to go and hang up a skeleton in your beautiful house, so that, when you opened the front door to go in, you would see it in the hall; and, when you sat at your table you would see it hanging from the wall; and, when you opened your bedroom, you would find it stretched upon your pillow; and, waking at night, you would feel its cold hand passing over your face and pinching at your heart.

Illustrious Victims.

There is no home so beautiful but it may be devastated by the awful curse. It throws its jargon into the sweetest harmony. What was it that silenced Sheridan, the English orator, and shattered the golden sceptre with which he swayed parliaments and courts? What foul sprite turned the sweet rhythm of Robert Burns into a tuneless babble? What brought down the majestic form of one who awed the American Senate with his eloquence, and after a while carried him home dead drunk? What was it that swamped the noble spirit of one of the heroes of the last war, until, in a drunken fit, he reeled from the deck of a Western steamer, and was drowned? There was one whose voice we all loved to hear. He was one of the most classic orators of the century. People wondered why a man of so pure a heart and so excellent a life should have such a sad countenance always. They knew not that his wife was a sot.

I call upon those who are guilty of these indulgences to quit the path of death. Oh! what a change it would make in your home. Do you see how everything there is being desolated? Would you not like to bring back joy to your wife's heart, and have your children come out to meet you with as much confidence as once they showed? Would you not like to rekindle the home-lights that long ago were extinguished? It is not too late to change. It may not entirely obliterate from your soul the memory of wasted years and a ruined reputation, nor smooth out from your anxious brow the wrinkles which trouble has plowed. It may not call back unkind words uttered, or rough deeds done; for perhaps in those awful moments you struck her! It may not take from your memory the bitter thoughts connected with some little grave. But it is not too late to save yourself, and secure for God and your family the remainder of your fast-going life.

But perhaps you have

Not Utterly Gone Astray.

I may address one who may not have quite made up his mind. Let your better nature speak out. You take one side or the other in the war against drunkenness. Have you the courage to put your foot downright, and say to your companions and friends, "I will never drink intoxicating liquor in all my life; nor will I countenance the habit in others"? Have nothing to do with strong drink. It has turned the earth into a place of skulls, and has stood opening the gate to a lost world to let in its victims, until now the door swings no more upon its hinges, but, day and night, stands wide open to let in the agonized procession of doomed men.

Do I address one whose regular work in life is to administer to this appetite? For God's sake, get out of that business! If a woe be pronounced upon the man who gives his neighbor drink, how many woes must be hanging over the man who does this every day and every hour of the day!

Do not think that because human government may license you that therefore God licenses you. I am surprised to hear you men say that they respect the "original package" decision, by which the Supreme Court of the United States allows rum to be taken into States like Kansas, which have decided against the sale of intoxicants. I have no respect for a wrong decision. I care not who makes it. The three judges of the Supreme Court who gave minority report against that decision were right, and the Chief Justice was wrong. The right of a State to defend itself against the rum traffic will yet be demonstrated, the Supreme Court notwithstanding. Higher than the Judicial Bench at Washington is the Throne of the Lord God Almighty. No enactment national, State, or municipal can give you the right to carry on a business whose effect is destruction.

God knows better than you do yourself the number of drinks you have poured out. You keep a list; but a more accurate list has been kept than yours. You may call it Burgundy, Bourbon, Cognac, Heidsieck, Sour mash or beer. God calls it strong drink. Whether you sell it in low oyster-cellar or behind the polished counter of a first-class hotel, the divine curse is upon you. I tell you plainly that you will meet your customers one day when there will be no counter between you. When your work is done on earth, and you enter the reward of your business, all the souls of the men whom you have destroyed will crowd around you, and pour their bitterness into your cup. They will show you their wounds, and say, "You made them"; and point to their unquenchable thirst, and say, "You kindled it"; and rattle their chain, and say, "You forged it." Then their united groans will smite your ear; and with the hands out of which you once picked the sixpences and the dimes, they will push you off the verge of great precipices; while rolling up from beneath, and breaking among the crags of death, will thunder, "Woe to him that giveth his neighbor drink!"

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Baptism of Jesus.*

THINK of the majesty of this John [the Baptist]. Remember how he bore himself in the presence of the Pharisees and Sadducees; and how he faced Herod, telling him plainly, at the risk of his life, as it afterward proved, "It is not lawful for thee to wed thy brother's wife." Remember that all Judæa and Jerusalem and Galilee had been bowing down in his presence; and now, when an obscure, nameless one of Nazareth comes to him, only as yet distinguished from others by the holiness of His life and the purity of His soul, John would not have Him bow in his presence, but would himself bend before Him. "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" Oh, for more of that grand combination of lofty courage and lowly reverence! Verily, "among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist."

The Sacred College.

It would appear from the second and third gospels that, immediately before the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount, the twelve were chosen from the whole number of the disciples to be constantly with Jesus as witnesses of His works and learners of His doctrine. By this time they had been so far instructed and trained by their companionship with Him that they could be safely intrusted with a mission by themselves; accordingly, He for the first time gives them power to do deeds of mercy of the same sort as those which He himself had been doing, as signs of the kingdom of heaven. The number twelve was, no doubt, significant, as suggestive of the twelve tribes of Israel; but there was plainly no attempt to have the tribes represented separately. It would seem as if all were Galileans except one, and that one was Judas Iscariot (that is, the man of Kerioth, supposed to be a town of Judæa). The reason of this almost exclusive choice of Galileans is in all probability to be found in the fact that there were none other available. There had been those in the course of His Judæan ministry, who had, after a fashion, believed on him; but there was not one of them whom He could trust with such work as this (John 2: 23-25). Not only was the Apostolate Galilean—it was plebeian, and that without a single exception. It seems to include not a single person of recognized rank or position. Again we believe this is to be accounted for by the simple fact that there were none of these available.

*From the Expositor's Bible: The Gospel of Matthew. By John Monro Gibson, M.A., D.D. This well-known author has brought to bear on the first gospel his profound learning, and in a spirit of reverence has opened up its rich treasures and shed light on its references as well as its teachings. Pp. 450. Price, $1.50. Published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 714 Broadway, New York.

MISSION WORK IN INDIA.

(See Illustrations on first page.)

A Vast Population Still in Heathen Darkness—Idol Worship—Over 300,000,000 Gods—A Babel of Beliefs—Sacrifices to Juggernaut—Torture by the Swing—American Missionary Work—Bishop Thoburn's Effort to Establish a Vigorous Press—The Bethany Farm.

IN the whole world, there is no field that affords a wider scope for missionary enterprise than India. With its population of very nearly 300,000,000 souls, there are still less than 2,000,000 Christians, the vast bulk of the people being Hindus, Mussulmans, Buddhists and aborigines. The last, while they are idol-worshippers, do not belong to any of the classifications named. It would almost seem as though India had been set apart by God in His wisdom to be wrested from darkness by His chosen servants, as a special heritage of the present generation; for although Christianity has long been known there, it is only within the last half century that any organized and systematic effort has been made to bring the benighted millions into the light of the Gospel.

If you can imagine a country about one-third the size yet with nearly four times the population of our own land, and in which one person in every two hundred is a Christian, the others being worshippers of idols of wood and stone—hideous things set up in groves and amid the ruins of heathen temples; subject to the most slavish superstitions and ruled by priests whose whole duty is to keep them steadfast in their ignorant devotion to their heathen gods; where frightful sacrifices of human life are still made in some remote parts to appease these gods, and where the most abject poverty is the universal lot of the common people, you may form some idea of the condition of India to-day. It is true that, in some parts where mission work has been perseveringly followed up, these conditions have been somewhat improved; but, throughout a large part of the Empire, idol-worship, heathen rites, and the most revolting practices, upheld by the native priests, still prevail.

No other nation in the world shows such a confusing variety in its religious beliefs as India. The so-called sacred books of the priests, the Upanishads, are a system of blending many sublime truths with a mass of idolatrous absurdities and fables. There are hundreds of thousands of these priests in India, and for generations, they have drawn the people on with even greater zest in their idolatry, as the advance guards of the army of Christianity appeared on their shores. It is estimated that they have set up in all not less than 330,000,000 inferior gods for the Hindus to worship, besides the array of more important deities, like Vishnu, Siva and Brahma, the last the greatest of all to the benighted Indian mind. There is a god of the sky; one of the fire, Agni; Yama is the god of hell; Soma of the moon; Purana of the wind; Surya of the sun; Varuna of the water; Kuvera of riches; Kamas of love; and there are eight Lokapalas, or, "guardians of the world," besides. In all, if we take the estimated population into our reckoning, there is just about one God for every human being living in India at this moment.

Mysteries and Mythologies,

In this vast pantheon are many deities intended, as most heathen gods are, to terrorize and affright the simple-minded natives. The Rashas are the spirit enemies of mankind; the Daiyas are the demons of destruction and Kali is the goddess of evil and the female partner of Siva one of the principal gods. The city of Calcutta, now a centre of Christian endeavor and the focus of evangelism in India, was originally named after this mythical deity and was the seat of a great priesthood. Besides, not satisfied with the worship of imaginary beings under the name of gods, the priests have set up as objects of religious adoration, snakes, bulls, birds, and even trees. The clay image of the cobra, a poisonous serpent, is in almost every temple. It is not surprising that, misled as they have been for centuries, the poor Hindus should be glad to exchange such a babel of beliefs for the simple faith as it is found in Jesus.

Our illustrations to-day show some interesting facts in connection with

Heathen Practices

as they now exist in the "Land of the Sun," as India is called by travellers, and furnish some faint idea of the darkness of that vast Empire, even at the present day. The idol seen in the picture, is one common to many localities in India. Like the "gree-gree," or family deity of the savage African, it is a rudely hewn block of wood, sometimes stone, made still more hideous by being painted and daubed, with great beads for eyes, and a general aspect that would inspire anything but respect in the heart of any save the most ignorant and superstitious. Yet this deformed and senseless thing is held in the highest veneration in thousands of Indian homes to-day. Its counterpart is to be found in the numerous temples there, set up by the fanatical priests, while the multitudes grovel at its feet of wood or clay. Verily:

"The heathen in his blindness, Bows down to wood and stone."

It is this form of idol that is set on the pinnacle of the car of Juggernaut, whose annual procession, drawn by elephants and pulled by ropes in the hands of long lines of devotees, is marked by the blood of innocent victims, who esteem themselves blessed if they perish beneath the car of the idol. The priests, too, applaud such sacrifices. Christian missionaries have done much to put an end to these horrors; but so vast is the country and so small the band of God's faithful workers by comparison, that the slaughter still goes on in remote parts where idol-worship has its strongholds.

The "swing," which is also shown in our illustrations is another form of Religious Fanaticism;

a mode of self-torture, inflicted by devotees at the instigation of the native priests. The victim permits himself to be suspended by a hook passed through the muscles of his back, and he is then drawn up at the end of a rope fastened to a pole, which moves on a pivot, the impulse being given by the crowds of natives who are always eager to witness such spectacles. Sometimes as many as four devotees may be seen swinging at once. The pain is excruciating, and not until they are unconscious from weakness and loss of blood, is the motion relaxed and the unfortunate released. Sometimes he pays the penalty of his devotion with his life. There are many other forms of self-torture inculcated by the heathen religions of India, such as laceration with knives, maintaining a fixed attitude for days at a time; putting out the eyes, and even maiming the limbs. Until a very recent period, it was a common custom among Indian mothers of the poorer class to sacrifice their female children to Ganga, the goddess of the river Ganges, and thousands of little ones perished annually from this cause. This revolting cruelty, however, the missionaries succeeded in abating, and now it is practised secretly, if at all. But the

Dark and Terrible Places

of the Indian Empire are gradually being illuminated by the sunshine of God's own Gospel, and the name of Christ is being spread from the Ganges to the straits of the South. Under God's blessing America has done much toward redeeming India from its idols. Our Societies have established many churches and missions, instructed a large number of native missionaries and teachers, and spread the glad tidings of salvation from the Himalayas to the sea. Schools have been opened and the very heart of the Empire has been reached with the message of God's love. It is a land in which Americans have a special interest, and none more than American Sunday-school children; for it is among the young people of India that the great work of Christianization must make the best progress. All the Christian nations have done noble work there during the last half century, but none more energetically or successfully than the American missionaries, many of whom have laid down their lives in the cause, falling on the field of duty under the deadly ailments that afflict the white race in that far-off country. But this does not deter other brave spirits from dedicating their lives to mission work in the same field.

One of the noble hearts whose splendid work has added lustre to the cause of Christianity there, under God's blessing, is the Rev. James M. Thoburn, Missionary Bishop for India, who is now on a visit to this country after thirty years' labor in the vineyard of Hindostan. Born at St. Clairsville, O., in 1836, he began missionary work at 23 years of age and has passed through many wonderful experiences; yet he has never lost the first inspiration of God's call to that special field of duty, and the results have been such as to increase year by year, his faith and hope in the ultimate reclamation of that land from darkness to Christianity. He has at different times labored in the mountains among the wandering tribes, in the plains among the Tarroos, at town and village fairs, and even at the very doors of the heathen temples, and in sight of their priests, has he boldly delivered to interested hearers. The story of his experience would fill a volume; but it is more or less the experience of every true worker who takes up the burden of carrying the Gospel to the heathen. It is a story of self-sacrifice, of absolute devotion; of poverty and privation, and many times of dire peril; but never of despair. God's good providence seems to have a special eye over His sons and daughters who carry His standard into the fastnesses of idolatry and sin.

The Message of Salvation

The object of Bishop Thoburn's present visit is to interest Americans in the extension of facilities for the mission press in India, which will involve an expenditure of about $15,000. He believes, speaking from almost a lifetime of experience, that Christian literature is destined in the future to be the greatest aid to the mission work there, and hence his efforts for the establishment of a vigorous missionary press. To the CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Bishop a few days ago made a very interesting statement.

"For more than twenty years," he said, "I have taken a deep interest in missionary printing. I called attention in various journals to the fact that the great missionary societies are using the press less and less, and indeed seem disposed to give it up.

"I am now trying to establish a vigorous missionary press. The Bengali is spoken by 40,000,000 people, the Hindustani by nearly 100,000,000. We are now publishing in both languages. The year before I left India, I issued a weekly sermonette, in three languages: Hindi, Bengali and English, with a weekly circulation of about 50,000. The same is now being printed in two languages in Western India as well. This only shows what could be done if we had capital. There are 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 people there who can read and the demand for Christian literature is boundless. In no other way can the Gospel be given to these people for centuries to come. If we had the means, we could easily print and distribute half a million messages of truth in all parts of the Indian Empire every week. The London and other Tract Societies have kindly promised to help us. I may add that the press at Lucknow is self supporting."

The Bethany Farm

which is shown in the illustration, is one of the many institutions established under the fostering care of Bishop Thoburn, and is connected with the Mahratta mission. It is an orphanage where children are cared for at a cost to the mission of $2 per month. This includes food, clothing and schooling. The sexes are kept distinct. The food is rice and cakes made from millet, and the little wards receive two meals a day. The food is that which they will in all probability be accustomed to in after life. They eat meat once a year. When the children grow

o, they are settled upon a separate tract of land, and some who have been several years at a mission farm, and who have now left, are quite prosperous and married. The method of settling them is to place all on a farm which is sold in common, each having his or her own house, however, and all assisting in improving and cultivating the land. Bethany Farm is near Solar.

The group of native preachers shows some highly intelligent faces. Still another picture that of the Rev. A. W. Prautch, a German, and the most successful distributor of Gospel literature in India. The Scripture and tracts are sold at a nominal price, the smaller tracts and leaflets being distributed free. With his two wagons and eight assistants, he regularly distributes of 1500 tracts weekly and sometimes any more. Mr. Prautch was converted under the ministrations of Mr. Moody in Chicago several years ago, and has been in India since 1884.

BETTER THAN GOLD.

Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 10: "How Hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God." Mark 10: 24.

THERE was a hush among the workmen at the great machine shops of a wellknown firm of manufacturers. It was easily seen that something unusual had happened.

"Maitland is dead!" whispered one grizzled Miller to another. "Poor fellow: His luck didn't last long."

"No; better for him if he had remained one of us. It all comes of making a god of money."

"We are simply stewards," remarked old Tom Perry, the foreman. "The weight of sudden wealth is one that very few men can bear, no matter whether they are educated or just ordinary folks like ourselves. But I saw the change coming over poor Dick Maitland these many years." As it was the dinner hour, the men grouped around the old foreman, listening.

"Yes," said he; "I remember the day Dick Maitland came into the shops. A mere bit of a boy he was then—something like fourteen; but he was sharp and ambitious. He made himself more valuable every year, and soon there wasn't a corner in the big factory he didn't know better than I did. He grew to be familiar with every detail of the business, and was promoted to a position of trust and responsibility before he was twenty-six.

"None of us was surprised to be told, when old Mr. Johnson died, that Dick was to be taken into the firm as junior partner. He had been the head of a department for several years at that time, and his judgment was worth a great deal to the firm. We all thought he had deserved the promotion. Mr. Buckland, the principal, thought the world of him; but he discovered that some of Dick's friends had known long before: that he was in a terrible hurry to be rich. Now, don't misunderstand me. Dick was a good and honest a man, as men go, as ever I stepped; but money was his god. He worshipped it and dreamed of it; not for the sake of hoarding it, but for the influence and position it would bring him. He used to tell me, over and over again in the old days, that he would only be satisfied with a million."

"He got it, didn't he?" asked one of the men. "Ay, poor lad. He did. He had a hand in setting up the new patents we lately put in the other shop, and which such a lot of money was made on. He would sit and pore over sketches and plans by the hour, studying up how to make money out of his schemes; for it wasn't a question with him whether a thing was useful, but whether it would pay. I could see, too, that he was seldom at church, and when he did come, he sat like a man preoccupied, thinking, doubtless, of his contracts and his profits. If thoughts of God or Christ or salvation entered his head, he used to put them off with the reflection: 'I'll be rich enough by-and-by, and then I'll do much for the church.' I know this, for I taxed him with his declining interest once and that was his answer.

"Well, his dream became a reality. He had his idol. I once read a story about a king of some Eastern country who wished that whatever he touched might turn to gold. His desire was granted, and he was immediately miserable. His food, his clothing, the water he tried to drink, the chair he sat in, and even his daughter, when he kissed her, changed to dead, yellow, shining metal, as useless as that brass over there would be under like circumstances. Like the king's riches, Maitland's wealth became, not a blessing, but a curse to him. In the wild intoxication of possession everything else was forgotten, and finally the brain and nerves that had been strained and racked to secure it gave way. He never was a drinking man, mind you. We all know that he was a hard worker. Now, to my way of thinking, there's just as much dissipation in the wild hunt for wealth as there is in anything else in this world, almost. Industry and integrity will always bring their share of success in business, but a man's on the wrong track when he allows money to shut out his view of Christ, the Church and humanity. He may die worth a million; but he'll be poorer than the poorest mechanic in this shop, who has a small wage, an abiding trust in God and a happy home."

"That's so," murmured the men, in assent.

"But don't let us be hard on his memory now he's gone, poor chap," added the foreman as the men started up at the sound of the bell. "We're none of us too good. Most men find riches a big load to carry, whether it's in buildings or bonds or hard cash in the bank; and to use it rightly and for the glory of Him who says, 'The silver is mine and the gold is mine,' requires God's grace as well as business ability such as few possess. So you see, men, the worker isn't always the worst off after all. If he has less to handle, he has less to account for, and there is smaller chance of his becoming an unfaithful steward and piling up the money-bags as stumbling-blocks between himself and heaven. And now let's get back to work again."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Suggestion to Sea Captains is made in a scientific journal. It states that a captain who is apprehensive of the approach of an iceberg may have actual proof by the use of a siren apparatus for projecting sound. Experiments were made at sea recently with a musket, to which an ordinary speaking trumpet was attached. A blank cartridge was fired in the direction of vessels at a distance and a distinct echo was produced. In some cases the vessel was a mile away, but the trumpet made the echo plainly heard. A steam whistle, it argues, would be still more effective. The numerous collisions this season of vessels with icebergs, and the many narrow escapes there have been, render the suggestion timely. The danger is so appalling, and in the darkness or fog the captain is so helpless, that any means of getting warning, even though it be only from an echo, will be valuable. Unhappily in cases of danger of spiritual shipwreck it takes a great deal more than an echo to turn the sinner away from destruction. The warnings of God's Word, the faithful preaching of the Gospel, and the loving appeals of friends, all combined, often fail to save one who is under the dominion of sin (Prov. 1: 25-29.)

A Host's Disappointment had an Amusing explanation as related by himself. A gentleman from Buffalo, N. Y., came to New York on business. He was well received by a large circle of acquaintances, and enjoyed their hospitality. He was in the city for some time, and desired to reciprocate the attentions which he had received, before he returned home. He arranged with the keeper of the hotel where he was staying, to give an elaborate dinner on the eve of his departure. On the evening of the day appointed, he made an elaborate toilet and awaited his guests, but none came. He waited half an hour, an hour, two hours, and not one put in an appearance. He was rather a choleric man, and this failure of his guests irritated him. He declared that they had made a plot to insult him, and he would never speak to one of them again. He was too much exasperated to partake of the dinner himself, but went in dudgeon to his bedroom to pack up, so as to depart that night. In collecting his belongings from the drawers, he found, to his amazement and chagrin, the whole bundle of letters of invitation which he had written, but had forgotten to mail. Deeply mortified as he was, he felt relieved to know that his friends had not conspired to insult him. It was the belief that they had done so, which had wounded him most keenly. That feeling all can understand, but comparatively few realize it when the invitation which God sends to them in His Word and by His servants reaches them and they "make light of it and go their way." (Matt. 22: 5.)

A Millionaire's Widow is Being Supported by a colored woman formerly in her service. Two weeks ago a colored woman of thrifty habits, and earning a good income in Norwalk, Conn., received a letter from her former mistress, who is living in a village on Long Island. The letter stated that the writer had sunk into abject poverty, and was then in urgent need of food and clothing. Thirty years ago her husband was reputed to be worth five million dollars. He was President of a bank, and lived in magnificent style. After the war, he came to New York and became a member of the Stock Exchange. He was very confident of his abilities and was somewhat reckless in his speculations. One loss followed another until his large fortune was completely gone. He sank into melancholy and died, leaving his wife destitute. Friends deserted her, her relatives were dead, and she was without a home. For many years she had heard at intervals from her colored servant, whom, as a girl, she had befriended and helped. In her old age and poverty she appealed to her for assistance. It was at once cheerfully rendered and the old lady has been assured that as long as she lives she will be provided for. The colored woman displays only what we call common gratitude, though it is not so common as we suppose. If Christians were as ready to recognize their obligations to Christ there would be less suffering in the world than there is. They cannot give directly to Him, but they could help the poor whom He appointed as His representatives. (Matt. 25: 40.)

A Terse and Candid Characterization of Two litigants was given by a judge in a Chicago Court in the course of a trial for fraudulent misrepresentation. The defendant was a man of genial manners, and most persuasive eloquence. He had induced a gentleman to advance to him a large sum of money on the security of some documents, purporting to be deeds of ownership of a mine in Nevada. Becoming suspicious after he had advanced the money, he resolved to go to Nevada, and examine the mines for himself. When he arrived there he found that the mine, which had been represented as worth a hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was practically worthless. He telegraphed to his lawyer the laconic message, "He is a fraud," and instructed him to commence suit for the recovery of the money advanced. The judge after hearing the case, endorsed the plaintiff's opinion of the defendant. He added, however, after hearing the plaintiff admit how easily he had been led to advance the money on the defendant's representation, and how he went out to investigate after advancing it, instead of before doing so, that the plaintiff might have properly extended his telegram by adding to the words, "He is a fraud" "I am a fool." There cannot be much doubt that the judge was right as to both litigants, but the folly was not confined to the plaintiff. Clever swindlers are never regarded as fools, especially when they are successful; but we have divine authority for believing that even successful sin is folly (Jer. 17: 11.)

Volume XII., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1889, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office: price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, 1887, and 1888 are also for sale. None are on hand prior to 1884.

THE IDENTITY OF ANTICHRIST.

By James Smith.*

The Beast Ruling Alone—Cannot Be the Romish Church—Arises Out of the Sea—His Power Based on Universal Suffrage—Is Personal—His Mark—His Persecution—A Clear Line of Demarkation—Not All Believers Destroyed—His Destruction.

HERE, in Revelation 13, we meet the blasphemous beast, arising up out of the sea in full development. In body, leads, and horns he is perfectly complete. He also appears here as free and independent of every foreign control. Moreover, in this picture he appears to be absolute—the lord of all. While the beast rules, he rules alone; all other rule must then give way. It might be well that every ruling power on earth should observe this. (See Rev. 13: 7.) This state of things cannot have belonged to the past. The beast never yet has received his ten horns wherewith to exterminate the woman, nor, as the beast with the seven heads, ten horns, and seven crowns, of verse first, has he ever received the universal in verse 7. The arising of the beast up out of the sea, his ascension out of the bottomless pit (11: 7), his re-appearance from his "was and is not" state (17: 8, 11), and the Satanic incarnation of the beast—as the great red dragon, etc. (12: 3), may perhaps be very closely allied to each other, if they be not one and the same dark event still looming in the future; at least all of them have their forty-two months—three and a half years, and these all dated from the very same point of time. (See 11: 2; 12: 14; 13: 5.) At his arising up out of the sea—his "was and is not" state—the beast would seem to have already got possession of his ten horns, the power of ten kings, to arise and destroy the Papacy. He has all his ten horns here when he arises. Although the dragon—Satan—gives the beast his power, seat, and great authority, still he seems to obtain his universal Roman of the people—"The waters which thou sawest are peoples," etc. (17: 15.) "I saw a beast rise up out of the sea." (13: 1.) It is as arising up out of the sea—by the suffrages of the people, then, that he resumes his power; and it would appear that he must have his horns before he so arises. The beast, we understand, is personal, a man, a king—the last, the greatest, and the worst of all the kings of Rome, or of all the world.

Dominion Promised to Him

Dominion by Suffrage

Verse 11 brings up the second beast out of the earth. Like his master, we remember, that he too is personal, a man, a monarch dethroned he may be, yet having blood royal in his veins; but with all this he is as villainous and deceitful as is his master. We also remember that he is the second beast—second in order as well as in position; that in his appearance he succeeds his master, as his master the first beast, succeeds the woman, (the papacy;) and that, therefore, the second beast, could neither represent Turkey, Mohammed, the Greek or the Romish Church, or anything else in the past. He has still to come. The Second beast is called "The false prophet" (19: 20); but this by no means requires that he be a Jew. Balaam was a prophet but he was not a Jew. The false prophet wrought miracles before the first beast, and deceived them that had the mark of the beast, and worshipped his image. From Matt. 24: 24; 1 Thess. 2: 9, 11; Rev. 13: 13-15; 19: 20, it would appear as if the three and a half years' universal rule of the beast are to be surcharged with a deluge of delusion, the most bewildering, deceitful, and ruinous that ever has been practiced upon our simple humanity at any former period.

The Mark of the Beast.

Concerning the mark, the number, and name of the beast—666—(Rev. 13: 18), the names Latinois and Romith have been supposed to be those meant. Apostates also with others have

*From his article in the July number of the Prophetic News. Edited by Rev. M. Baxter. Price, 6 cents. Annual subscription, 70 cents. May be had from Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York. Beside the article here quoted, this number contains articles on "The Great Pyramid," "The Delay in the Wars Predicted for 1890-92," "A Catechism on the Second Advent," "The Revealed Future of the Church and the World," "Prophetic Dates Ending in 1901," etc., etc.

been added, and all have been applied to the Church of Rome. But, even if Romith should mean "The Roman;" Latinois the Latin, or The Latin man; and "Apostate," The Apostate;" and if all the three did contain the number 666, is this enough to prove that they all belong to the Papacy?—that all of them inevitably apply to her? Is it not quite possible that they might apply equally well if not better to some other person? Might not Antichrist the Man of Sin. Rome's last, greatest, most wicked, most worthless, and apostate king prefer as good, if not better claims to the 666 than the Papacy can possibly do? We think he might. But more. The mark assuredly is his. It is called "the mark of the beast." (19, 20, &c.) The mark, therefore, is not of the Papacy—the woman at all; it is the mark of the beast.

As the heads and horns all belong to the beast, so the mark inalienably is his also. We might as well pluck the heads and horns from off the beast and plant them upon the woman, as transfer the mark from him to her. It is the mark of the beast. The woman—the Papacy—therefore, has got nothing whatever to do with it. Whatever the names Romith, Latinois, or Apostates, may signify, then, they apply to the beast but not to the woman; the number 666 belongs legitimately to him and to him alone.

The Persecution.

"And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, and in their foreheads." (V. 16.) At that time, then, there obviously will be a clear unmistakable distinction between those who serve the beast and those who serve him not. The line of demarkation will be so deep, broad, and visible that all at once will know to whom all else belong. All then will either have the mark of the beast or the seal of the living God. Hypocrites then will no longer seek a place within the Church of Christ. Times will then have become too hot for them. It had never entered into their calculations to suffer either loss, pain or shame for the name of Christ; and to secure their own comfort they will at once declare themselves for the other side. And for the Church's sake the sooner the better. It will then be seen who are on the Lord's side and who are not.

But shall all who bear the name of Jesus really be cut off during the rule of the beast? No! some remain alive, and are Translated When the Lord Comes.

Like Ahab and Jezebel, the aim of the beast will be to cut off all who will not bow down to this Baal; but some good Obadiah in his day may manage to hide their hundreds by fifty in a cave, and so a goodly number may be preserved, as Israel will be in "The rock." "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast." (Isa. 26: 20.)

As regards the rebuilding of Babylon, it is the power of the four monarchies alone, that the four metals of the image were given to represent. Short of rule, universal dominion, the capitals of all these monarchies, if rebuilt, even now could not meet this case. (Dan. 11.) All their splendor and beauty could be no more than the gaudy corpses of their former selves—the life, the spirit, the soul of the symbol—the power, would be wanting! so that here again we fail to find an eastern origin for the personal Antichrist.

As it was the sixth head of the beast—the "one is" the Empire of Rome that ruled in John's day; as that head, with all the other six were Roman; and as the ten horns and the beast himself, the eighth must have been Roman also; so, above all question, Rome is the city of the beast—the Antichrist. His origin, therefore, must be in the mystical Babylon—Rome.

In the final overthrow of the beast, in the breaking up of the great man-image of mere man-rule on earth, to make way for the universal Millennial rule of Christ, when He shall take to Him his power and shall reign, then all the four metals of the great image will be broken to pieces together, and be carried away as the chaff of the summer threshing-floor.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 10; Luke 16: 19-31; Golden Text Mark 10: 24.

The Parable Addressed to the Pharisees—The Characteristics of the Two Men—The Rich Man Probably a Professor—Had Traits of Kindness—Concern for his Kindred—What his Sin Was—Absorbed in Temporal Affairs—The Beggar Heir of Heaven—The Conditions Reversed at the Grave—What Soul-Suicide Is—The Plea Rejected.

THE Master presents to us here two men—the one lost, the other saved. No recognized outward sin is recorded of the lost man, and no righteous action of the saved man. The Pharisees, who were covetous, had heard the Lord's teaching concerning the unjust steward and then of the utter impossibility of serving two masters, God and Mammon, and

"They Derided Him."

To them it was that He addressed this parable. "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day." The Lord does not condemn either his food or his clothing; most rich men have better coats than poor men, and better food upon their tables. It was not this that his sin consisted; he paid for what he had, and would say that he encouraged trade and it was better than hoarding his money. He seemed to have been kind to the poor; for the beggar who lay at his gate (not outside his gate, but in the lower part of the house;) was so well known there that the very dogs had become familiar with him, and instead of driving him away, as dogs usually do beggars, they "licked his sores." He was outwardly a religious man, for Abraham called him "Son," and he called Abraham "Father." He was more than usually kind-hearted, for even in hell where his own case was hopeless, he wanted to warn his brethren from following him. Men, while suffering pain, have no thought for any but themselves; but this man, amidst the agonizing torment which drove him to beseech heaven for one drop of water, could think of the lost state of his brethren.

What then was His Sin?

That of tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in our land; perhaps your sin, dear reader; he lived for time, when God had created him for eternity. Sumptuous fare and clothing, ease and comfort, success in business, good name among men, these were the things he lived for. He had never let the light of eternity dawn upon his soul; perhaps for a thought he gave to God, he would give a hundred to his business or his pleasure, to the fashion of his clothing, to the material or color; for all such things were an object to him. If the tailor called when family prayer was going on, the interruption was rather a relief than otherwise, and he would give the tailor's business precedence, instead of inviting the man to join in prayer for the sake of his soul. The invitations which he made to sumptuous feasts were given to the great and noble: the world was in his heart, and in these things his calculations were for time, and not for eternity;

For Himself and Not for God.

As a man of business, his every transaction was definite in the extreme—clear and unchangeable; but in his devotions, public or private, there was nothing of the kind. He was regular at the synagogue, of course: it was "the thing;" he was not a heathen; but in the secret of his soul there was no intercourse with God. A few hurried prayers might appease his conscience, but the ominous silence between him and his Creator had never been broken. It was the death sleep of a soul "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2: 1.) And this was a man living under the avowed obligation to love the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might. (Deut. 6: 5.)

The beggar who lay at his gate had but one

ly desire: it was "to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table;" and not so much as ask for the broken bread meat, but only for that which fell among the dogs as the dog's portion. His calculations were small indeed, because he was living for eternity.

The Heir of Heaven

I afford to take his place among the dogs of earth, he knew that it was not forever; for he would "enter in through the gates of the city" "without" which "are dogs." (22: 14, 15.) "And it came to pass that the beggar died:" perhaps the dogs missed him more than did anyone on earth; but he was unknown in heaven, for he "was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom;" he had no minister to him on earth, but they who minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation (Heb. 1: 14), were waiting for him.

The rich man also died, and was buried. And there was a magnificent funeral to celebrate the entry of the ruined soul into its eternal misery and desolation. And God lifts the curtain and shows us the great hereafter. See the rich man in hell, not because he was rich, for Abraham, Joseph, and many of the children have been rich, who nevertheless, were fully served God. Why then do you find a man who was no murderer, no thief, no swearer, as far as we know? He is guilty of the loss of his own soul; and so you, my reader, if your soul is not saved, you are one must be guilty of it, and the lies between you and God; either He is willing to save you, or you are unwilling to be saved, for the Bible is witness that "Christ came into the world to save sinners," (1: 14), and that "He is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world." (1 John 2: 2.) You, do you, judge it possible that He should make a perfect provision for your salvation, and be unwilling to save you? Why, then, are you not saved? Where can the fault lie but in your own guilty indifference to the claims upon you of that God, who formed you for Himself? The rich man when in hell "lifts up his voice, being in torment, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me." One of his formal prayers to God could he now; everything appeared in its true light; all was fearfully, unchangeably real. He did not know God, but Abraham, who had once been on earth, seemed more approachable, and he appealed to him. "Send Lazarus," he cried, "that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in flame. Poor unhappy soul!" he has made his choice for Mammon, and he must abide by it. Awfully true it is that "God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." (Gal. 6: 7, 8.) The rich man had chosen to be of the flesh and there could be no other result than that which he so bitterly reaped.

Remember, remember that thou in thy life time redest thy good things." This is all the action which Abraham laid to his charge. He wholly, deliberately, and with perfect freedom of will, chosen to live for time, and the consequences were irreversible. "And like unto Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." Lazarus was saved because he was a poor man, but because he honored God and his own soul. If it is a glorious thing when a rich man despises his mortality by living only for time, how much more glorious is a poor man who, having so little to earth, throws away also his chance of heaven! A man who believes that he is in the possession of an immortal soul, and who, by his free will, for most unworthy considerations, sees, with his eyes open, that salvation which God so much, proves himself to be

The Suicide of His own Soul.

"unworthy of everlasting life." (Acts. 13: 46) "And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." All hope was cut off from this poor mistaken man, but it is a touching proof of his kindheartedness that just at this juncture he thought of his brethren and implored that if Lazarus could not come to him, he might at least be sent to warn them. But although on earth God's people can and should make themselves servants unto all men, (1 Cor. 9: 19), yet those who are in heaven are no longer at the disposal of their former superiors in earthly position. God's views of the relative positions of man to man do not follow in the lines of pedigree or caste. The most penniless or illiterate of earth, if they have graduated in God's school, and learned of Christ to be meek and lowly of heart, will take precedence of earth's aristocracy.

His Plea Denied.

The rich man's calculations were at fault even in hell. The beggar whom he had fed with his dogs was now a recognized protege of God! Abraham answered, "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." The rich man now knew his own heart, and how little he himself had heeded Moses and the prophets; "Nay, Father Abraham," he said, "but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent." And the answer, how solemn it is! "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." The Holy Ghost says, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven." (Heb. 12: 25.)

A BAKER'S GIFT.

In a home for children at Epsom, England there are seventy inmates, who have hitherto been supported entirely by voluntary contributions. Miss Mittendorff who conducts it, follows the method so long pursued by George Muller in his orphanages, in all emergencies. She makes no appeal to the public for funds, but a prayer meeting is held and the case is laid before God, in faith. No crisis has occurred yet in which He has failed to remove the difficulty. A Christian tourist, who visited the home on July 2, was interested in hearing of these straits, and the deliverances that were always expected, and always came. Talking with the children, he learned that so late as June 22, there was no available bread in the home. An exploration of the larder, however, resulted in the discovery of a quantity of arrowroot which had been overlooked, and with this substitute the large family did very well. The most remarkable incident, however, occurred a few days before. On that day there was no money nor bread in the house, and prayer was offered as usual. Then an event unprecedented in the history of the Home occurred. The baker who usually supplied the institution with bread, knowing nothing of the crisis, sent around to say that his men had made some mistake in making more bread than he could sell, and he would like to make the Home a present of forty or fifty quarters. They thanked God and took courage.

A CHILD'S BEQUEST.

How the fund for the erection of a church that eventually cost fifty-five thousand dollars was commenced, was recently told by the pastor, Rev. Russell H. Conwell. It shows how large an enterprise may grow from an insignificant beginning if the Holy Spirit is in the work. Mr. Conwell said: "We had a little girl in our Sunday-school, in the infant department, and one Sunday I met her crying, and I said, 'What is the matter, May?' She said, 'I cannot get in.' I said, 'Never mind, you must come a little earlier and you can get in next Sunday.' She said, 'I want to go in now.' I said, 'I will carry you.' So I took her up and carried her into the church and put her down in the infant department, where she had to stand in the corner. I said, 'Lord, why can't we get room enough for the children who wish to come? Why should these things be?' I felt it deeply and asked the Lord why it was. I thought, 'It is very strange how the Lord manages things.' But I saw, a little later, why it was. Three weeks later that little girl died. When the funeral service was over they laid the little pocket-book that she had used in my hands, and the mother said, 'May has been collecting these pennies that we might hire a larger room for the infant class.' I took those fifty-seven pennies and told the story to the church. 'These are the pennies that May has collected for a larger room for the infant class. Let us build a larger church.' We have had no gifts of thousands of dollars; nothing of the kind. The fifty-five thousand dollars that we received afterward were not the gifts of wealthy people, but the gifts of those who have followed that gift of the fifty-seven cents. Few rich people pay any attention to us. I know why that little girl cried in the streets that day because she could not get in. I know now, but I could not see then.

A MYSTERIOUS PRESENT.

In relating, recently, his experience of the goodness of God in time of trial Dr. George D. Dowkontt, the eminent servant of Christ who is training medical missionaries in New York for service in heathen lands, told the following interesting story: "When I went to New York City in March of 1881 I had never been there before, and I only knew one man there. Just the two of us went in to commence this work. Having five children and my wife to support, it was quite a problem to get along. This little incident happened at Christmas of 1882. Christmas came that year on Monday. All through the previous week, when I went home from New York to Brooklyn (money was very low in those days), the children would say, 'Papa, are you going to take us out to see the stores?' I would say that perhaps to-morrow night I would go. So it went on, and when I got home Saturday night, the children were all ready. 'Now take us to see the stores. This is the last opportunity.' The children wanted to see the things, but I did not want to take them because I had nothing to buy anything with. So I said, 'No.'

"I did the best I could, and we gathered together and sung and the time went along. Sunday night came and the children went to bed with visions of Santa Claus, but it seemed to us that there was not going to be any Santa Claus the next morning. My first student, Dr. Summers, who went to Africa in 1884 and died there after four years' successful labor, was then with me, and after the children went to bed, we were sitting together and talking until it got to be nearly quarter of twelve, when a sharp ring of the bell made us start. I went to the door and looked out, but could see nobody. I looked around, but there was nothing to be seen or heard. I was standing there and wondering what it could mean, when my wife and Dr. Summers came to the door. The children had been awakened by the bell and came running down stairs and we all met at the door. My wife said, 'What is it?' I said, 'I don't know, the bell ringing like this and nobody outside.' I went out and looked around, but nobody was there. My wife said, 'What is this?' And looking down at my feet, I saw something lying there bright and shining. I looked a little closer and there were ten silver dollars arranged in the form of the letter D. That happened seven years ago, and I have no knowledge as to who put them there, but I have a knowledge of who sent them. We picked them up and looked at them and found that they were all good. We went in and had a praise meeting, and my wife said, 'George, I think we had better keep one of these dollars.' I could tell you of a score of such deliverances as this which we have had."

"The Christian Herald" Binder. — Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

OLD AND NEW AGNOSTICS.

THE Athenian who erected an altar to the "Unknown God," symbolized one of the deepest cravings of the heart. He was an Agnostic, because the revelation of the gospel of the grace of God had not fallen on his ear. Canopied by a cloudless sky, fanned by the soft breezes of perennial spring, loving philosophy and art and cradled in luxury, he seemed to possess all that heart could wish. All sufficed not to still the irrepressible yearning of his immortal nature. He stretched forth his hands beyond these things, beyond the religious traditions of his race to "the Unknown God." He had risen higher than the modern Agnostic, who turns scornfully from a revelation which has moulded the world's thought and influences the Agnostic's life in spite of himself. This reverent act of the ancient Agnostic touches our deepest sympathies.

But the modern Agnostic starts with the assertion that God is unknowable and glories in the thought that he is emancipated from the bondage of an antiquated superstition. To be consistent with himself he then denies the spirituality of his nature and origin; and claims to be a material entity, an accident of an evolution infinitely more inconceivable than the existence of God. He exalts intellect as the sole arbiter of truth and closes the portal by which spiritual light and light-giving influences might enter. He declares his intention of admitting nothing that cannot be intellectually defined or rendered palpable to the senses. He gropes for his own origin in fossiliferous strata, and listens devoutly to the testimony of bones and flints in ancient caves. No theory founded on these is too wild for his adoption. With the microscope, the surgeon's knife, the scales and tests of the chemist he seeks for spirit, and as by these he cannot render it palpable to sense, he claims that its existence is at least problematical, if not disproved.

We ask him then to solve a simpler problem. Will he point out the hiding place of life in a plant, separate it from the substance, and render it palpable to the senses? If he cannot do this, will he deny the existence of vegetable life? We know this kind of life by results, which are to us conclusive evidences. What miracles it performs! It draws strange sustenance from the light of heaven, incorporates not only tenuous gases, but mineral salts and other inorganic matter, converting the whole into organic, we know not how. It builds delicate and intricate organizations, differing according to the nature of the seed. One moment we gaze on a wealth of beauty, the next our senses are ravished by the richest fragrance. Here the farmer gathers in abundant harvests of grain and luscious fruits. There the physician seeks the active essence by which he combats disease. We look on the transformation scenes which the seasons are ever presenting, and say: "Here is life!" Is not the evidence conclusive?

In like manner we observe the evidences of the existence of law, design, unresting energy. If there be law there must be a law-giver. Where there are order and intense activity of life, there must be an intelligent Agent. A mighty will, a living energy must have given atoms their first impulse, and must have continued to sustain and direct that activity, control the order and maintain the law. A moment's cessation of that energy and the universe must have fallen into confusion. Are these inferences unwarranted, or unphilosophical?

THE SOUL'S BELIEF.

WHAT the soul believes is a matter of great moment, and it is no small matter how a man believes. The heartiness and energy of the faith exercised are all important. "I believe God," said the Apostle Paul, when he and all about him were threatened with destruction. The apostle's faith was so strong and real, that it gave him peace amid the greatest perils, and enabled him to cheer his fellow-passengers. Indeed, it gave him command of the vessel. Thus, by faith, the prisoner became the commander. It is the men of strong and thorough convictions who become the world's rulers and the world's deliverers.

So much has the thoroughness of a man's faith to do with the outcome of it, that even faith in that which is false will often work wonders. Napoleon believed in himself, and in what he called manifest destiny, and his strong faith put almost all Europe at his feet. The conviction which sent Columbus over the ocean to seek another world was a very thorough one, or he would never have passed the Straits of Gibraltar. The martyrs who died scorning the terrors of flood, or fire, or wild beasts, had convictions that permeated every fibre of their being. Their faith was fire-proof, water-proof, death-proof. Although our faith may not be put to such tests to-day, nor the metal of our convictions be tested in the furnace seven times heated as in days gone by, we do well to cherish a robust and earnest faith even now.

In spiritual matters such a faith is absolutely essential if spiritual security is to be insured, or spiritual usefulness attained. Doubts and difficulties without number will creep in if the heart is not toned up with a firm, unwavering faith. When these enemies come, there follows the shattering of the foundations of the soul's peace and utter inability to be the bearer of spiritual good to others. To none so much as to the preacher of the Gospel is a thorough-going faith essential. Half-a-heart cannot preach Christ with saving results. He who has not a full and rounded faith in Christ, will not preach a whole Christ, and none but a whole Christ can save the world. Unitarianism will never redeem the world, because it lacks faith in Christ on His divine side. The world must have a divine Redeemer, or be utterly lost. A man who preaches a system of doctrine which has not his heartiest consent, is sowing seed that will have little or no vitality in it. The harvest of good will be scarce. Arrows that are to reach the bull's-eye of the target must be shot from bows that are taut. An earnest faith, an honest conviction, must be back of the utterances that are to reach human hearts.

In these days, when many are talking lightly of creeds as human manufactures and human deductions or productions, and are arguing that as such they are perfectly legitimate subjects for criticism and change, it is well to remember that our creeds have come up out of great tribulation, and that therefore have they made men who hold them so sturdy and so strong. The suggestion that they should be laid on the shelf as so much antiquated armor, and that less formidable beliefs should be substituted should not be too hastily adopted. The argument that we must whittle down our creeds until all denominations of Christians can unite in one expression of their faith, may be dear to the over-zealous unionist, but caution is needed here. We do not broaden a platform by dropping its planks one by one.

INFLUENCE OF THE PULPIT.

ALL the conditions of life in this country have changed greatly in the last thirty years. They have only intensified the necessity of certain influences in the work of the minister, order that it should be effective. These influences are as simple as they are powerful. They are connected with the fulfillment of certain obvious duties. Let all our clergymen, in the country as well as in the town, fully realize that faithful, regular, unwearied, intelligent devotion to their house-to-house work will make a personal relation that not only adds force to the word of preaching, but also gives them the foundation on which they build well for this life and eternity.

The experience of generations, and of hundreds of leaders in the work of saving souls, teaches us beyond question, that for the most part of those called to be ministers of the gospel there is no other way of being spiritually useful. "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth laborers into His harvest," said the Master.

Not mere sermon-makers, essay-writers, untrained gentlemen, but actual laborers, ten times more effective because they are acquainted with the learning of the schools, and know the thoughts of the wise of all ages. But above all else, let them be laborers, and God will bless their labor in making this land radiant with prosperous, powerful churches, as the night sky is glorious with countless stars.

WE would be more lenient with disagreeable people if we knew how much they have suffered. The thunder of trouble has soured the most human kindness.

No amount of praise for the dead can make up for lack of kindness to the living. It only gives the old folks less tombstone and more blankets.

CURRENT EVENTS.

War has Broken Out Between San Salvador and Guatemala. The new government of San Salvador has signalized its advent to power by declaring war on its formidable neighbor and invading its territory. It appears to have counted on the assistance of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. "Those powers must help us," said a prominent general of the San Salvador army, "because if we fail, Guatemala will absorb us and then will be so powerful that they will be in danger." Reports from the Isthmus indicate, however, that the present both Powers have held aloof from active participation in the conflict though they are friendly to San Salvador. Conflicting statements have been received of the results of the battles. From Guatemala advices have been received that Gen. Ezeta, the brother of the President of San Salvador, has been driven out of Guatemala with heavy loss of men and arms. On the contrary, from San Salvador we hear that the battles have been fought, in all of which Gen. Ezeta was victorious. The conflict in this case is a disappointing sequel to the recent Pan-American Conference.

The Correspondence Between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Blaine, on the Behring Sea question, which was published last week, attracted unusual attention. Mr. Blaine's share of it has merited the praise even of his antagonists, so useful are his arguments and so clearly and forcibly does he express himself. Having a weak case he conducts it so ably that the English minister finds it difficult to meet it, though he is far a stronger one. It is to be noted that Mr. Blaine never explicitly claims for the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the Sea, though the President's proclamation is illogical if we have no jurisdiction over it. He contends that Canadian sealing at certain periods is against the interests of the civilized world and should be stopped. That fact, he holds, justifies us in exercising police power over the sea in the public interest. It is clear that Mr. Blaine realizes that the position he formerly held, that we had acquired the jurisdiction over the sea, which Russia claimed and we resisted, is untenable: he therefore chooses ground on which there is hope for argument. Lord Salisbury, on the other hand, contends that the sealing should be controlled by international treaty and not by national legislation. He insists that there is no precedent, and no justification in international law, for a government attempting to regulate whaling or sealing in an open sea. It is very quieting to find that there has been no agreement arrived at, as there is a possibility of some treaty seizure involving a rupture with England.

Lord Salisbury, who conducts the correspondence on the English side, and whose portrait is here given, is a statesman of brilliant abilities and long experience. He assisted Earl Beaconsfield to negotiate the treaty of Berlin in 1878.

The Decision on the Original Package Question, which the House arrived at on July 22, is more comprehensive than the measure passed by the Senate, for which it is a substitute. It will cover oleomargarine and other articles, as well as liquor. It provides that "whenever any article of commerce is imported into any State from any other State, Territory or foreign nation, and there held or offered for sale, the same shall then be subject to the laws of such State, provided that no discrimination shall be made by any State in favor of its citizens against those of other States or Territories in respect to the sale of any article of commerce, or in favor of its own products against those of like character produced in other States or Territories. Nor shall the transportation of commerce through any State be obstructed except in the necessary enforcement of the health laws of such State." This is sufficient for all practical purposes, and may be hoped that the Senate will accept it, agree to a compromise in conference of similar tenor, before Congress adjourns. Our legislators owe it to the country as a duty that they rectify their blundering legislation with the least delay possible. It is not probable that Congress intended to pass a law under which liquor could be taken into Prohibition States; and there is no doubt that the Supreme Court came to its decision as to the effect of the law with extreme reluctance.

One of the Recent Tragedies of the Sea Was the burning of the National Line steamer Egypt, on the 17th inst., while the vessel was eleven hundred miles from land. The Egypt sailed from New York on the 10th of July, having on board 98 men, including the crew and a number of cattlemen; 640 head of cattle, besides a cargo of cotton and corn. Smoke was discovered issuing from the cotton on the evening of the 17th, and the steam pumps were immediately put to work. In six hours the fire had gained great headway and the engine-room was knee-deep with water, the pumps dry and the space between decks so hot that all hands were driven to the open air. The deck, too, became unbearable. Seeing no hope of combating the flames successfully, Captain Sumner ordered the boats lowered. By this time the steamer was a mass of flames, tall columns of fire shooting up high in air. The boats leaked badly and had it not been for the timely arrival on the scene of the German ship, Gustav Oscar, which took all hands on board, a frightful ocean tragedy would have resulted. In the midst of the tumult on the Egypt, the cattle broke loose from their tethers, and maddened by the heat, leaped into the sea or fell into the flaming hold with almost human cries of terror. Long after the boats had left the ship's side, the moaning of the poor creatures could be heard growing gradually fainter, as they succumbed to the fire. Later on the same day, the shipwrecked crew were transferred to the steamer Manhattan bound from New York to Hull, and were finally landed safe in England having lost everything, but profoundly thankful to Divine Providence for having escaped with their lives.

After a Strike Lasting Fully Two Months, and involving nearly 3,000 operatives, the cloak-makers of New York have returned to work. For weeks past their condition has been verging on actual starvation. Still, although they could at any time have returned to work at their old wages, by the advice of Joseph Barondesse, their leader, they held out until the manufacturers recognized the newly organized union, the refusal to do which was the chief cause of the strike. Barondesse, who seems to have gained complete ascendancy over these poor, ignorant Polish, Russian and Austrian workmen, is a mere youth, less than a year in this country. Slender, fair-haired, almost beardless, and in no sense an orator, he has controlled their meetings and played the role of dictator at the councils of the manufacturers. A majority of the men are socialists, though not of the demonstrative order, and very few are citizens. Until a few days ago, Barondesse was determined to continue the strike, but the terrible destitution of the men and their families, and the concessions of the manufacturers, who were moved largely by sympathy, brought him to terms. Altogether the strike possessed unique features rarely seen in labor movements in this country, and showed how the influence of a strong-minded man might be exerted for good or evil among the unskilled classes of immigrants. Most of these workmen have learned their trade in this country. The strike has already cost them nearly $200,000 in wages lost, while the loss sustained by the manufacturers through diminished trade and the boycott is probably fully as great.

Prince George, the Second Son of the Prince of Wales, is not being cordially welcomed in Newfoundland. He is cruising on the British ship Thrush. As it was expected that he would visit St. John's, a reception committee was formed to give him a welcome suitable to his exalted station. But just now Newfoundland is not enthusiastically loyal. The people think that the British Government has neglected their interests in permitting the French to close their fishery and lobster canning establishments. The reception committee found little support, and eventually proposed to substitute for the reception to Prince George, a ball to the admiral and officers of the fleet. This proposal proved more unpopular than the other, and has been abandoned. It is now announced that Prince George will not visit St. John's. This is unfortunate, as the prince is said to be a very genial and estimable young man. The position of the Newfoundland people is, however, quite logical. There is nothing in the young prince himself, that his coming should cause particular ecstasy. It is in his character as a representative of royalty that he is of importance, and it is precisely this representative feature that is just now offensive to the people. The prince, whose portrait is here given, is in his twenty-sixth year, having been born in June, 1865. He entered the navy in 1877, when he was twelve years old, and since that year has passed most of his time at sea.

BRIEF NOTES.

Sing Sing Camp-meeting will be held August 5-15. It will be under the charge of Rev. Thomas Harrison.

The New Year Book of the Congregationalists shows a gain during the past year of 120 churches and 16,377 members.

Dr. Peters, the German explorer, who has so many times been reported dead, reached Zanzibar from the interior of Africa, on the fifteenth inst. He is well.

The report at the Sunday-school convention at Pittsburgh stated that in the United States there are 105,894 Protestant Sunday-schools, 1,120,433 teachers, and 8,598,851 scholars.

Chu Jor and Chu Sing two Christian Chinamen who are regular Christian workers among their countrymen conducted services in St Paul's Church, Ocean Grove on July 20. After the address which Chu Jor delivered in excellent English, he and Chu Sing sang the hymn "Christ our King," in Chinese.

At the Anniversary meeting of the Church Missionary Society in London, a special telegram was received calling for instant reinforcements for Africa, and four volunteers who responded were dispatched from the meeting itself. An Anonymous gift of $25,000 was received "as a substitute for service," and a number of smaller gifts with a like purpose.

Rev. J. C. Holbrook, D. D., the well-known Congregational minister, who is now residing on the Pacific coast, referring to Christian work among Chinamen in the United States, says: "There is one Congregational church in San Francisco that has on its roll one hundred Chinese members, who give every evidence of true conversion, and there are churches of other denominations who have consistent Chinese members."

Rev. C. H. Yatman's services at Ocean Grove, this season, are more numerously attended than ever. Over a thousand young people are at the meetings every day. Scarcely a meeting takes place without some conversions occurring. At one of the meetings recently more than twenty gave themselves to Christ. Mr. Yatman believes that during July and August he has now the privilege of speaking to fully 50,000 different persons.

The eighth General Conference for Bible Study and Equipment for Service will be held at Northfield, Mass., from July 31 to August 10, and among the speakers will be: the Rev. A. J. Gordon and the Rev. Mr. Gumbart, of Boston; Professor Moorhead; Major D. W. Whittle; Dr. Marcus Rainsford, of London; John G. Wooley; Geo. D. Mackay, of New York; Bishop Thoburn, of India, and the Rev. F. E. Marsh, of England. The leaders of song will be Messrs. Sankey and Stebbins.

DAVID'S LONGING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I opened my mouth and panted; for I longed for thy commandments. Look thou upon me and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name," etc. Psalm 119: 131-133.

The Believer's Grammar School—The College of Holiness—I. Longing for Holiness—Sin Hated Worse than Hell is Feared—The Man Out of Breath With Striving—Fresh Strength to Renew the Battle—The Dissatisfied Man—Hopeful of Better Things—II. Earnest Pleading for Holiness—Appeals to Mercy—Pleads Use and Wont—Accepts the Prescribed Method—III. Enlarging on the Favor Sought—The Word the Umpire—The Details of Life Regulated—Changing Idols—How to Get Holiness.

WHEN we have light enough to see what holiness is, and how desirable it is, then we should hunger and thirst after it. To be holy is to go to the University; to have a desire for it is to go to a preparatory school for children, and to labor and agonize for it is to go to the grammar school. I want to teach the young children, and get them ready for that grammar school, that their course may be clear for the university of actual holiness of life. I shall not take you to the grammar school of strong desire with the view of your stopping there, but that I may coach you up, by God's good Spirit, for the university of attainment, where you will be "in the fear of the Lord all the day long."

Here we have David desiring, praying, pleading, and setting forth very clearly what he pants after. May you and I have the same burning desires: may we pant; may we thirst; and at the same time may we clearly know what we are panting for, so that we may the more intelligently pursue it, and thus go the nearer way to obtain it! May the Holy Spirit, the Author of holiness, help us in our meditations upon these three verses!

I. First, then, we will think of Longing After Holiness:

"I opened my mouth, and panted: for I longed for thy commandments," Observe carefully that the man of God longed for the Lord's commandments. This cannot mean anything else than that he longed to know them, longed to keep them, longed to teach them, longed to bring all around him into obedience to them. Many religious people long after the promise, and they do well; but they must not forget to have an equal longing for the commandments. It is a sad sign when a man cannot bear to hear of the precepts, but must always have the preacher touching the string of privileges. I do not think I should have made Solomon's choice of "wisdom," unless it included wisdom of moral and spiritual character, and that is holiness. I said to a young girl the other day, "Are you perfect?" She answered that it was her greatest desire to be so, though she had not yet attained it. Just so; and that hallowed desire shows which way the heart is going. No unrenewed heart ever sighed and cried after holiness.

A mere passing wish is of but little worth. I am speaking of the intense and continued desire of the heart. We must strive after holiness with an agony of desire. Oh, to be rid of every sin! What is that but heaven? Oh, to clean escape from every tendency to it, and from every trace of it!

This Would be Bliss.

What more could we desire than to fulfil that word of our Lord—"Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect?" Oh, that we could be like Him who said, "The Prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me!" How wonderful! "Nothing in me!" Alas! the evil prince finds very much of his own in most of us. One of the best men I ever knew said, at eighty years of age, "I find the old man is not dead yet." Our old man is crucified, but he is long a-dying. He is not dead when we think he is.

Now, observe that the Psalmist, having told us what he longed for, shows the strength of those desires; for he had been so eager in his pursuit of holiness that he had lost his breath. He could not find among men a good figure to describe himself, and so he looked among animals, and he selected the panting stag as his crest. The hart has been hunted over hill and dale; the dogs have long been close behind it; it has fled, as with the wings of a swift eagle, from their murderous teeth. For a moment it has eluded them. It pauses; it longs to bathe itself in the water-brook. It is hot, and weary, and thirsty, and therefore opens wide its mouth. See how it pants! Mark how its breast heaves and its whole body palpitates while it tries to regain its breath! The poor hunted thing is exhausted with its desperate efforts. Have not we also at times felt spent in the struggle against sin? We have not resisted unto blood: but we have said to ourselves, "What more can we do? This fierce temptation returns: we may yet be overthrown by it. Oh, that we could take to ourselves wings and fly away! Woe is unto us, for we have no strength." Are you ready to faint this morning? Underneath are the everlasting arms. He that faints in such a pursuit as this, shall swoon away upon the bosom of his Lord. Be of good comfort.

Extermination Ordered.

See, next, how resolved he was. He says, "I opened my mouth, and panted." He is eager to go onward. Worn out by previous effort, he does not lie down to die, but is determined to be still on the move. Give up the struggle? Never! Woe unto him who says of holiness, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." We must never degrade ourselves by saying, "This form of sin cannot be conquered, for it is constitutional: as it was bred in my bone it must be allowed to come out in my flesh." Brethren, we allow no excuse for ourselves. We will not plead for the life of a single sin. A hot temper may be natural, but it must be conquered. A niggardly spirit may be inborn, but it must be cast out. A proud mind may be a family heritage but it must be laid low. Certain weeds may be indigenous to the soil of your nature, and therefore it may be doubly difficult to extirpate them; but the work must be done. Keep the hoe going; never cease from the determination to uproot the last of them.

Note that the follower after holiness seeks renewed strength. Why does he open his mouth and pant? Is it not to get more air, to fill his lungs again, to cool his blood and to be ready to renew his running? When you have an hour's retirement from the battle against sin, spend it in furbishing your shield, and sharpening your sword; for another assault will soon be upon you. We can become strong again. "He giveth more grace." We are never, for a moment, to suppose that we have exhausted the strength of God when we have exhausted our own.

The Psalmist was dissatisfied with his attainments. Brethren, may we

Never be Content

with ourselves. We are satisfied with the Word of God; we are satisfied with the gospel of God; we are satisfied with the favor of God; we are satisfied with the Christ of God; but we shall never be satisfied with our own personal condition till we wake up in the likeness of the First-born Son. Satisfaction with self is the death of progress. He that is not content with his place in the race will push forward; but he that is proud of his position in the running will soon flag and fall behind. Like the man on the bicycle, we must keep going: to stop is to drop. On! On! On! You are only safe as the wheel spins round, and you throw the miles behind you. My text is not the utterance of one who is sitting in his arm-chair, with the motto on the wall behind him, "Rest and be thankful." As for the man who feels as the Psalmist did, his mind is far away, in the land beyond him. His opened mouth and panting heart betoken desires which are not as yet fulfilled.

Yet, let no tinge of discouragement mingle with your dissatisfaction: this man is hopeful of better things. Few of us have an adequate idea of what we may become even here by divine grace. The possibilities of sanctification are seldom explored; but the mass of professors are content with small things in this direction. When a man asks me, "Can I be perfect?" and looks as if he would lead me into a debate upon the subject, I try to find out what manne of man he is before I answer him. If he is worldly, given to appetite, an angry man, a hater, a proud man, or a lover of his own supremacy, I smile at the question as coming from him. I picture to myself a man who slept under a hedge last night, whose pockets are full of emptiness, whose clothes would disgrace a rag-bag, out at elbows, and beggarly; and this gentleman wishes to discuss with me the question—Is great wealth attainable by an ordinary workingman? I cannot see what has to do with him. "He of the rag-bag says, 'You know, sir, we cannot all acquire ten thousand a year.' "No, my dear fellow, it would seem that we cannot all save ten pence, much less ten thousand a year. Had you not better get a pair of shoes for your feet before you talk about thousands? These are great words from a very little man." When you are not doing what you might do, why speculate about what is possible or impossible? When a man has not enough grace to make change for a sixpence, he may waive all question about the millions of spiritual perfection.

The Question

Do you cry, "Can I be perfect?" I answer leave that question until you are much further on the way to it than you are now. Do not be distressed by the fear that you may by accident become better than you should be. I will insure against that calamity at a very low rate. Have faith in God, and say, in His name, "If perfect holiness be possible, I will have it: if it can be reached on earth, I will reach it." All that the Spirit of God can make out of such a poor sinner as I am it is my desire that He should make. I gladly submit myself, and all that I have, to His gracious operation. Brethren, do you not say the same?

II. Desire, where it is real, will soon embody itself in prayer. Hence we find the Psalmist for the holiness he desired. Here are his breathings: "Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name." You see, dear friends, he believes in God's power to bless him, and here he turns to Him, and cries, "Look thou upon me." Is that all? Is a look sufficient? Hark to me, and I will show you that there is much in a look. Is it not written, "Look unto me, a be ye saved?"—that is our look to God. If we are looking to God saves us, what will not God looking at us do? If there is so much power received by the eye of faith, how much will be given by the glance of love from God? This is not little of a look from God. A look—only a look! Ay, but it is from HIM. Remember when a look from Christ did for Peter. He did not look on him, and swearing Peter turned to weeping Peter in a moment. Great sinners may be grateful for a look, for it is more than they deserve. Great saints may rejoice in a look; it means much when the eye which looks is the eye of Omnipotent Love.

Pleading Fervently.

Observe that the pleader appeals to mercy. Let me draw your attention to the text, "Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me." We be delivered from the power of sin is the greatest of mercies.

Sin is a Misery

from which we can only be saved by mercy. We have no claim at all upon the Lord by way of merit; our appeal is to His sovereign grace. We have no rights—these we forfeited by our treason against our King. We plead, as the courts say, in forma pauperis, or as the poor man seeks help from pity. Our appeal is ad misericordiam—to mercy and compassion. When we come before God in prayer, seeking sanctification, base your request upon His mercy—"Look thou hast done much for me; do still more, and make me holy."

The Psalmist employs the grand plea of use and wont; for, says he, "As thou usest to do unto those that love thy name." Use and wont generally have great weight in a court of law.

and said to me, "How will such a suit go? Case has never been before a court until . . . I answered, "Are you sure that what one is according to universal and long-continued custom? for, if so, though there be . . . the custom of the trade will stand." Custom among men reaching far back holds good; how much shall the custom of the unchanging God decide His future? The Psalmist pleads the Lord's own custom and this is a grand plea with Him, because unchanging.

The Cost.

It involves another fact: he joyfully accepts the method. When you cry to God to help your overcoming of sin, you must count that He shall do it in His own way. Now, His will that sanctification should involve payment, are you willing to take it? "Oh," say you, "Lord, do unto me as thou usest unto those that love thy name; and if it is written, 'As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten,' Lord, rebuke and chasten me, so long as I do not but love me." We kiss the rod, and the Father who uses it deigns to kiss us. We assent to the processes of grace that they enjoy the results of grace. It may so be that if God sanctifies you, He may have made you very small: cheerfully yield yourself to the mill. If this is the way in which He deals with those that love His name, do not deny different treatment. As the result, you become a butt for the ridicule of ungodly men; but of this do not complain; for this has often happened unto those that love His name.

I thank you for your deep attention: It is greatly helpful to me in my feeble state. You bear with me while I conduct you to the Lord's head, which is this: we see the Psalmist arguing intelligently upon

The Favor He Seeks.

Let us see how the Psalmist puts it. His prayer for holiness, and he describes it as being by the word of God. "Order my steps in Thy Word." The different sects have different views of holiness, but the reality of holiness is one. It is this—"Order my steps in Thy Word." If we believe God's Word we are orthodox; if we practice it we are holy. This Book is a great umpire as to conduct, and not the mere moral sentiment of passing generations.

Pray God to order your life according to His Word. To this Word we must be conformed. This is our copy to write by: this is the pattern to which we must be modelled.

Remember that he would have every step of God: he would have each one ordered by the Lord. He would receive his strength, his motives, his guiding influences direct from the Lord: "Order my steps in Thy word." Lord, I put my foot down there, may it be at Thy order; and when I move it to another place, may it still be at Thy command. Whether I am there, may I only step where Thou dost intend. Let me go nowhere apart from Thy guidance and command. "Well," cries the Lord, "this is difficult." But, my brother, although obedience may not be easy it is free from the far greater difficulties which accompany self-will. A child who will do nothing but what his father commands does not find his life difficult; the difficulty comes in when he attempts to follow his own will, and to have his own way. You cannot serve God and self: if you try it, the mixture is nauseous and injurious. Remember that the last part of the verses is the true way of describing holiness: "Let not iniquity have dominion over me." He would be wholly delivered from

The Tyranny of Sin.

Men are violent against one sin; but the saint abhors all sin. You are a teetotaler; very glad to hear it: you will not allow the influence of drunkenness to have dominion over you. Are you selfish and ungenerous? Have you the bad habits of strict economy in regard to your donations, so that you always give a penny where you ought to give a pound? What have you done? You have only changed your idols. You have dethroned one usurper to set up another. If you were once profane, and are now hypocritical, you have only changed iniquities. It is a very curious thing how one sin feeds on another: the death of profligacy may be the resurrection of greed; the flight of pride may be the advent of shameless folly. The man who was lewd, riotous, brawling, and irreligious has killed those sins, and on their graves he has sown a handful of a poisonous weed called pride, and it flourishes amazingly. It may be London pride, country pride, or English pride, or American pride; but it is rare stuff to grow, and to grow over the rotting carcasses of other sins. The right prayer is, "Let not any iniquity have dominion over me." Some sins are of respectable repute, and other sins are disreputable among men; but to a child of God every sin is loathsome.

"Let not any iniquity have dominion over me," is a prayer against the reign of sin. Sin will attack us, but sin shall not subdue us; for it is written, "Sin shall not have dominion over you." You may put up

"Trespassers Beware!"

But the trespassers will come, do what you may; still, they shall not be allowed to acquire the right of way through our nature. If a bird flies over our head, we cannot help it; but we will not let it make its nest in our hair. So a temptation may pass by us, an evil imagination may flit over the mind; but we will not invite evil, nor patiently endure it, nor allow it to lodge in our souls.

I have done when I say just this. I have been describing these longings, but thus I have only been taking you to that preparatory school, of which I spoke at the commencement. Already some of you are saying, "I do not think I shall make a rapid scholar even at this preparatory school." The first thing you have to do is to see that you have these longings strong within you. If you have them, thank God for them. To pant and pine after holiness is infinitely better than to be self-righteous. Cultivate these desires and cravings.

But never rest content with mere longings. He that really longs is not content to long: He desires to have his desire fulfilled. The only way to be holy—you that have not begun—is to go to a holy God through the holy Mediator. Trust in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus, and so be reconciled to God by Him who alone can put away sin. Then go again to Jesus, and ask Him to renew you in the spirit of your mind, and wash you with water from the power of sin, as He has washed you with blood from the guilt of it. When you are washed, take care that you keep your garments unspotted from the world. When you have once known the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, do not return again to folly. Follow on watchfully and resolutely. Seek the daily renewing of the Holy Spirit, and so shall you go from strength to strength till you shall be like your Lord, and shall see Him as He is. May God bless my feeble words, and put power into them for your eternal good, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

MR. STANLEY'S VISIT TO MR. MACKAY.

The brave missionary whose portrait appeared in this journal on April 23—Mr. Alexander Mackay—and who has since gone to his reward, received a visit from Mr. H. M. Stanley during his recent expedition. The explorer, in his new book, In Darkest Africa, (published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons) gives his impressions of this wonderful man. Our readers, who have from time to time been kept acquainted with Mr. Mackay's work, his peril and his triumphs will be glad to read what Mr. Stanley has to say about him. Mr. Stanley writes;

"When we were about half a mile off, a gentleman of small stature, with a rich brown beard and brown hair, dressed in white linen and a grey Tyrolean hat, advanced to meet us. 'And so you are Mr. Mackay? Mwanga did not get you, then, this time? What experiences you must have had with that man! But you look so well one would say you had been to England.'

"'Oh no, this is my twelfth year. Mwanga permitted me to leave, and the Rev. Cyril Gordon took my place, but not for long.' . . .

"There were signs of labor, and constant unwearying patience sweating under a hot sun, a steadfast determination to do something to keep the mind employed . . . Out of the European quarter there trooped a number of little boys and big boys looking uncommonly sleek and happy, and quiet laborers came up to bid us, with hats off, 'Good morning.' . . . I was ushered into the room of a substantial clay structure, the walls about two feet thick, evenly plastered, and garnished with missionary pictures and placards. There were four separate ranges of shelves filled with choice useful books. 'Allah Akhbar,' replied Hassan, his Zanzibar headman, to me; 'books! Mackay has thousands of books in the dining-room, bedroom, the church—everywhere books. Ay, loads upon loads of them!' And while I was sipping real coffee and eating home-made bread and butter for the first time for thirty months. I thoroughly sympathized with Mackay's love for books. But it becomes quite clear why, among so many books, and children and outdoor work, Mackay cannot find leisure to brood and become morbid, and think of dreariness, wilderness, Despair and Loneliness.

"A clever writer lately wrote a book about a man who spent much time in Africa, which from beginning to end is a long-drawn wail. It would have cured both writer and hero of all moping to have seen the manner of Mackay's life. He has no time to fret and groan and weep, and God knows, if ever man had reason to think of 'graves and worms and oblivion,' and to be doleful, lonely, and sad, Mackay had when, after murdering his Bishop and burning his pupils, and strangling his converts, and clubbing to death his dark friends, Mwanga turned his eye of Death on him. And yet the little man met it with calm blue eyes that never winked. To see one man of this kind working day after day for twelve years bravely and without a syllable of complaint or a moan amid the 'wilderness,' and to hear him lead his little flock to show forth God's loving-kindness in the morning, and His faithfulness every night, is worth doing a long journey for the courage and contentment that one derives from it."

Mr. Stanley has something more to say about the missionaries of Uganda which the friends of missions will be glad to see, and which confirms the account published in this journal two years ago, when the secular press was harshly criticizing the conduct of the missionaries. Mr. Stanley says: "I feared when I first heard of the expulsion of the missionaries from Uganda that they had been inconsiderate and impulsive, and acted regardless of consequences; that though their conduct was strictly upright, and according to their code, their narrowness and want of sympathy had caused them to commit errors of judgment; but the Christian converts gave them an excellent character, and repeated much of the good advice Mr. Mackay had bestowed on them, which were that though the yoke of Mwanga was exceedingly heavy to them, the missionaries had in this abstained from meddling in the politics of the country. Something like $250,000 must have been expended on this mission since it was established. Were the story of it truthfully written, it would contain in itself all that is needed to guide those interested in it. The tragic deaths of Smith, O'Neil, Penrose, and Bishop Hannington; the mortal diseases which cut off Dr. Smith, and as Zachariah tells me, two more, one of whom [Parker] is called bishop; the almost fruitless residence in Uganda of Messrs. Wilson, Pearson, and Felkin; the splendid successes of Mackay; and the industry and devotion of Ashe and Gordon."

Undoubted Proofs

Mr. Stanley considers the success of the Mission amply proved: "by the sacrifices of the converts, by their determined resistance to the tyrant, by their successful deposition of him. . . . The missionaries were compelled to bore deep down, and after that the element sprang up spontaneously. After years of baffling and unpromising work, the converts flocked spontaneously to the new Church of Equatorial Africa. Princes and peasants, chiefs and warriors, came forward to be instructed in the Christian religion, to be taught the arts of reading and writing, and to be the proud possessors of printed books in their own language treating of Jesus and His sufferings in behalf of humanity."

The Traditional House of Dives, (from a Photograph Brought from Jerusalem by Dr. Talmage).

Mr. Stanley seems to have imbibed some of the spirit by which missionaries are animated. In summing up his work, he said: "Money, time, years, strength, health, life, have been freely devoted by us to this work—without even giving one thought to a reward which, whatever its character might be, would be utterly inadequate as compensation. To one like me, what are banquets? A crust of bread, a chop, and a cup of tea, is a feast to one who, for the best part of twenty-three years, has not had the satisfaction of eating a shilling's worth of food a day. Receptions! They are the very honors I would wish to fly from, as I profess myself slow of speech, and Nature has not fitted me with a disposition to enjoy them. Medals! I cannot wear them; the pleasure of looking at them is even denied me by my continual absence. What then? Nothing. No honor or reward, however great, can be equal to that subtle satisfaction that a man feels when he can point to his work and say, 'See, now, the task I promised you to perform with all loyalty and honesty, to the utmost of my ability, is to-day finished.'"

Mr. Stanley does not forget to acknowledge the great Giver and Preserver of Life, for again and again he acknowledges with sincere piety, that he and his little band owed their deliverance from imminent death by starvation, or from extermination at the hands of the savages to the merciful dispensation of Providence.

HELIGOLAND AND PROPHECY.

WHILE statesmen are discussing the effects of the transfer of Heligoland from England to Germany, the student of prophecy may take note of its significance in relation to God's Word. The trend of events is in one direction, and this small transfer follows on the same line. Before the close of this dispensation we expect to see Cæsar's Roman Empire reconstituted by the federation of all its parts. By that time the Empire will be composed of ten kingdoms answering to the ten toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image. They will probably be Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey and the Balkan States. Heligoland was outside the Empire, and therefore in the revived Empire belongs to the other camp. England, which is part of the Empire, has surrendered it to Germany, which is not a part of the Empire, and the island has gone where it belonged. Like the transfer of Hanover to Germany, the change is one indicated by prophecy. We may expect to see other changes on the map of Europe on the same lines before the ten kingdoms indicated again compose the Roman earth and already, as in the present troubles in Bulgaria, the premonitory signs of the new combination are being witnessed. God moves slowly as we reckon time, but in the end it will be seen, that though "there are many devices in a man's heart, nevertheless the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand." (Prov. 19: 21.)

A GIFT THAT COST.

THE resolve which David expressed when Araunah offered to give him the wherewithal for a sacrifice (1 Kings' 24: 24.): "I will not offer burnt-offering to the Lord my God of that which cost me nothing," is not always practiced by those who give to the Lord's work. Yet our Lord's commendation of the widow who gave her two mites, indicates that it is not the amount given, so much as the self-denial involved, that gauges the worth of the gift in the sight of God. An incident related by Miss de Broen, of the Paris Mission, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on June 18, refers to a gift of the right kind from three children.

It appears that they had set their minds on having a parrot that could talk. For some months their parents refused to buy one, but eventually they promised that if the children could find a parrot that did not scream or swear, they would consider it. After a long search, the children found a bird that had neither of the bad habits. But the price asked for it was twenty dollars. That was a great deal of money to give for a parrot, but by much coaxing, the father agreed to pay it. The subject was dismissed and the father begged to tell his wife of a meeting he had attended that day. It was one of Miss de Broen's meetings, and he described pathetically the condition of the poor neglected children in Belleville on whom Miss de Broen works. He told much she was doing to help them to earn a livelihood and to teach them in the evening to read and write, and tell them about the Saviour. He said she could do much more if she had more money and it grieved her that she could not take more children to care for when there were so many needing her care. The children listened to the story and after they had recounted it together. The next day they told their father that they had decided to relinquish their present of the parrot if the money would cost were given to Miss de Broen for the extension of her work. Miss de Broen says she never had a gift that she valued so much.

THE HOUSE OF DIVES.

(See Illustration.)

READERS of this journal who are Sunday school teachers may find the picture on this page of interest to their classes. It is the reproduction of a photograph brought by Dr. Talmage from Jerusalem. The house it represents is one that the guides show as the house of a rich man who dressed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously every day, while Lazarus sat at his gate. The guides like to interest parties they conduct around, and are eager to perpetuate traditions of this kind. Many of them have no foundation in fact, and the number of the house. Our Saviour's parables are obviously told to convey truth in striking and concrete being always more impressive than the abstract, and while true to nature and to life, men were not necessarily actual facts. Doubtless many such cases as this of Dives and Lazarus had occurred, but it is unlikely that any particular case. If, therefore, the man was merely a type, we need not look for his house.

The interest of the picture consists in the fact that this is an ancient house, such as rich men live in, in the Holy Land, and as the copy changed but little, was probably ind of house wealthy families ied in Christ's time. It would quently be the house He would in His mind when He related rable. As a rule the ostentation proprietor was not shown in terior. The walls were plain, there was any ornamentaion any-

it would be a little at the gate.
oor opened from the street into a as seen in the illustration. Many se courts were not roofed at all, awning was drawn across to et them from the sun. It was bly in a court of this kind that was teaching when the man who ick of the palsy was brought to Mark 2:4). It was a simple thing w aside this awning and lower d with the man on it. Teach-ave sometimes found a diffin explaining the breaking up of as the children naturally have ea of a roof like ours in their Where the courts were roofed usually a flat roof of mud laid ghs or rafters. Strangers might,
ften did, enter these courts,
is probable that when the Lord of Lazarus sitting at the gate of He referred to this custom and ace of Lazarus may have been court. It would have been quite racter with that age of formal-hen the Pharisees prayed in the s and a trumpet gave notice that were giving alms, for a wealthy desiring a reputation for piety nt beggars into his court-yard.

From the court, doorways gave access to the s rooms on the ground floor, and stair-ed to the galleries on a level with the uppers. When a visitor came, he was ushnto rooms more magnificent and luxuri-an anyone would have supposed could be behind such a mean exterior. He was ained at tables on which the costly plate delicate viands were in harmony. After the the harp, the timbrel, and other instru-of music sounded in the court, and there ancing in which he might join, or which ght see from the gallery. The material enerally of dried brick, for the poorer s, and stone or marble for the wealthy; timber was not abundant and therefore the best houses had the most wood in onstruction. There were no glass win-
A lattice that could be opened or closed sure did duty for a window.

EX-SENATOR PALMER.

DENT OF THE WORLD'S FAIR COMMISSION.
choice of ex-Senator Palmer for the head stupendous undertaking on which Chi-as entered, is much more than a compli-It is an evidence of the high esteem in he is held for sagacity, and organizing ministrative ability. Under the bill pass-Congress, the Governors of the States ominated two Commissioners, and Presi-arrison nominated eight more, who were Commissioners-at-large. At a meeting Commissioners in Chicago, the perman-icers of the Fair were chosen, and when me of ex-Senator Palmer was mentioned,
s elected President by acclamation.
omas Wetherell Palmer is sixty years of aving been born in Detroit, Mich., in 1830.
quired his preparatory education at St.
College, and thence went to the University higan. He was unable to complete his e there, by an affection of the eyes, which ided him from close application to study.
ent for an extended tour in Europe for the ery of his health, and subsequently spent time in Central and South America. On turn to his native land he commenced ess in Wisconsin, but after a short time
id in Detroit, where he engaged in real es-

Ex-Senator Palmer, President of the World's Fair Commission.

tate transactions on a large scale. Ultimately he embarked in the lumber trade, which soon grew to such proportions as to occupy all his attention, and from which he realized a colossal fortune.

Mr. Palmer's first appearance in politics was in 1878 when he was elected to the State Senate.
Two years later he was a candidate for the Governorship on the Republican ticket, and in 1883 was elected United States Senator. At the conclusion of his term in 1888, he determined to retire from political life, but President Harrison nominated him as Minister to Spain. This would have been a congenial position, as in his early days he had spent much of his time, while in Europe, in that country and in the Spanish-speaking countries on this side. He resigned, however, at the solicitation of the Chicago people, who wanted him for the Presidency of the Fair Commission.

Written expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 478.)

A NEW INFLUENCE.

THE curiosity Howard Wescott felt about the occupant of the seat in the choir did not escape his sister's observation, but Mrs. Bollis was too earnest and sincere in her Sabbath observances to hold a conversation in church, so she imparted the information asked for, hoping that Howard would soon have in the sermon, something to occupy his attention, to the exclusion of young ladies or anything else.

Howard made mental note of the lady's name
and then turned his attention to the worship.
His sensations were a curious mixture as he sat in the pew, and followed the various parts of the service. There was at bottom the old disposition to treat the Bible, and the whole basis of Christianity as an antiquated legend that had served its purpose, and was giving way to the higher culture and knowledge of the nineteenth century. Then there was the new common sense view of Christianity that Heritage had presented, and with that, the higher level of Christian thought and experience from which Dr. Hamlyn discoursed. And, running, like a silver thread through the warp, and weft of his meditations was the presence of that girl in the choir, who seemed to be exercising a subtle magnetic influence on him. Perhaps he would not have felt the last so much had the religious element not been so long a stranger to his soul. It was but newly awakened, and he was finding, as all do who persistently close their minds against religious truth for a time, that the unfamiliar guest, when it is invited, has to contend for the possession of the attention with rivals who are more at home.

Time and again, as Dr. Hamlyn's sermon thrilled him, his eye would stray to the face among the choir, as if seeking a community of enjoyment of the eloquent and scholarly, and at times impassioned arguments. It was not always that he found what he sought.
Intelligence he always detected, but Miss More did not seem to be borne away, and enthused, as he expected she would have been, by certain passages. Her air was rather cold and critical, as if she were weighing the preacher's arguments, and separating his purely logical deductions from the soaring flights of oratory, in which they were set forth. To Howard's eye Miss More had the appearance, not so much of a believer, or an unbe-liever, as of one holding her judgment in suspense.

"Is Miss More a member of the church, Mary?" he asked on the way homeward after service.

"No, I am sorry to say she is not,"
said his sister. "I do not know why she is not.
It has often puzzled me?"

"Is she engaged, Mary?" asked her husband.
"I fancy Howard wants to ask that question more than the other, but he is too bashful."

"No, I think not," was the reply. "I feel sure she is not engaged to any one here, at any rate, or I should have seen them together. Miss More has always interested me exceedingly, and I have been surprised that young men have not been attracted by her."

"So you see Howard, you have a fair field, as far as appearances go. Now my boy my direct question has set your mind at rest, and saved
you all the trouble of beating about the bush.
You are in my debt, but as you did not retain me to represent you I make no charge. Leave it to your honor."

The talk drifted to a discussion of Robert Heritage's teaching and Dr. Hamlyn's sermon, both of them having made a deep impression on the young man's mind, so that he felt more favorably disposed toward Christianity than he had for many years. "Surely," he mused, after reaching his room, "those two men are not unlettered and narrow, as I have always thought Christians were, especially those of the orthodox type, who believe in the plenary inspiration of the Bible. I have contended for several years that when a man becomes enlightened he gives up the old-fashioned way of accepting the Scriptures, and turns agnostic, or at least rationalist. But I see I have drawn my conclusions too hastily. There may be more intelligence among orthodox Christians than I thought.
How I should like to talk these matters over with Heritage!" And he told himself that he would seek an interview with the Bible class teacher at the earliest opportunity.

He found little difficulty in bringing about the wished-for interview, for a few days later he met Heritage on the street, when the latter recognized him and stopped to take his hand, making pleasant inquiries about himself and his legal studies. Before parting Howard said:

"Mr. Heritage, will you be at leisure on Saturday afternoon?"

"I have always plenty of work on hand, but there's nothing I would not be glad to lay aside
if I can be of service to you."

"If you can spare the time I should be pleased to have you drive with me into the country. Say about two o'clock. I will drive around to your room for you."

"Very well. I shall go with pleasure. Good-day."

Saturday afternoon was bright and clear, and as the young men drove along the "river road," as it was called, they found nothing to mar their enjoyment of nature and each other's society. The wash of the loitering stream, along whose banks the road pursued its flexuous course, formed a soft accompaniment to the gay minstrelsy of the orioles and scarlet tanagers; while here and there on the lowlands a cluster of wild-rose bushes were in full bloom, and water-lilies spangled the bosom of the broad, tranquil stream. As they bowled slowly around an arc of the river, their ears were greeted by a perfect pot-pourri of bird-song, and Howard said, with a tentative purpose:

"If nature were always in so gentle a mood, it would be much easier to believe in God than it is. Don't you think so?"

"Perhaps for some minds it would," Heritage replied, "that is, for those who associate only a sort of sensuous pleasure with the thought of God, as if He should have expended his efforts for no other purpose than to make His creatures happy, without reference to their moral character. After a good deal of thought on the subject, I have come to this conclusion: Nature in her tender, joyous moods should stir in us feelings of thankfulness, compassion, love, and so on, while her moods of apparent antagonism and cruelty are intended to call forth the moral qualities of patience, endurance, courage and determination. If nature always soothed us as she does this afternoon, there would be little opportunity for developing our stronger traits of mind and heart. For instance, it requires no effort of the will to glide along this pleasant road to-day, listening to the wash of the river and the songs of the birds;" and the speaker illustrated his assertion by settling back in the carriage, the very picture of comfortable ease-taking.

Howard laughed. "You are certainly a moralist and a philosopher, too," he said. "You Christian thinkers seem to find the solution of every difficulty in the ethical. My sister was lecturing me the other day in pretty much the same strain. Why is it that you lay so much stress on moral considerations?"

"Mr. Wescott, I'm glad you have asked that question," Heritage rejoined, earnestly. "It shows a good deal of penetration on your part. The answer is this: Nothing so arouses and quickens the moral instincts of the soul as the new birth by the Spirit of God, if the work has been thorough. The truly regenerated man lays the main stress on the attainment of the good, and not so much on mere enjoyment, and in that way finds the solution of nearly all the difficulties."

"It may be so in some instances, perhaps in the majority; but—excuse me for saying so, Mr. Heritage—I have known a number of so-called Christians, who seemed to have very feeble moral instincts, if one may judge from their lives."

"Oh, yes," said Heritage, with a smile. "There are pretenders in religion just as there are pettifoggers and shysters in the legal profession."

It was said so good-naturedly, that Howard could not take offence, but broke out into a merry laugh that echoed in the woods beyond the river.

"You are an expert fencer," he said. "But we don't expect quite so much from lawyers as from professors of religion—I mean so high a moral character."

"So much the worse for lawyers, and so much the better for Christianity," replied the other, a smile playing over his mobile features. "A religion that has so high a moral standard, that holds every man to so strict a moral account, carries upon its face the insignia of truth. Wescott, I have been trying to analyze your mental traits, and I feel certain that the high moral cravings of your nature will never be satisfied until God satisfies them, until you accept the Gospel of Christ." Then, feeling that it might be premature to press the subject farther upon the young doubter's attention, he changed the drift of conversation by adding: "But these are rather obtruse themes for a May-day outing. We are in danger of forgetting nature. What a brilliant cluster of wild roses! Will you stop the carriage a moment until I gather a few? How sweetly they blush!" he added, plucking one and pressing it to his lips.

It may seem irrelevant to the theme under consideration, but at sight of the delicately tinted petals, Heritage recalled the wild-rose tint that so frequently clung to the cheeks of Metta Chapman, and a feeling of inexpressible tenderness took possession of his heart. He would see her soon, he reflected. For the present he must give himself up to the entertainment of his friend, for whom he already felt a profound solicitude.

During the drive they discussed many themes of mutual interest, Heritage throwing light on a number of problems that had for years been puzzling his companion; but only one fragment of the conversation need be given. They were approaching the suburbs of the city in the gloaming, when Howard said:

"Everything in nature seems to be controlled by law. You must be aware that many of our most gifted investigators in the physical sciences have been overwhelmed with the evidences of that fact, and have rejected the idea of a supernatural Ruler, who interferes in the least with the natural course of things; hence the theory of evolution. And yet the Bible is full of the supernatural! How do you explain it?"

"Well, by a careful study of sacred history you will find that God seems to have followed this plan, the reasonableness of which will appear presently, I think. Whenever anything new was to be inaugurated, miracles were performed; that is, new forces were introduced, to meet the requirements of God's projects and lift man's thought to the higher purpose, and these were allowed to work His will in harmony with the laws inherent in them, until the time was ripe for another epoch in man's spiritual development. Isn't it true that inspired history—I mean, of course, Biblical history—is divided into various cycles, and at the advent of each there were special revelations of divine power?"

"Well—yes—come to think of it, you are right."

"When Christ came," pursued Heritage, "the so-called Christian era was introduced, and there was a special display of superhuman agencies, both good and evil. They were necessary to attest Christ's power and Messiahship. But He always warned his followers not to rest in these outward demonstrations, but to lay hold on the spiritual truths of which they were the symbols. Do you see how philosophical it all is, Wescott? The advent of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost ushered in the spiritual dispensation, in which we are now living. Men have been lifted to a higher spiritual plane by the Gospel, and having received spiritual witness through the new birth of their acceptance with God, and of His power and love, they do not need miracles in the natural world to bolster their faith."

"Wouldn't a prodigy now and then advance the cause of religion?" asked Howard, with a smile.

"If miracles were performed at everybody's desire or caprice, they would soon lose their value, and I think God has wisely withheld them," rejoined Heritage.

A brief silence ensued, during which the young doubter's thoughts were in a tumult. "Mr. Heritage, how is one to get that 'spiritual witness' which you spoke of a moment ago?" he questioned at length, in subdued tones.

"My dear Wescott, only in one way—by going to the One who is mighty to save, as the gospel directs. I thank you for this drive. Good night;" and taking the young man by the hand in a warm, brotherly clasp, he stepped from the carriage and walked away in the gathering darkness.

It was a dexterous parting shot, and Howard drove home in a more humble and tractable frame than he had been since the day on which his college would-be mentor, had put the leaf of doubt into his heart. Happily nothing occurred to ruffle his feelings, so that he went to church the next morning in a very receptive state, and obtained much help from the service. Before the Sunday-school closed a proposition was made to have a meeting of the principal singers in the afternoon for rehearsing some music that had just been purchased. When opportunity was given for all who favored the plan to raise their hands, Howard stealthily glanced across the room toward Miss More, noticed that her hand had gone up. That gloved hand! Would he ever dare to clasp and tell its dear owner of the emotions had kindled within him.

"Wescott," whispered Heritage, who sat the young man's side, "I have observed that you have a bass voice of excellent timbre. Will you come to the rehearsal? I shall be there myself."

"Then I shall come," responded Howard, thought of meeting Addie More tossing his heart in a wild storm of emotion. The rehearsal of the afternoon was about half over when a brief intermission was granted by the precentor for rest, and a little consultation of several points of the music. Howard and Heritage sat side by side, conversing in tones, though the former was somewhat preoccupied. Addie More was standing alone for a moment in the opposite aisle. An uncontrollable desire seized Howard. Now was his opportunity. At all hazards he must carry out his chief purpose that had brought him there.

"Heritage," he whispered, huskily, his trembling, "will you do me a favor?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Please introduce me to—Miss More."

The author hesitated a moment, flushed slightly, and then said: "All right, Wescott. Come along."

In a minute the formula of presentation was over, and Howard stood holding that gloved hand in his and looking down into the hazel-tinted blue eyes of Addie More. It was a thrilling moment, a crisis in his life, and his heart pounded like a piston in his bosom. It was "the joy of meeting not unmixed with pain." However, as he sat by her side during the rehearsal, a thought troubled him:

"Why did Heritage hesitate when I asked him to introduce me to Miss More?"

* * *

"Nothing could have made me feel more easy for Howard," said Mrs. Bollis to her band on their way home from the evening vice.

"Why, what do you know about the girl?" "Nothing; and that's precisely the trouble. I have never met her except at church. I know nothing about the family or her life, though I've often intended to call. I only know that she lives somewhere on the North Side."

"Oh, fie! Bother a woman's foolishness and apprehensions," said the lawyer, good-naturedly. "Howard's able to take care of himself. Trust a young fellow with such a legal mind as he's got, for that. Besides, who cares whether the girl's rich or poor? One can see, with magnifying glass, that she's been well brought up, and that's the main thing."

"But she's no member of the church, is she?"

"Neither is your unworthy husband," laughed Mrs. Bollis, a genial smile playing over her ruddy face. "Is that a fatal objection?"

"Well, it's your one fault," said the lawyer tenderly. "I believe you are honorable in your dealings with your fellow-men, and I believe you are kind and good to me; but why should you treat your Maker worse than you do me?"

(To be Continued.)

STRANGE COINCIDENCE.

Instances are given in the Bible using His creatures of the lower His messengers, as when the ass Balaam, and the ravens fed Elihe fish brought the tribute money, which aroused Peter's memory. A instance is on record and its narra- been attended by a curious coin- A German pastor says: "One during the Bible class, which I al- d to enliven by the introduction of anecdotes, I related from Schul- and New, the story of a man crossing a field one evening, on o commit a sin in a neighboring eard in the field the regularly-re- y of a quail, which seemed to say, art thou going? Where art thou This so struck him, that he aced his sin, honestly repented, and is sinful ways. I related the story mory, and concluded my class at hour. I had scarcely reached my en I heard someone following me with quick and heavy steps. There lock at the door of my room, and could say 'Come in' a man of the ho had always been an inveterate d's word, entered. With angry nce he came up and asked, 'Who that story about me, Mr. Parson? ow.' I inquired in surprise, 'What mean, my good man?' 'Why, you ll enough. You related to-night a whole congregation what occur- a few days ago about the quail.' good man, did that happen? Do t that anyone told me about you?' eed. Don't keep it back. I will o told you.' I stood amazed and d. Without saying another word I fetched Schubert's work, op- e page and gave it to the man to t first he did not know what to e the book—he was boiling over e. He could scarcely hold the d told me, in a voice choked with t the very same thing had happen- when, with like intent, he was the field in the evening, and had quail's cry. He who aroused through the crowing of a cock, o cases had used as His instrument a quail. This led to the man's n."

MARKABLE PRESENTIMENT.

Recent Gospel address, Captain Daw- tioned the following incident of a otion to his mother: "A few years e was a terrible accident in the ne of those tall factory chimneys n. Before it fell, there had been in the works about the danger of e was a little lad who lived with er—a widow—and supported her ork in this factory. He woke up ing and said he could not work 'for,' he added, 'I am sure that is coming down.' It was one of ange instances of 'coming events eir shadows before.' I read this ly papers, and it was stated that at et when the mother told the story, e not a dry eye in the room. She with the lad and said, 'You must l he replied, 'I don't want to.' At said, 'You must go, my boy, the e.' Without another word, con- oy a loving mother's heart, the lad d went out in the darkness of the saying, 'Mother, I will go for he never saw him again until he ed home dead on a stretcher. Who those who call themselves by the Christ will rise up and say, 'Lord will go for Thee.'"

A POINTED REBUKE.

PROFESSOR in a college was noted is fellow-teachers for his habit of ig privately the young men in his n the subject of their personal re- o Christ. "Do they not resent eals as an impertinence?" asked is fellow-professors. "No," was e. "Nothing is of such interest to as his own soul and its condition. never resent words of warning or if they are prompted by genuine feeling. When I was a young man," he added, "I felt as you do. My wife's cousin, a young fellow not yet of age, lived in our house for six months. My dread of med- dling was such that I never asked him to be present at family worship, or spoke to him on the subject of religion. He fell into the company of a wild set, and was rapidly go- ing to the bad. When I reasoned with him, I spoke of Christ. 'Do you call yourself a Christian?' he asked, assuming an aston- ished look. 'I hope so,' I replied. 'But you are not. If you were, He must be your best friend. Yet I have lived in your house for six months and you have never once named His name to me. No, He is nothing to you.' I never have forgotten the rebuke."

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is a peculiar medicine. It is carefully prepared from Sarsaparilla, Dandelion, Mandrake, Dock, Pipsissowa, Juniper Berries, and other well-known and valuable vegetable remedies, by a peculiar combination, proportion and process, giving to Hood's Sarsaparilla curative power not possessed by other medicines. It effects remarkable cures where other preparations fail.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the best blood purifier before the public. It eradicates every impurity, and cures Scrofula, Salt Rheum, Boils, Pimples, all Humors, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Indigestion, General Debility, Catarrh, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Complaints, overcomes that tired feel- ing, creates an appetite, and builds up the system.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Has met peculiar and unparalleled success at home. Such has become its popularity in Lowell, Mass., where it is made, that whole neighbor- hoods are taking it at the same time. Lowell druggists sell more of Hood's Sarsaparilla than of all other sarsaparillas or blood purifiers. Sold by druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

Unlike any Other. Originated by an Old Family Physician. THINK OF IT.

In use over 40 YEARS in one Family.

DR. J. S. JOHNSON & CO.—It is sixty years since I first learned of this now celebrated remedy for the com- mon ills of life—Johnson's Anodyne Liniment; for more than forty years I have used it in my family. I say (unasked by you) I regard it one of the best and safest remedies that can be found, used internal or external, in all cases it is claimed to relieve or cure. O. H. INGALLS, Dea. 2d Baptist Ch., Bangor, Maine. Should have Johnson's Anodyne Liniment in the house for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cuts, Bruises, Cramps and Pains. Delays may cost a life. Relieves Summer Complaints like magic. Price, 35 cts. post-paid; 6 bot- tles, $2. Express paid. J. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass.

DO YOU WRITE?

The Nellie Bly Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. A perfect pen—as good as the best, except that no gold pen is used. Useful to office men, collectors, salesmen, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Sample sent to any address on receipt of price. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal discounts.

WM. E. PIAGET & CO., 301 Broadway, New York.

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

New York City, 21 East 14th Street. METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. The most select musical school in the United States. Exceptional advantages: Voice, Piano-forte, Organ, Violin, Harmony and Languages. Successful musicians and eminent teachers comprise the faculty—all actual employment at the Conservatory. Prominent among them are: Dudley Buck, Albert R. Parsons, Director Piano-forte Department, Harry Rowe Shelley, Louis Arthur Russell, George M. Greene. Applicants without musical talent not accepted. Send for circular. R. W. Greene, Gen'l Man'r. C. B. Hawley, Musical Dir.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING." SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cts. a bottle

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Not True

sends you something in place of Pearline, the honest thing to do is—send it back.

"The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

That's what you ought to know about the thing you wash with. What good soap doesn't hurt, Pearline cannot. That's only part of the truth. Pearline washes and cleans without the rubbing and scrubbing that wear things out—without the work that makes women old. Half your labor is spared by it; twice the work is done with it; time and money are saved by it. "Nothing but the truth" is the best policy for us; "nothing but Pearline" is the best policy for you; but perhaps you use Pearline. Millions do.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, the honest thing to do is—send it back.

173

JAMES PYLE, New York.

LADIES!

Use Only BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING on your Boots and Shoes.

Awarded highest honors at

Phila., 1876 Frankfort, 1881
Berlin, 1877 Amsterdam, 1883
Paris, 1878 New Orleans, 94-5
Melbourne, 1880 Paris, 1889

and wherever exhibited.

Paris Medal on every bottle.

Beware of Imitations.

"If you have the world's wealth you have the world's ease." There's great comfort in a house cleaned with

SAPOLIO.

All housewives use it. Try a cake.

TYPEWRITERS.

Largest like establishment in the world. First-class Second-hand Instruments at half new prices. Unprejudiced advice given on all makes. Machines sold on monthly payments. Any Instrument manufactured shipped, privilege to examine. EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Wholesale prices to dealers. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

TYPEWRITER HEADQUARTERS, 70 Broadway, New York. 144 La Salle St., Chicago.

WINNOWN SONGS By Ira D. Sankey, Is the latest, largest strongest, cheapest and best Sunday-school Song Book published. Price 35 cents per copy in any quantity, expressage not prepaid. If by mail 5 cents per copy additional.

Biglow & Main, New York and Chicago. The John Church Co., Cincinnati & New York.

FRUIT DIET Is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds, in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 777 Broadway, New York City.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts. If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address. CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

WHY DO MOTHERS

put stiff corsets on their CROWING CHILDREN? We beg of you don't do it but BE SURE TO BUY FERRIS' GOOD SENSE

CORSET WAISTS.

THOUSANDS NOW IN USE. Best for Health, Economy and Beauty.

BUTTONS at front instead of CLASPS. RING BUCKLE at hip for Hose supporters. Tape-fastened Buttons—won't pull off. Cord-Edge Button Holes—won't wear out. FIT ALL AGES—Infants to Adults. Sold by Leading RETAILERS everywhere.

Send for Circular, FERRIS BROS.,

Manufacturers,

341 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK.

MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO, WHOLESALE WESTERN AGENTS.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY. DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

Patented 1879-1885 1885-1886 No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Gracious and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine. Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular. THE McDOWELL CO. 6 West 14th Street, New York City.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and that their machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

The Great CHURCH LIGHT

Frink's Patent Reflectors for Gas, Oil, or Electric give the most powerful, softest, cheapest, and best light known for Churches, Stores, Banks, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular & estimate. A liberal discount to churches & the trade. Don't be deceived by cheap imitations. I. P. FRINK, 651 Pearl St., N.Y.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores and Residences.

H. S. NORTROP, 18 Rose Street, New York.

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Talmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Persons preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

UNDER ORDERS.

We know not what is expedient,
But we may know what is right,
And we need never grope in darkness,
If we look to Heaven for light.

Down deep in the hold of the vessel
The ponderous engine lies,
And faithfully there the engineer
His labor steadily plies.

He knows not the course of the vessel,
He knows not the way it should go;
He minds his simple duty,
And keeps the fires a-glow.

He knows not whether the billows,
The bark may overwhelm;
He knows and obeys the orders
Of the pilot at the helm.

And so, in the wearisome journey
Over life's troubled sea,
I know not the way I am going,
But Jesus shall pilot me.

I see not the rocks and the quicksands,
For my sight is dull and dim,
But I know that Christ is my captain,
And I take my orders from Him.

Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth,
Speak peace to my anxious soul,
And help me to feel that all my ways
Are under Thy wise control:

That He who cares for the lily,
And heeds the sparrow's fall,
Shall tenderly lead His loving child;
For He made and loveth all.

And so, when weary and baffled,
And I know not which way to go,
I know that He can guide me,
And 'tis all that I need to know.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Do not put off taking a medicine. Numerous little ailments, if neglected, will soon break up the system. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla now, to expel disease and give you strength and appetite.

Those who cannot visit the seaside may have their physical system invigorated and their tired brain refreshed by using Ditman's Celebrated Sea Salt.

The latest and best Imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also Imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY.

THE supreme love to Christ, greater than that for parents and friends, which He requires of His followers, is not tested in these days in Christian lands; but even now there are countries in which that test is applied. One such case is described by the Rev. Robert Hunter, formerly a missionary in India. He says: "A youth called Ruthnum wished to be received into the Mission House, with the view of receiving baptism. As he was not more than fourteen, it was felt that he could not be permitted to remain, in consequence of a law forbidding missionaries to receive any one under that age against the wishes of their parents, so he had to return to his relations. They, speedily perceiving his leanings towards Christianity, had him removed from Madras and sent to a place some hundred miles off, in the South of India. Not long afterwards, he reappeared at the Mission House, quite drenched with sea water, and again begged to be taken in. On being asked how he had traveled, and why he was so wet, he told a thoroughly romantic and quite trustworthy story. He had escaped from the village and managed to elude those who started in pursuit of him, on one occasion successfully concealing himself in one side of a town while they were in the other. On reaching Pondicherry, he had pledged his gold earrings, and with the money thus obtained, hired a catamaran, and boldly launching on the ocean, sailed 100 miles to Madras, being for the fifty hours of his adventurous voyage without sleep and without fresh water. But what was to be done with Ruthnum now that he had come? It would have been very hard to send him away again. It was, therefore, resolved at all hazards to grant his request. No legal proceedings followed, and he was baptized."

WASHED FROM THE ROCK.

A SAD fatality which occurred in Scotland, was described by Mr. D. McLauchlan, who used it as an illustration to point his appeal to his hearers to make sure that they were united to Christ by a living faith, and were being kept by Him. He said: "Two years ago two men, a wealthy man and his cashier, were bathing in the River Forth. They stood upon a rock, and on every side of them was deep water, but they felt quite safe; their feet were planted on a rock. A steamboat came out from Leith, and proceeded down the river with a party of ladies and gentlemen, whom this person had invited to meet him at his country-house. As the steamer passed the rock where the two men stood, she caused the water to sweep over it, and in its impetuosity it carried the men with it. Neither could swim, and both sank. The guests were seated round the table, and only awaited the arrival of their host to commence the feast, but he came not. At length anxiety was aroused, and a search made, when they traced him to where he had sunk, and soon his lifeless body and that of his companion were washed ashore. These men perished because they were not fixed firmly on the rock."

A CHILD VICTIM.

AN incident reported by Missionary R. Darby, who is laboring on the Congo, shows how inhuman heathenism is, and how remorseless are its cruelties. He says: "A man died near the station where I work. The people, as usual, concluded that some witch had caused his death by her spell, so they gathered together to try to find the witch. They came to the conclusion that the wife of the deceased was the guilty woman. They took her, cut her head off, threw her body into the river, buried the head in the ground until the flesh decayed, and stuck the skull on the roof of the house. Fathers, listen! mothers, listen! and then think of the darkness of Africa. That man and woman had a little baby that could scarcely walk. There was not a man or woman in all these towns that would give the child a bit of bread or a drink of water; not a soul would allow it to come into their house. They left the poor little thing outside, and I saw it wasting away. I said to one of my boys, 'Whose child is that?' 'It is the child of a witch,' he said. I came home. I thought to myself, 'Well, I have been a good many different things in work, and I think I will just turn nurse now.' I thought I could not see that child starved to death. I went off into the town to buy it. They told me they had taken the poor little innocent baby and flung it into the river to the crocodiles!"

THE FALL OF TWO BROTHERS.

A sad story is related by Mr. Hamilton, the Scottish evangelist of two brothers whom he knew. It teaches an impressive lesson on the fearful power of the appetite for intoxicating liquor even over those who have thought that they were emancipated from its degrading bonds. He says:

"I knew two young men in Glasgow, the sons of a wealthy citizen, who were much given to over-indulgence in strong drink. I was by their father's side when he died, and at his request promised to do all I could for his sons. To each of them he left an income of $2500 a year, besides his business, which he left to them jointly. By a mighty effort one of them drew himself free from the drink, and became a total abstainer, and for a short time nothing could have surpassed his home in joy and comfort, but he took ill, not seriously, but with some slight disorder of the throat. The doctor thought the best thing for him was to gargle his throat with claret. The patient did not like the idea but consulted his friends, who strongly recommended him to follow the doctor's advice, and at last he was persuaded to do so. He bought a bottle of claret, and was about to measure out the required quantity, but the terrible craving, that had been so long dormant, awoke, and instead of pouring part of its contents into the glass, he raised the bottle to his lips, where it remained until it was emptied. It seemed as if the enemy only needed this to make it irresistible, and was the stronger for his prolonged abstinence. It goaded the man to excess. He drank incessantly, and in a few days died of delirium tremens. The other brother was never able even to stop drinking for a time; from his father's death his course was steadily downward. He drank his income, he drank his capital, he drank his business. He drank until not a penny was left, then he drank with any person whom he could persuade to treat him. I have taken him from the cheap lodging-house, and put him in a respectable lodging that he might have another chance; but drink had its fell talons upon him and tore him down. Drink he could not do without; and for drink he sold his soul and his body, dying, like his brother, a drunkard's death, and going to a drunkard's eternity. Oh, drink, thou most efficient and destructive weapon of the evil one, if we could but wrest thee from the hands of the enemy of man, half his power would be destroyed.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.

When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.

When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

COOL MUSIC BOOKS

No, not Cool, but filled with that Restful, Harmonious, Soothing Music, which helps one wonderfully to Endure Extremes of Weather, Hot or Cold.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Piano Classics. Vol. 1. 44 pieces, - - $1
Piano Classics. Vol. 2. 31 pieces, - - 1
Classical Pianist. 42 pieces, - - 1
Popular Dance Music. 66 pieces, - - 1
Sabbath Day Music. 38 pieces, - - 1
Operatic Piano Collection. 19 operas, - 1
Young Players' Popular Coll. 51 pieces, - 1
Classic 4-Hand Collection. 19 duets, - 1
Old Familiar Dances. 100 pieces, 50 cts

VOCAL.

On the whole, the most popular collection of light, merry, company entertaining songs, is College Songs. 82 bright melodies. 50 cts. Nearly 200,000 sold.

Popular Song Collection. 37 songs, - $1
Choice Sacred Solos. 34 songs, - 1
Choice Sacred Solos. Low Voice. 40 songs, - 1
Song Classics. Sop. or Ten. Vol. 1. 50 songs, 1
Song Classics. Sop. or Ten. Vol. 2. 39 songs, 1
Song Classics. Low Voice. 47 songs, - 1
Classic Bar and Bass Songs. 33 songs, - 1
Classic Tenor Songs. 36 songs, - 1
Classic Vocal Duets. 26 duets, - 1
Good Old Songs We Used to Sing. 115 sgs, 1

Send on your $, and receive book by return mail.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.
C. H. DITSON & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P. O. Box 289, 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York.

Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Complaints, children or adults. It is a medicine but will be retained & sustain life when everything else fails. 4 sizes 35 cts. up.

Rubifoam

A PERFECT LIQUID DENTIFRICE
DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED.

ITS USE INSURES
BEAUTIFUL
CLEAN TEETH.

PUT UP BY
E. W. HOYT
& CO.
LOWELL, MASS.

Price

To Mother

If for any reason you cannot give your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is typically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly of milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how made or of what it is composed. Facts told to any intelligent parent would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of giving any other Food, do not fail to ask us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Year by Marion Harland, which also contains a minute description of Lactopreparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food, their mode of manufacture. Send for it.

Read the above pamphlet and ask your Physician which Food is the nearest approach to mother's milk. REED & CARNRICK, New York.

FACIAL BLEMISHES

The largest establishment in the world for the treatment of the face. Hair and Scalp, Krætz, Warts, Superficial Herpes, Marks, Moth, Freckles, Red Nose, Red V. Skin, Acne, Pimples, Head, Barber's Itch, Ringworm, Powder Markings, Ingrown Hairs, Facial Deformities, Hollow or Sunken Cheeks, Consultation free at all hours. $25 per session. All skin and scalp diseases treated, and their treatment, set to any address on receipt of JOHN H. WOODFORD, Dermatologist, 125 W. 42d St., New York. FACIAL SOAP, at Druggists or by mail, 50c.

3 MONTHS FOR 10c
To secure at once for our popular magazine NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING, THE GREATER HOME JOURNALS, 25,000 new subscribers AT will send it three months for only 10c. Registration, $1.00. NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING 36-page magazine, with a handsome colored cover. It is complete on all home subjects, P. COOKING RECEPTS, Kitchen and Dining Room Decorations, Erickson's Brae, Needle Work, Shows of Travel and Serials by our best authors, F. Notes, &c. Subscribe now, as you will never have an offer again. Address, National Housekeeping, Cortland Street, New York City.

THE SOUND DISCS

a larger per cent. of cases cured than similar devices combined. The discs are as glasses are to the eye, but invisibly. Worn month after month, out removal. H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, Conn.

GARFIELD TEA Cures Colds and Sick Headaches. Free samples at all druggists or 319 W. 45th St.

WHAT Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia think of Washington and Seattle's Metropolitan Police. Eschelman, Llewellyn & Co., Seattle.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 32. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE McALL MISSION IN FRANCE—Portrait of Rev. R. W. McAll and Picture of his New Gospel Boat.
THE LORD'S PRAYER IN LAOS. (Facsimile.)
THEIR PLACES. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Combination Wedding, Etc.
TEN LEPERS. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Lafayette at Home, Etc.
THE DAY OF RAPTURE.
ONLY ONE REMEMBERED. A Story of the S. S. Text.
PICTURE OF THE CATHEDRAL OF BUENOS AYRES, Scene of the Recent Revolutionary Conflict.
PORTRAIT OF JUAREZ CELMAN, President of the Argentine Republic.
A SUMMARY OF THE EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THREE IMPORTANT PRECEPTS. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)
A Professional Witch Converted—A Little Peacemaker—An Unpopular Officer—A Surprised Prisoner, Etc.
PICTURE OF THE BROOKLYN TABERNALE IN COURSE OF ERECTION.

REV. R. W. McALL AND THE McALL MISSION IN FRANCE.

1. Going on Board the Boat—2. The Service in the Cabin—3. The Gospel Boat—4. A Recognition on the Street—5. The New York Gospel Hall in Paris.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

THE WATERING-PLACES.

"Come ye yourselves apart unto a desert place and rest awhile." Mark 6: 31.

The Necessity of Rest—The Crowded Summer Resorts—The Temptations they Offer—To Leave Piety Behind—To Suspend Sabbath Observance—The Tainted Atmosphere—The Racing Mania—The Horse in the Bible—Invariable Moral Deterioration of Frequenters of Races—Temptations to Unhealthy Habits—To Hasty Marriages—To the Perusal of Pernicious Literature—To Drink Intoxicating Beverages—The Unfailing Watering Place—The Fountains of Living Waters.

HERE Christ advises His apostles to take a vacation. They have been living an excited as well as a useful life, and He advises that they get out into the country. I am glad that for longer or shorter time, multitudes of our people will have summer vacation. The railway trains are being laden with passengers and baggage on their way to the mountains and the sea-shore. Multitudes of our citizens are packing their trunks for a restorative absence.

The city heats are pursuing the people with torch and fear of sunstroke. The long silent halls of sumptuous hotels are all abuzz with excited arrivals. The crystalline surface of Win-nipiseogee is shattered with the stroke of steamer, laden with excursionists. The antlers of Adirondack deer rattle under the shot of city sportsmen. The trout make fatal snaps at the hook of adroit sportsmen and toss their spotted brilliance into the game-basket. Already the baton of the orchestral leader taps the music-stand on the hotel green, and American life puts on festal array, and the rumbling of the tenpin alley, and the crack of the ivory balls on the green-baized billiard tables, and the jolting of the bar-room goblets, and the explosive uncorking of champagne bottles, and the whirl and the rustle of the ball-room dance, and the clattering hoofs of the race-courses, attest that the season for the great American watering-places is fairly inaugurated. Music—flute and drum and cornet-a-piston and clapping cymbals—will wake the echoes of the mountains.

Glad I am that fagged-out American life for the most part will have an opportunity to rest, and that nerves racked and destroyed will find a Bethesda.

I Believe in Watering-Places.

Let not the commercial firm begrudge the clerk, or the employer the journeyman, or the patient the physician, or the church its pastor, a season of inoccupation. Luther used to sport with his children; Edmund Burke used to caress his favorite horse; Thomas Chalmers, in the dark hours of the Church's disruption, played kite for recreation—as I was told by his own daughter—and the busy Christ said to the busy apostles: "Come ye apart awhile into the desert and rest yourselves." And I have observed that they who do not know how to rest do not know how to work.

But I have to declare this truth to-day, that some of our fashionable watering-places are the temporal and eternal destruction of "a multitude that no man can number," and amid the congratulations of this season and the prospect of the departure of many of you for the country I must utter a note of warning—plain, earnest, and unmistakable.

The first temptation that is apt to hover in this direction is to leave your piety all at home. You will send the dog and cat and canary bird to be well cared for somewhere else; but the temptation will be to leave your religion in the room with the blinds down and the door bolted, and then you will come back in the autumn to find that it is starved and suffocated, lying stretched on the rug stark dead. There is no surplus of piety at the watering-places. I never knew anyone to grow very rapidly in grace at the fashionable summer resort. It is generally the case that the Sabbath is more of a carousal than any other day, and there are Sunday walks and Sunday rides and Sunday excursions.

Elders and deacons and ministers of religion who are entirely consistent at home, sometimes when the Sabbath dawns on them at Niagara Falls or the White Mountains take the day to themselves. If they go to the church, it is apt to be a sacred parade, and the discourse, instead of being a plain talk about the soul, is apt to be what is called a crack sermon—that is, some discourse picked out of the effusions of the year as the one most adapted to excite admiration; and in those churches, from the way the ladies hold their fans, you know that they are not so much impressed with the heat as with the picturesqueness of half-disclosed features. Four puny souls stand in the organ-loft and squall a tune that nobody knows, and worshippers, with two thousand dollars' worth of diamonds on the right hand, drop a cent into the poor-box, and then the benediction is pronounced and the farce is ended.

A Tainted Atmosphere.

The air is bewitched with "the world, the flesh, and the devil." There are Christians who in three or four weeks in such a place have had such terrible rents made in their Christian robe that they had to keep darning it until Christmas to get it mended! The health of a great many people makes an annual visit to some mineral spring an absolute necessity; but, take your Bible along with you, and take an hour for secret prayer every day, though you be surrounded by guffaw and saturnalia. Keep holy the Sabbath, though they denounce you as a bigoted Puritan. Stand off from these institutions which propose to imitate on this side the water the iniquities of olden-time Baden-Baden. Let your moral and your immortal health keep pace with your physical recuperation, and remember that all the waters of Hathorne and sulphur and chalybeate springs can not do you so much good as the mineral, healing, perennial flood that breaks forth from the "Rock of Ages." This may be your last summer. If so, make it a fit vestibule of heaven.

Another temptation around nearly all our watering-places is

The Horse-Racing Business.

We all admire the horse. There needs to be a redistribution of coronets among the brute creation. For ages the lion has been called the king of beasts. I knock off its coronet and put the crown upon the horse, in every way nobler, whether in shape or spirit or sagacity or intelligence or affection or usefulness. He is semi-human, and knows how to reason on a small scale. The centaur of olden times, part horse and part man, seems to be a suggestion of the fact that the horse is something more than a beast.

Job sets forth his strength, his beauty, his majesty, the panting of his nostril, the pawing of his hoof, and his enthusiasm for the battle. What Rosa Bonheur did for the cattle, and what Landseer did for the dog, Job, with mightier pencil, does for the horse. Eighty-eight times does the Bible speak of him. He comes into every kingly procession, and into every great occasion and into every triumph. It is very evident that Job and David and Isaiah and Ezekiel and Jeremiah and John were very fond of the horse. He came into much of their imagery. A red horse—that meant war; a black horse—that meant famine; a pale horse—that meant death; a white horse—that meant victory.

The Universal Favorite.

As the Bible makes a favorite of the horse, the patriarch and the prophet and the evangelist and the apostle, stroking his sleek hide, and patting his rounded neck, and tenderly lifting his exquisitely formed hoof, and listening with a thrill to the champ of his bit, so all great natures in all ages have spoken of him in encomiastic terms. Virgil in his Georgics almost seems to plagiarize from the description of Job. The Duke of Wellington would not allow any one irreverently to touch his old war-horse, Copenhagen, on whom he had ridden fifteen hours without dismounting at Waterloo; and when old Copenhagen died, his master ordered a military salute fired over his grave. John Howard showed that he did not exhaust all his sympathies in pitying the human race, for when sick he writes home: "Has my old chaise-horse become sick or spoiled?"

But we do not think that the speed of the horse should be cultured at the expense of human degradation. Horse-races, in olden times, were under the ban of Christian people, and in our day the same institution has come up under fictitious names, and it is called a "Summer Meeting," almost suggestive of positive religious exercises. And it is called an "Agricultural Fair," suggestive of everything that is improving in the art of farming. But under these deceptive titles are the same cheating and the same betting, the same drunkenness and the same vagabondage and the same abominations that were to be found under the old Horse-Racing System.

I never knew a man yet who could give himself to the pleasures of the turf for a long reach of time, and not be battered in morals. They hook up their spanking team, and put on their sporting-cap, and light their cigar, and take the reins, and dash down the road to perdition. The great day at Saratoga, and Long Branch, and Cape May, and nearly all the other watering-places, is the day of the races. The hotels are thronged, nearly every kind of equipage is taken up at an almost fabulous price, and there are many respectable people mingling with jockeys, and gamblers, and libertines, and foul-mouthed men and flashy women. The bartender stirs up the brandy-smash. The bets run high. The greenhorns, supposing all is fair, put in their money soon enough to lose it. Three weeks before the race takes place the struggle is decided, and the men in the secret know on which steed to bet their money. The two men on the horses riding around long before arranged who shall beat.

The Moral Stakes.

Leaning from the stand or from the carriage are men and women so absorbed in the struggle of bone and muscle and mettle that they make a grand harvest for the pickpockets, who carry off the pocket-books and portemonnaies. Men looking on see only two horses with two riders flying around the ring; but there is many a man on that stand whose honor and domestic happiness and fortune—white mane, white foot, white flank—are in the ring, racing with inebriety, and with fraud, and with profanity, and with ruin—black neck, black foot, black flank. Neck and neck they go in that moral Epsom.

Ah, my friends, have nothing to do with horse-racing dissipations this summer. Long ago the English government got through looking to the turf for the dragoon and light-cavalry horse. They found the turf depreciates the stock, and it is yet worse for men. Thomas Hughes, the member of Parliament and the author, known all the world over, hearing that a new turf enterprise was being started in this country, wrote a letter, in which he said: "Heaven help you, then; for of all the cankers of our old civilization there is nothing in this country approaching in in rascality holding its head high, to this belauded institution of the British turf." Another famous sportsman writes: "How many fine domains have been shared among these hosts of rapacious sharks during the last two hundred years; and unless the system be altered, how many more are doomed to fall into the same gulf!" The Duke of Hamilton, through his horse-racing proclivities, in three years got through his entire fortune of $350,000, and I will say that some of you are being undermined by it. With the bull-fights of Spain and the bear-baitings of the pit may the Lord God annihilate the infamous and accursed horse-racing of England and America.

Unblushing Meanness,

I go further, and speak of another temptator that hovers over the watering-places; and this is the temptation to sacrifice physical strength. The modern Bethesda was meant to recuperate the physical health; and yet how many come from the watering-places, their health absolutely destroyed! New York and Brooklyn idiots boasting of having imbibed twenty glasses of Congress water before breakfast. Families accustomed to going to bed at ten o'clock at night tossing until one or two o'clock in the morning. Dyspeptics, usually very cautious about their health, mingling ice-creams, and lemons, and lobster-salads, and cocoa-nuts, until the astric juices lift up all their voices of lamentation and protest. Delicate women and brainless young men chaszeing themselves into vertigo and catalepsy. Thousands of men and women coming back from our watering-places in the autumn with the

Foundations Laid for Ailments

that will last them all their life long. You now as well as I do that this is the truth. In the summer you say to your good health: Good-bye, I am going to have a good time for a little while. I will be very glad to see you again in the autumn." Then in the autumn, when you are hard at work in your office, or shop, or counting-room, Good Health will come and say: "Good-bye, I am going." You say: "Where are you going?" "Oh," says Good Health, "I am going to take a vacation!" It is a poor rule that will not work both ways, and our good health will leave you choleric and plenetic and exhausted. You coquetted with your good health in the summer-time, and your good health is coquetting with you in the winter-time. A fragment of Paul's charge to the jailer could be an appropriate inscription for the hotel-register in every watering-place: "Do thyself no harm."

Flirtation.

Another temptation hovering around the watering-place is to the formation of hasty and fee-long alliances. The watering places are responsible for more of the domestic infelicities of this country than all the other things combined. Society is so artificial there that no sure judgment of character can be formed. Those who form companionships amid such circumstances go into a lottery where there are twenty blanks to one prize. In the severe tug of life you want more than glitter and splash. Life is not a ball-room where the music decides the step, and bow and prance and graceful swing of long trail can make up for strong common sense. You may as well go among the gayly painted yachts of a summer regatta to find as many vessels as to go among the light spray of the summer watering-place to find character that can stand the test of the great struggle of human life. Ah, in the battle of life you want a stronger weapon than a lace fan or a croquet mallet! The load of life is so heavy that in order to draw it, you want a team stronger than he made up of a masculine grasshopper and a feminine butterfly.

If there is any man in the community that excites my contempt, and that excites the contempt of every man and woman, it is the soft-headed, soft-headed fop, who, perfumed until the air is actually sick, spends his summer in killing attitudes, and waving sentimental lies, and talking infinitesimal nothings, and adding his heaven in the set of

A Lavender Kid-Glove,

as tight as an Inquisition, two hours of consummate skill exhibited in the tie of a cravat, his conversation made up of "Ah's" and "Oh's" and "He-hee's." It would take five hundred of them stewed down to make a teaspoonful of calves-foot jelly. There is only one counterpart to such a man as that, and that is the frothy young woman at the watering-place, her conversation made up of French moonshine; what she has on her head only equalled by what she has on her back; useless ever since she was born, and to be useless until she is dead: and what they will do with her in the next world I do not know, except to set her upon the banks of the River of Life for all eternity to look sweet! God intends us to admire music and fair faces and graceful step, but amid the heartless influences of our modern-watering places, beware how you make life-long covenants!

Another temptation that will hover over the watering-place is that of baneful literature. Almost every one starting off for the summer takes some reading matter. It is a book out of the library or off the book stand, or bought of the boy hawking books through the cars. I really believe there is more pestiferous trash read among the intelligent classes in July and August than in all the other ten months of the year. Men and women who at home would not be satisfied with a book that was not really sensible, I found sitting on hotel-piazas or under the trees reading books the index of which would make them blush if they knew that you knew what the book was.

"Oh," they say, "you must have intellectual recreation!" Yes. There is no need that you take along into a watering-place "Hamilton's Metaphysics" or some thunderous discourse on the eternal decrees. There are many Easy Books that are Good.

You might as well say: "I propose now to give a little rest to my digestive organs; and, instead of eating heavy meat and vegetables, I will for a little while take lighter food—a little strychnine and a few grains of ratsbane." Literary poison in August is as bad as literary poison in December. Mark that. Do not let the frogs and the lice of a corrupt printing-press jump and crawl into your Saratoga trunk or White Mountain valise.

Would it not be an awful thing for you to be struck with lightning some day when you had in your hand one of these paper-covered romances—the hero a Parisian roue, the heroine an unprincipled flirt—chapters in the book that you would not read to your children at the rate of $100 a line! Throw out that stuff from your summer baggage. Are there not good books that are easy to read—books of congenial history, books of pure fun, books of poetry ringing with merry canto, books of fine engravings, books that will rest the mind as well as purify the heart and elevate the whole life? My hearers, there will not be a hour between this and the day of your death when you can afford to read a book lacking in moral principle.

Another temptation hovering all around our watering-places is

The Intoxicating Beverage.

I am told that it is becoming more and more fashionable for women to drink. I care not how well a woman may dress, if she has taken enough of wine to flush her cheek and put glassiness on her eyes, she is intoxicated. She may be handed into a $2500 carriage, and have diamonds enough to confound the Tiffanys—she is intoxicated. She may be a graduate of a great institute, and the daughter of some man in danger of being nominated for the Presidency—she is drunk. You may have a larger vocabulary than I have, and you may say in regard to her that she is "convivial," or she is "merry," or she is "festive," or she is "exhilarated," but you cannot with all your garlands of verbiage cover up the plain fact that it is an old-fashioned case of drunk.

Now, the watering-places are full of temptations to men and women to tittle. At the close of the tenpin or billiard-game they tittle. At the close of the cotillon they tittle. Seated on the piazza cooling themselves off they tittle. The tinged glasses come around with bright straws, and they tittle. First they take "light wines," as they call them; but "light wines" are heavy enough to debase the appetite. There is not a very long road between champagne at five dollars per bottle, and whisky at five cents a glass.

Satanic Paths.

Satan has three or four grades down which he takes men to destruction. One man he takes up, and through one spree pitches him into eternal darkness. That is a rare case. Very seldom, indeed, can you find a man who will be such a fool as that.

When a man goes down to destruction Satan brings him to a plane. It is almost a level. The depression is so slight that you can hardly see it. The man does not actually know that he is on the down grade, and it tips only a little toward darkness—just a little. And the first mile it is claret, and the second mile it is sherry, and the third mile it is punch, and the fourth mile it is ale, and the fifth mile it is porter, and the sixth mile it is brandy, and then it gets steeper and steeper, and the man gets frightened and says, "Oh, let me get off!" "No," says the conductor, "this is an express train, and it does not stop until it gets to the Grand Central Depot of Smashupton." Ah, "look not thou upon the wine when it is red when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

The Safe Shelter.

My friends, whether you tarry at home—which will be quite as safe and perhaps quite as comfortable—or go into the country, arm yourself against temptation. The grace of God is the only safe shelter, whether in town or country. There are watering-places accessible to all of us. You cannot open a book of the Bible without finding out some such watering-place. Fountains open for sin and uncleanness; wells of salvation; streams from Lebanon; a flood struck out of the rock by Moses; fountains in the wilderness discovered by Hagar; water to drink and water to bathe in; the river of God, which is full of water; water of which if a man drink he shall never thirst; wells of water in the Valley of Baca; living fountains of water; a pure river of water as clear as crystal from under the throne of God.

These are watering-places accessible to all of us. We do not have a laborious packing up before we start—only the throwing away of our transgressions. No expensive hotel bills to pay; it is "without money and without price." No long and dirty travel before we get there; it is only one step away. In California in five minutes, I walked around and saw all bubbling up, and they were all different. And in five minutes I can go through this Bible parterre and find you fifty bright, sparkling fountains bubbling up into eternal life.

Ten Fountains,

A chemist will go to one of these summer watering-places and take the water and analyze it and tell you that it contains so much of iron, and so much of soda, and so much of lime, and so much of magnesia. I come to this Gospel well, this living fountain and analyze the water, and I find that its ingredients are peace, pardon, forgiveness, hope, comfort, life, heaven. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye" to this watering-place!

Crowd around this Bethesda to-day! Oh, you sick, you lame, you troubled, you dying—crowd around this Bethesda! Step in it! Oh, step in it! The angel of the covenant to-day stirs the water. Why do you not step in it? Some of you are too weak to take a step in that direction. Then we take you up in the arms of our closing prayer and plunge you clean under the wave, hoping that the cure may be as sudden and as radical as with Captain Naaman, who, blotched and carbuncled, stepped into the Jordan, and after the seventh dive came up, his skin roseate-complexioned as the flesh of a little child.

AN UNPOPULAR OFFICER.

A CRUSADE against green apples has been commenced in Jersey City, N. J. The Health Inspector at the beginning of the season officially declared that green apples are a detriment to the public health and a menace to the growing republic. Moreover, he said they must go. He started out from his office on July 16, looking for the forbidden fruit with all the ardor of a small boy. He sent his sanitary policemen out too. By noon they had visited twenty fruit stands and had captured nearly as many bushels of green apples. He took this trouble in the interest of the small boy, but his effort is not appreciated. Probably there is not a boy in the city who approves of the Inspector's proceeding. Men often feel that way about things that God does not let them have, when they pray for them. The time will come for every man when he will realize that it was well that God did not grant all he desired. (II. Cor. 12 : 8, 9.)

THE McALL MISSION IN FRANCE.

(See Illustrations on first page.)

A Call to Duty That Came Unexpectedly—At Work in the Parisian Faubourgs—The Little Room in the Rue Julien Lacroix and What it Led to—A Mustard Seed that Grew Into a Tree Whose Branches Reach Out Over the Nations—600 Workers and 1,250,000 Hearers—Thousands of Converts—The Mission Boat on the Seine.

FROM missionary work in India and Africa to the same class of Christian labor, although under altogether different conditions and, moreover, in the most brilliant of modern capitals—"Paris the Magnificent"—is a transition to which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are invited to-day. There is no more difficult problem in the whole range of Christian effort than the evangelization of great cities. Hedged about at every step by obstacles peculiar to large communities, the city missionary finds the work that lies nearest to his hand by no means the easiest. And when the earnest labor of half a lifetime, under God's blessing, results in a rich harvest of souls, such work is indeed deserving of the heartiest sympathy and support from Christians everywhere.

In 1871, Paris had just begun to recover from the madness of the Commune. Vandalism had run riot everywhere, religion had been trampled into the dust, and people had almost forgotten God. Now that the fever of lawlessness had died out, Paris settled down to a dangerous condition of spiritual indifference, the people rejecting the authority of their priests as readily as they cast off the yoke of the Empire. The Commune not only demolished the last semblance of imperial rule: it swept away religion also, and left a city, if not

A Nation of Free-Thinkers.

Visitors came from far and near to view the desolated city. One day in August, 1871, there came to Paris, a mild-looking, middle-aged man, accompanied by his wife, a gentle, sweet-faced Englishwoman. The newcomer was the Rev. Robert Whittaker McAll, who, after a pastorate lasting a quarter of a century in England, had come to France on a short vacation. It was his intention to spend a few weeks in the city and then to return to his labors in England, but as the result showed, God ordered otherwise, and the trip designed for recreation was to be the most eventful and important in his life.

Before he had been in the city three days, he began to visit Belleville and the faubourgs. The condition of the working people was obvious; they were like sheep without a shepherd. Communists for the most part, criminals many of them, they clearly belonged to the class whose sprang from spiritual neglect, rather than from inherent viciousness. They had nothing in common with the gay crowds on the boulevards, who, now that the war was over, began again to show themselves as of yore. It was among these ouvriers (working-men) of Belleville, that Mr. McAll first attempted to scatter the Gospel seed that has since borne fruit mightily. Standing on the street corners, in front of the wine-shops, or wherever a knot of blouses were gathered, he and his good wife handed them tracts in their own language on simple Gospel themes. By and by they began to be known, and the ouvriers would respectfully salute the mild-featured man and his companion.

Immorality and Infidelity

One day, when least expected, came

The Message from Heaven.

As suddenly as the divine effulgence prostrated Saul of Tarsus, did it pierce the heart of the preacher, with full conviction as to its meaning. He tells the story best in his own words to a friend, many years later:

"I had been handing tracts to several people at Belleville, near a cafe, when a man stepped out from the throng, and addressing me in English, said: 'You are a clergyman, sir? If you come to teach us truths, we shall welcome you gladly. We are ready to hear a gospel of liberty and charity; but we are quite done with the priests.' He spoke further; but what he had already said was enough to show me clearly what the Lord had given me to do."

Until that instant, it did not occur to Mr. McAll that he had work to do in Paris. What he had done had been merely by the way, during the intervals of recreation. But the call sounded in his ears with the force of an angel's trumpet. The appeal was unmistakable; the hand of God was in this thing. Here was a large community—the population of the north-eastern part of the city was fully 100,000—living in squalor, filth and crime; godless, yet hungering for true religion and waiting to welcome the Gospel. His mind was made up. Unhesitatingly he accepted the responsibility. Knowing nothing of the language and very little of the people, with a splendid faith he took all the risk and trusted in God for the outcome. He returned at once to England and severed his connections there, appearing in the Rue de Belleville as God's specially chosen messenger in November 1871. There are few who may be able to appreciate just what such a step involved. It meant the surrender of income, home and friends; the certainty of poverty and privation, for a time at least; the taking up of a daily burden far more irksome and laborious than he had ever borne, and the facing of crowds of scoffers and infidels.

In the Slums of Paris, instead of the mild aspect of a Christian congregation at home. It meant the loss of almost everything the world approves and cares for.

On the 17th of January, 1872, in a little hall at No. 18 Rue de Julien Lacroix, where he had gathered forty-five workmen, the first meeting was held. A number of chairs, a pine table, a cheap organ and a Bible, constituted the entire outfit. The service was as simple as the place itself. Cordial, homelike, welcoming, the preacher's words, although he was yet unfamiliar with their language gave the listening ouvriers to understand that here was a religion for the common people, a Saviour for all. The walls were hung with Bible-texts; hymn-books in French were distributed and the people were invited to sing; a reading, then a short Gospel talk aimed straight at the hearts of the hearers; more music, and after the closing, a hearty handshake, and an invitation to come to the next reunion.

This was the mustard-seed from which has sprung a tree whose branches now extend over all France. The little salle (hall) at the rue Julien Lacroix soon became too small, and a large ball-room in the rue de Belleville was secured, where Mothers' Meetings, Sunday-school, Bible Classes and other features were added. Other stations quickly followed, and the good work sped apace. Then, after Paris had a dozen or more stations in full and successful operation, Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, Nantes and other cities were invaded in turn by the McAll Mission army. And so it spread and branched out till to-day, the humble work begun eighteen years ago, includes one hundred and thirty stations in France, and it has even spread to Algiers, Tunis and Corsica. Last year 19,000 services were conducted by 600 workers, of whom 60 are specially trained by Dr. McAll and his accomplished wife for this peculiar field. Nearly $100,000 were expended last year by the Board of Directors of these Missions. Forty of the stations are supported by American contributors. The aggregate yearly attendance is nearly

A Million and a Quarter Souls!

Was there ever a more glorious or abundant harvest?

Of Mr. McAll it may well be said that "the common people heard him gladly," for the multitudes whom his mission work reaches during the year belong distinctly to the class whose souls would be lost to Christ were it not for some such special instrumentality as God has raised in their behalf. The work of eighteen years, while it has whitened the hair and aged the steps of the good missionary and his faithful wife, has peopled salle after salle with bands of anxious inquirers, redeemed thousands upon thousands of fathers and mothers from intemperance, and awakened a pure and permanent religious enthusiasm, unknown before, in the city of sin, superstition and priestcraft. Every salle is a centre of evangelical activity, around which busy Christian workers revolve, spreading all the benign influences of the Gospel, and bringing in the adults and the little ones to hear the loving message. For this great work God has wonderfully provided fitting help. Many French, American and English pastors, have gone voluntarily to the assistance of Mr. McAll and his army of workers at different times; but the field is so vast that more workers are needed. The American McAll Association has its headquarters at 1624 Locust Street, Philadelphia, where all contributions and communications should be addressed to the President, Mrs. Marine J. Chase. Stations of the mission are supported by generous contributions from Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Brooklyn, New York, Cincinnati, Newark, Portland, and many other American cities, well known charitable ladies in each taking charge of the gathering and forwarding of the offerings.

American clergymen, hundreds of whom have visited the Mission, unite in declaring that nothing could be more cheering than the scenes at the stations at Menilmontant, near Pere la Chaise cemetery, at Belleville, la Villette, Grenelle, la Chapelle and the large Salle Evangelique. The mission has almost beyond belief; the songs of salvation have taken the place of the ribald strains of drunkenness formerly heard on Sundays, and even of the warlike Marseillaise. The schools are very largely attended, and the sights to be witnessed in these old wine-shops, cleaned up, decorated with texts and filled with ardent worshippers in place of drunkards, is one to touch the heart of a sceptic. Paris at first affected to look down upon the Mission; it was too simple and unaffected; its religion was too easy; but Paris has come to recognize that it has been a good thing for Belleville and for the entire city. These crowded Gospel gatherings mean less work for the police and better citizens.

Purified the Faubourgs

The large Evangelical Hall (la Salle Evangelique) was opened by Mr. McAll in 1878, during the Exposition. Besides the usual exercises, there were distributions of the Bible and Gospels in twenty-two languages, the books being sold or given away. Thus the divine message was placed in the hands of thousands of Germans, Russians, Jews, Austrians, Spaniards, Japanese, Hollanders, Italians, and Bohemians, besides Frenchmen. The Bible Kiosk was a notable feature of the Exposition.

"To look at and talk with the Rev. Mr. McAll," said the Rev. J. S. Stone, of New York city, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a few days ago, "one would hardly suspect he was a man to carry so heavy a burden of responsibility. He is of the type of John rather than of Peter kind, mild, loving, gentle; the messenger whom you would unconsciously choose to convey pleasant tidings, but not denunciation. His style of oratory is simple and unpretentious; indeed he can hardly be called an orator. It is, however, when he is praying that the peculiar strength of the man is revealed. He speaks to God not as from a distance, but as though he

Were Very Near to Him, and sure of being heard and answered. He has unbounded confidence in his appeal to the Throne. His whole soul melts and is poured out when he prays, and his hearer is at once in sympathy with him. His nature is essentially spiritual."

A novelty in evangelistic work which Mr. McAll has introduced is

A Mission Boat,

A picture of which appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day. During the summer months afternoon services are held on board, in the spacious cabin which is capable of accommodating nearly two hundred persons. The pier is generally crowded long before the hour for the meeting. The boat is anchored in the river Seine, and has done service in the cause of Christ at many French seaports. It never fails to attract large and attentive audiences. Another picture of interest on the same

The Understatement of Populations Which is causing much dissatisfaction in St. Paul, Minneapolis, and other cities is doubtless due to several causes; but an official mentions one in particular that he believes was very potent. He says that in many cities the enumerators found people who were at a great deal of trouble to dodge the enumeration. They had the idea that if they were enrolled as residents of the city, it would invalidate their claim to the land they have secured under the homestead law. They live on their land long enough to establish legal residence, but they spend the bulk of their time in the city, are engaged in business there, belong to churches, own their city houses, and are citizens to all intents and purposes. They were afraid that if the enumerator reported them as living in the city, the Government might deprive them of the land in the country, and so they evaded his visit when they could. There is reason to fear that many people are acting in the same way about their spiritual concerns. They are anxious to make the best of both worlds, so they live and act as worldlings, and try to compromise with God for their heavenly mansion by spending part of the Sunday in church and paying subscriptions to religious work. The practise is not new. The prophet complained of such people in his day: "They come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but will not do them." (Ezek. 33 : 31.)

THE TEN LEPERS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 17; Luke 17: 11-19; Golden Text, Luke 17: 17.

The Leper's Wretched Lot—A Type of the Sinner's Condition—The Law for the Prevention of Contagion—How Sin Spreads—Why the Lepers were Sent to the Priest—The Ceremonial Cleansing—The Complicated Ritual Symbolical—Had no Meaning for the Leper—Types of Cleansing in the New Dispensation—The One Grateful Sufferer—The Nine Missing in Church Work.

IT was one of the proofs of His Messiahship which Jesus gave to John's disciples, that "The lepers are cleansed." (Matt. 11: 5.) It was not only in exceptional cases that Jesus cleansed the lepers. He was on His way to Jerusalem, and passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, there met Him, just as He entered a certain village, "ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off." Companions in misery, companions in loneliness, these poor, pitiable creatures, herded together. The law had done nothing for them but to declare them unclean, and to exclude them from houses, home, and from the congregation of the Lord. They had been, one by one, brought to the priest and examined, the fatal disease had been discovered by its too certain symptoms, and the priest had pronounced them "utterly unclean." There was no healing power in the law. "The leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, unclean, unclean. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean; he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be." (Lev. 13: 45, 46.)

According to the law, the only word by which these unhappy men might greet a stranger was that which told the fearful tale of their suffering and shame,

"Unclean! Unclean!"

What a type of sinners as God sees them! He says of the sin of His people Israel, "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint: from the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it, but wounds, bruises, and putrefying sores; they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment." (Isa. 1: 5, 6.) But Oh, if every sinner could see himself as God sees him, and if his only communion with other men was a warning against being contaminated by him, men would flee from moral lepers as from the plague.

Fancy the effect it would have if every drunkard carried upon his forehead a new order of phylactery, not inclosed in a little case as the Jews wore them, but an open, easily-read inscription, "unclean, unclean." If every impure, fallen man, warned men and women away from him by the one cry, "unclean, unclean," and his poor sisters in sin did the same, the horrible vices which are ruining our generation would necessarily die out. If every gambler warned men of his proximity, and all these moral lepers were bound to put a covering upon their upper lip, to keep in the tainted breath, and to proclaim them the dangerous creatures which they are, then men would fear both sin and sinners, and avoid them. But, in our days, sin is gilded, patronized in high quarters, justified, and so the leprosy spreads.

These ten lepers broke the law; they were in the atmosphere of grace. At last they had met with a Man whose first thought was not to avoid them, and to shield Himself from contamination by them. His thought was first for them: His face expressed it, His reputation bore witness to it. Lepers, who were unwelcome anywhere else, found a welcome from Him, and instead of the sad cry, "unclean, unclean," they cried, "Jesus, Master, have mercy upon us." They urged no plea, and gave no reason. He was

The Lepers' Friend,

this was enough. But they trusted Him fully, and when His only answer was to send them back to the priests who had done nothing for them but to confirm their doom, they did not object or argue. They had no hope from self, no hope in any other, and, unlikely to help them as such direction seemed, they obeyed, "and it came to pass, that, as they went, they were healed." In obeying we are blest, in obeying we are guided, in obeying we are strengthened. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." (John 13: 17.) "He that doeth the will of God abideth for ever." (1. John 2: 17.) God gives the Holy Spirit to the obedient. (John 14: 15-17.) Unquestioning obedience, as soon as we are quite sure of God's will from His word, brings endless peace and liberty of soul. It is no matter to us whether the command of God commends itself to our reason. Our views of things are very limited, we only see our own will.

Jesus had another purpose to serve in sending the lepers to the priests than simply their healing; it was "for a testimony unto them" (Luke 5: 12); a testimony that one who could heal the leprosy—and not, as they only could, denounce the sufferer—was in their very midst. But there was another purpose in this journey. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth," (Rom. 10: 4.) The lepers were to go back to the law with the light of Christ, and understand the law through Him, and Him through the law. "This shall be

The Law of the Leper

In the day of his cleansing—He shall be brought unto the priest and the priest shall go forth out of the camp," (Lev. 14: 2: 3), to bring the leper in. Christ was to do this when He "suffered without the gate," (Heb. 13: 12) in no other way could he bring his unclean and leprous brethren within. "And the priest shall look, and behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper (and no other eye but Christ's can judge of this), then the priest shall command to take for him that is to be cleansed two birds alive and clean," type of a living Christ; there can be no real cleansing of which a living Christ is not the guarantee. One of the birds must "be killed in an earthen vessel over running (or living) water." Jesus was slain, yet He lives; there must be death and life to represent Him. Sin has no more dominion over us than death has over Christ while we trust in and obey Him.

But he that is to be cleansed has work to do. All that comes of the flesh must be put away.

Self Must Have no Quarter.

His clothes, which covered the flesh, and which have been defiled by the leprosy, must be washed. His hair, which grew out of the impure, leprous flesh must be shaved. All which is of himself must be put away. And after that, he may come into the camp, communion is restored. But he may not enter into his own tent until he has shaved himself a second time at the end of seven days. He is no less in danger of contaminating the congregation than his own family. This is a type of how completely self has to be denied and the flesh put away for the cleansing of the soul and body.

And now there is resurrection. The eighth day three lambs must be slain; one for a sin offering to signify Jesus dying for the sins of the world; one for a burnt offering, to represent how completely those who are saved by Christ are through Him and like Him, living sacrifices, wholly laid upon the altar; and one for a trespass offering, to signify Christ's atonement for special sins. O, how all this shows us the hatefulness of sin in the sight of God, and how sickness coming into the world as the result of sin needs the cleansing blood, needs Christ! Did the lepers understand all that was to be seen in these types and shadows? Probably not—they had not the Holy Ghost dwelling within to guide them into all truth as we have if we yield our selves to His direction.

But although their healing was effected at the same time and in the same manner, there was a great difference in these men. "One of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down on his face at His feet, giving Him thanks." They could have gone but a few paces, when the blessed consciousness of healing broke upon them. Nine were in a hurry to get back to their friends and to enter into ordinary life again, but the one would have justified Paul's appeal when he said, I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service, (Rom. 12: 1); he felt he owed his life to Him who had saved it, and that common justice demanded the acknowledgment of the fact. The man was a despised Samaritan, but his sense of honor was keener than that of all the nine Israelitish lepers which had been cleansed. They were cleansed as well as he, but they were not found at the Master's side. When they went to the priests, probably they would bear only so much testimony for Jesus as suited their purpose. And in a tone of sadness and of wounded love, the Master asks: "Were there not ten cleansed, but where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger."

"Where Are the Nine?"

Out of every ten who know what it is to be born again, and to obtain the pardon of their sins, how many are there whose lives are a glory to the God who created and redeemed them? Go to the members of our churches who are supposed to be converted people. Of how many could it be said, "He lives only for the glory of God; God shines through all his business transactions; God's presence is always felt where he is; his house is hallowed by the breath of God; his words are full of grace; his spirit is gentle and like the Lord's?" Is it not so, that in every church the sad question of the Master has to be asked, "Were there not ten converted, but where are the nine?" In the prayer-meeting, "Where are the nine?" In the open air services, "Where are the nine?" By the side of the sick and dying, "Where are the nine?" In the raising of the fallen, "Where are the nine?" In the mission to the heathen, "Where are the nine?" In representing Christ in the shop and in the family, "Where are the nine?" In the forgiving of injuries, "Where are the nine?" In the restoring of the brother who is overtaken by a fault "in the spirit of meekness" (Gal. 6: 1), "Where are the nine?" When the Master comes to reckon with His servants who have traded with or neglected His talents, where will be the nine? When the bride of Christ hath made herself ready, and the virgins have trimmed their lamps, where will be the nine? Reader are you of the nine?

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.The Shadow of the Guillotine.

THE Queen had a vague instinct of the misfortunes that were threatening her; but she was disturbed and confident in turn, yielding at times to the illusions which the blindest optimism of the epoch evoked in every heart. There was expected some sort of gentle and amusing revolution, a political entertainment perfected by the philosophy and urbanity of the eighteenth century. It was thought that the Assemblies would be like the meetings of the Academy. . . . All were fired by ambition. "Every man who could read, we are told by the Count of Vaublanc, "became a profound politician." From the greatest nobleman down to the idler in the cafes every one imagined himself the possessor of an excellent receipt for making good the deficit and saving the country. As M. Auberton has said "By all, even by the court party, the Revolution was invoked out of wrath with conflicting ambitions, as well as resentment against the King and his ministers, and the desire of revenge for some vexation and disappointment. The inevitable catastrophe became the last resource, even for those on whom it was to fall like a punishment, and in this absurd infatuation of official selfishness, even the courtiers

* From Marie Antoinette and the End of the Old Regime by Imbert de Saint-Amand. Translated by Thomas Sergeant Perry, a sketch not only of the life of the unhappy Queen, but of the court and society of France just as the storm broke which was to overthrow all that France had held in reverence for centuries. Pp. 30 price $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

expected from the States-General the destruction of the central power and the restoration of the feudal system.

The Weak King.

It is the fashion nowadays to represent accomplished facts as the consequence of an inevitable fatality, which prudence, wisdom and genius would have been powerless to resist. To us nothing seems more opposed, not merely to the freedom of the will and to human dignity, but also to the philosophy and majesty of history, than this Mohammedan fatalism which deprives the affairs of this world of their interest and moral value. . . . Between the king and his council, there was an alternation of mistakes about everything which might be regarded as a prudent or a vigorous measure. Thus the king, who had a passive courage, felt a certain shame about leaving Versailles; he was perfectly conscious of the danger, but he hoped to avoid it by a display of strength. When it was necessary to use it, he could not decide to draw his sword on his subjects. I linger with regret on this unhappy monarch's faults; for with his kind heart he deserved a different fate. As for Marie Antoinette, who was justly alarmed by her husband's indecision, her position was most painful. It was not easy for her to urge vigorous measures, and an appeal to force when her husband was all weakness. As a worthy daughter of Maria Theresa, she naturally inclined to energetic decisions. She would have liked to ride before the troops; but this was impossible when Louis XVI. opposed every demonstration of force, and was absolutely unwilling to abandon the paternal attitude which suited the wishes of his heart and his instinctive tendencies. Meanwhile, the peril was increasing from day to day.

The Marquis Lafayette.

Great was the surprise in Paris and Versailles when it was learned that Lafayette, the nineteen-year-old sage, who seemed so cold and indifferent, had, against the King's orders, chartered a ship at his own expense, and crossed the ocean to fight for American liberty. Without a regret he left the delights of court life, his magnificent home, the meeting-place of elegance and intelligence, to plunge into the wildest adventures. His wife, who was devoted to him, showed Christian stoicism, and did not try to detain him. Although he had committed an act of disobedience in going to fight under the American flag, Marie Antoinette never forbore to treat him with great kindness. She often received him when he returned to France in 1779 and with her own hand copied the lines of a tragedy in which his friends thought they saw a resemblance to him. When he returned to America, for the second time, the government could not praise him too much or find benefits enough wherewith to reward the young champion of the new republic. On January 21, 1782, a great festival was taking place at the Hotel de Ville in Paris in honor of the birth of the Dauphin, when suddenly word came that Lafayette had just reached the capital. Madame de Lafayette, who was at the Hotel de Ville, then received an unusual mark of the Queen's favor; for Marie Antoinette herself carried her in the royal carriage to the Hotel de Versailles, that she might as soon as possible welcome her husband. Every one became enthusiastic over the conqueror of Cornwallis; the infatuation was universal. At his suggestion the Queen had her full length portrait painted, and sent it to Washington. The King promoted him, over all his fellow-officers, to raise him to the rank he had held in America.

The Marquis, who on his return to his native land, could show the scars of the wounds he had received in fighting for freedom, a republican to whom the United States had given the rights of citizenship, and George Washington had treated like a son, came back more American than French, full of zeal for an exotic liberty which, when transplanted to France, was to bear fruits very unlike those he expected. Although Louis and Marie Antoinette had shown him much kindness and his birth should have attached him to the monarchy, he who in less troubled times would have been one of the noblest and most faithful of the King's servants, was about to be led by a fatal chain of events to weaken the throne which it was his first duty to defend. The spirit of opposition was most prominent in this great democratic nobleman, a revolutionist and a conservative by turns, who one day fomented a riot, and the next suppressed it: who seemed to Louis and the Queen now like an enemy, and in a moment like a friend.

THE DAY OF RAPTURE.

By P. W. E.

Who is the Bride of the Lamb—The Church Revealed After the Ascension—The Pentecostal Gifts—The Promise at the Sepulchre—The Lord to Come as He Went—The First Resurrection—The Change in the Living Saints—The Second Advent Reiteration in the New Testament—The Church's Attitude—A Threefold Admonition.

THE Scriptures teach us that there is an earthly as well as a heavenly bride. The difference, however, is most marked. Jeremiah writes, "Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith Jehovah; I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals" (Jer. 2: 2.) This espoused wife proved herself unfaithful. Christ came to her according to promise, but she received Him not. She took counsel how she might put Him to death. But God declares that after many days of visitation He "will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness and speak comfortably unto her . . . and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth" (Hosea 2: 14, 15). That is, in due time she shall be restored and made glorious in the earth.

On account of her unfaithfulness she was cut off, or set aside. Who then is spoken of in Revelation? We find no reference in the Old Testament to the Church of Christ, this heavenly bride. This was "the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (Col. 1: 26). No intimation was ever made respecting the Church of God, until after the Jews took counsel how they might destroy Jesus. They being set aside, Christ said to Peter, "I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16: 18). Up to that time there was no Church of God. From the day of Pentecost the Church has been and is being gathered "out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." The Holy Ghost is the gathering power; and Christ is the centre of gathering. Those who belong to the Church of Christ have been born of God; set apart according to the gracious will or purpose of the Father, sanctified by the blood of Jesus; and chosen "to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."

The Wife of the Lamb

When our Lord was on the earth He gathered about Him a few disciples, who on the day of Pentecost were baptized into one body, called the Church. The night on which the Lord was betrayed He said to them: "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14: 2, 3). Up to that time there was no place prepared for those who would constitute this heavenly bride. Here He not only assumes that He will prepare a place for them, but that He will also come again and receive them to Himself. On the day of our Lord's ascension, while the disciples were looking steadfastly toward heaven as He went up, "behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts. 1: 10, 11).

No language can be more clear or explicit than this.

Our Lord is to Come Again,

In the same manner that He went on high, He is the Head of the Church—thus the Church must be raised and associated with its Head in everything: in suffering, in life, in judgment, in dominion, and in glory. "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken their (your) mortal bodies" (Rom. 8: 11). And they being thus associated with Him, He makes them sharers of all He is and has.

We are assured that "the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." (1. Thess. 4: 16, 17.) And again, "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." (1. Cor. 15: 51, 52.) These passages show that takes place when the Lord comes for His saints; and that His coming is the present hope of the Church. Hence our Lord says, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately." (Luke 12: 35, 36.) And Paul commends the Thessalonian saints because they had "turned to God from idols, to serve the living God, and to wait for His Son from heaven."

The First Resurrection

Jesus, the Head, is in heaven; the body, the Church, is here. By the Holy Ghost, constant communication is maintained between the Head and its members. By the same Spirit are ever flowing from the glorified Lord, life, joy, peace, and every other spiritual blessing. And when God's time has fully come, that same Spirit by whom our dead spirits have been quickened will also quicken our mortal bodies, and lift us one and all up to meet the Lord in the air. Here is our hope.

Many passages of Scripture can be quoted from the New Testament referring to the coming of the Lord, either for or with His saints. On an average, one verse out of every twenty-five refers to Christ's coming. Some of them are very significant indeed. In the last four addresses to the seven churches in Revelation, chapters 2 and 3, the Lord's coming holds a prominent place, either in the shape of encouragement or of warning. Till the rapture and waiting, looking and longing for the Bridegroom to come. It is well to notice, in the last chapter of Revelation, "I come quickly" is said three times, and is designed for our consideration; first, to see well to our walk; secondly, to see to our work; and thirdly, for our hearts to watch for Him. The first time, seventh verse, he adds, "Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of this book." Then the practical application is given in the twelfth verse. "My reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." But in the twentieth verse, the third time the words are uttered, there is nothing said about our walk or our work. Here He assumes that He Himself is to us "the chiefest among ten thousand" and the One "altogether lovely." So this cry is for our hearts, yes, for our all; as He has loved us, has died for us, has sanctified us, has cleansed us, has nourished us, has cherished us, and soon He is to present us to Himself as His bride.

The Church Should be Watching

What an exalted, what a blissful destiny awaits the children of God! Oh, that our hearts were more moved by this fact now! Are we looking for the coming of the Bridegroom? Do we long to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump? May our hearts be established in His love, and we be encouraged and cheered with the prospect of His coming and of our change, that we may forever be with the Lord! "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." (Heb. 10: 37.)

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

MIRACLES BEYOND DISPUTE.

THE miracle of transformation wrought in individual hearts and lives make faith in the Scripture records of miracles easy. The call that raises from the death of sin into a life of holiness exceeds in its marvellous result the call that brought Lazarus from his tomb. Beholding the former it is not difficult to give credence to the latter. We need more miracles of grace rather than so much logical defence of the physical miracles of by-gone days. When Pentecostal power descended on the disciples, souls were led to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Spirit, whose descent was accompanied by this mighty display of power, was the source of that power. The Spirit of God brooded over chaotic nature, and life and light and order were the results. But Pentecost was a greater marvel than the world's creation, for the spiritual is ever superior to the natural. The Pentecostal power is still with us. The Spirit of God abides in the Church. But as Christ could not do many of his mighty works in some of the places into which his love led him, because straitened by the unbelief of the people, so the Spirit of God is often hindered by the lack of faith of the professing people of God. We are not straitened in God the Spirit, but in ourselves, if straitened at all.

It was of the Spirit that Christ spake when He said on the great day of the feast: "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." This endowment is not one of mere personal blessing. He who so receives the Spirit will be the channel of blessing to others. Through his ministrations hearts about him are to be watered, and this living water means more than ever water meant even in the thirstiest of Oriental lands. Who shall say what is the limit of personal usefulness in any disciple of Christ? The feeblest among us dare not say that he may not be made mighty through the Spirit. The world's redemption waits the Church's consecration. Were the millions of Christians in our land centres of the Spirit's vitalizing energy, in the measure that the words of Christ suggest as possible, this land would be veritably Christianized and the ultimate subjugation of the world itself to the Son of God would be early accomplished.

Infidelity and scepticism, and all the varying shades of unbelief, would flee away before the dawn of such a day, the day in which all the people of God put on their kingly apparel and live the royal life they claim to possess. Not less than twenty per cent of our population is enrolled on our lists of church membership. There are twelve million names upon those lists. Yet is sin riotous and rampant, and hydra-headed iniquity defies the law and destroys and devours as though no army of the living God numbered its millions. Surely, the Church militant is weak where it might be and ought to be strong. It may be urged that denominational divisions weaken our forces, but a greater evil exists in the worldliness and selfishness prevailing in the Church. We cannot serve God and mammon. Self-sacrifice must take the place of self-aggrandizement and love of souls drive out love of the world if mankind is to be lifted toward God by our influence.

There are hundreds of thousands of Christians who never open their lips and never lift a finger in any effort to save the lost. No living water reaches the thirsty hearts of men through them. They are content with a personal hope in Christ and having, as they think, settled that, the world's need does not move them. In a sense this is the greatest marvel of all. A redeemed and regenerated heart knows no impulses of gratitude leading it in the train of a Redeemer's path of service and sacrifice! Nine of the lepers cleansed return not to give praise to God. They utter no voice of testimony to the power of grace to save! In many instances they who profess the heavenly birth forsake not old sins. It is a case of an old establishment with a new name. There is little proof of a new nature. Christianity is judged by such professors. By its fruits as seen, or rather as not seen, in their lives, the tree is judged and pronounced a delusion. So the gospel seems a meaningless fable and the Bible is belittled. It was well enough that the Christian dispensation should be ushered in by a display of miraculous power. The resurrection of Jesus Christ from among the dead, is proof positive of the righteousness of his claims. The world must see that resurrection taking place again and again in the lives of Christian men and women, if it is to be impressed and convicted unto salvation. Only the resurrection life of the Christian can fully and forcibly preach the resurrection of his Lord.

THE DUTY OF LABOR.

PRIDE and avarice are the motive springs of many a man's devotion to his daily business avocation. While there is a dollar to be made he would like to make it. If there is work to be done, no one, in his estimation, can do it quite so well as he. Again, each man wants to keep himself abreast of others in his social circle. So he keeps himself still in the harness that others would gladly wear, and the causes he might help remain unaided, so far as he is concerned.

After all "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world" and pass into eternity with a record that can be written down in no other earthly characters than those which represent dollars and cents? Such a record being interpreted in the light of eternity will read, "Weighed in the balance and found wanting." It behooves every one of us to take time to be healthy, time to be godly, time to do good,

Our men of means should be found actively engaged in the furtherance of plans for the world's betterment.

Leisure legitimately secured and properly spent is by no means laziness. The man of leisure need not be a lazy man. Our Creator would have us work and enjoy the fruits of our labor. If from any cause beyond our control we cannot work we need not starve. No one among us is called upon to do that. Of all the millions who dwell in the land it is not the will of our Father in heaven that any should perish. There is bread enough and to spare, for old and young, for strong and infirm. The Gospel has provided for the supply of all human need by bidding those who possess share with those who lack. At the same time lest lack be the outcome of laziness, it is ordered that if a man work not, he is not to eat. Labor of some kind as far as native faculties and added advantage permit, is meant for us all, save the sick and the helpless. He who can work and does not work ought to be made to work. He who shirks his share of the common toil and yet reaps the benefits of the toil of others, the same is a thief and a robber. He may not dress in Rob Hood's garb, and he may not lay himself open to the charge of larceny, but the fruits he enjoys are not the fruits of righteousness.

MAN'S DESTINY AND THE BIBLE.

THE destinies of humanity are bound up with the Bible. Rising with the dawn of the race, it reaches its meridian splendor over the heights of Bethlehem, whence it has thrown its healing beams over the wide earth and made in it a spiritual system, in which every one who enters it finds the supply for all his needs, light for his pathway, weapons for his warfare, implements for his work, peace for his conscience, solace for his sorrow, a resting rock for his faith, and the clear prospect of eternal joy.

For centuries the Bible has gone hand in hand with civilization, science, letters and law, they have marked the progress of mankind, ways supporting them and chiefly leading them on their way. Every nation which has received it has become a chosen nation; emancipated from kinship and priest-craft, becoming the guide of other nations to freedom. It has not only survived unimpaired, the changes of time and the hatred of enemies, but it has wrought itself into the fibre of the most powerful nations, and into their languages and literatures. If every copy of the Bible were destroyed to-day, it could be reproduced from countless sources tomorrow. The American Bible Society alone has issued over fifty million copies in eighty odd different languages and dialects, many of which were devised for the express purpose of its publication. This is the only book for which languages are invented, that it may be read where written words were previously unknown.

The Bible has abundantly displayed its divine power under the most adverse conditions of the world and Church, to satisfy us that it is the "power of God unto salvation." It will save the world, or else the world will not be saved. The Church must hold it in its integrity, and not suffer its teachers to mar or cloud its sacred pages. It is her chief weapon in the warfare with the hosts of sin. It is the sword of the Spirit because it is the Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Event of Interest, Although Possibly of little significance politically, was the marriage at Ischl on July 31, of the Arch-Duke Franz Salvator of Tuscany, to Arch-Duchess Marie Valerie, daughter of the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. The nuptials were very brilliant, and all the branches of the House of Hapsburg, the ruling House of Austria, were represented. The bridegroom is a tall, soldierly man of 24, and the bride is two years younger, very graceful, though not beautiful, sweet-tempered and amiable, and a "Lady Bountiful" among the poor of any neighborhood where she happens to dwell. She inherits her mother's love of outdoor sports and exercise, and thinks nothing of long solitary walks over the Obersterreich Mountains. Lately she has been more or less a recluse owing to the declining health of the Empress and like a dutiful daughter, has prepared the latter's care to her own comfort and pleasure. One of the prettiest features of the recent wedding was the presence in the church of many married couples of the town of Ischl, dressed in national costumes, and two rows of children scattered flowers in the path of the bride. Marie Valerie's gratitude seems as great as her popularity, for, after the ceremony, at her request, her father the Emperor distributed beautiful gifts and marks of distinction among all who had rendered service to her in her girlhood. The House of Hapsburg has been strangely unfortunate, and its history is full of dark tragedy.

Marie Valerie seems to embody many of the best characteristics of its most famous members and to these she adds a beautiful nature and a simple good-heartedness that promise well for her future happiness.

Michigan Claims the Distinction of Giving birth to a new national party, as yet unnamed. It has sprung from the coalition of the Patrons of Industry, the Union Labor-Party and the Prohibitionists; its platform is progressive, and its actual voting strength at present is estimated at less than 90,000. This, while too small to elect anybody, may prove in a close State just what is needed to hold the balance of power. Should the fusion last, it is believed that the new movement may extend its lines to the adjoining States and may possibly upset all the calculations of the politicians.

The Geographical World is Looking Forward with considerable interest to the account of his African explorations shortly to be issued by Captain Casati, the distinguished Italian explorer.

It is understood that he will deal with the subject in a perfectly neutral way, ignoring all his personal explorations and confining himself to the personal experiences and impressions of the Casati expedition. Casati is a soldier, somewhat past his prime; but he is also a student and thinker. For twenty-five years he has interested himself actively in Africa, his first commission there having been received from the African Society of Milan, when he was directed to join Romolo Gessi, the famous Italian pioneer explorer and opponent of slavery. Casati's life has been full of hair-breadth escapes and marvellous interpositions of Providence in his behalf. All his effort has been directed toward the suppression of the slave traffic. He has at different times been a favorite of the native kings of the interior and, again, their prisoner, condemned to death. On one occasion he was bound to a tree twenty-four hours awaiting execution, and was rescued by some of Emin Pasha's guards. Although Casati's story will be supplementary in many respects to that of Stanley, neither the latter nor Emin Pasha will figure very largely in the narrative. Casati was so unfortunate as to suffer the destruction of his manuscripts by natives, compelling much of the work to be done over again. He will renew his travels in the Dark Continent this year.

Postmaster General Wanamaker Has done wisely in putting the stamp of his official condemnation on a recently published book by a famous Russian author, antagonistic to religion, and social morality, and thus preventing its transmission through the mails, except under seal. The book, as all civilized peoples are now agreed, is one that deserves everywhere to meet with the swiftest discouragement. The officers of the Society for the Enforcement of the Criminal Law announce their intention to stop its sale if possible. There may be some question as to the legality of Mr. Wanamaker's course in this matter—and this point will doubtless be raised by interested parties—but it is enough to explain that he is fortified by the opinion of the Attorney General, who rules that the government has a perfect right to declare the book unmailable except at letter rates. Technically, this excludes it from the mails altogether, although the Department has no power to open on suspicion a package mailed at letter rates.

Our White Squadron, Consisting of the Warships Chicago, Atlanta and Boston, returned last week from its long cruise in the Mediterranean and in South American waters. Admiral Walker, the commander of the squadron, says that the effect of the cruise has been to inspire the nations of Europe with a respect for our status as a naval power. At the same time, he admits the vast superiority of the great navies of Europe, with their powerful, steel-clad leviathans and trained forces that are kept constantly at drill. The Italians, particularly, seem to have indulged in heavy battle-ships. One lesson of the cruise was, that the nations of Europe are putting forth all their energies in preparation for future war. All other interests seem to be regarded as secondary to this single idea of arming by sea and land. With neighbors armed to the teeth and scowling at neighbor, there is none too much happiness in the European family, and Uncle Sam's sons and daughters cannot be too thankful that a similar state of affairs does not and cannot exist in our own land, notwithstanding the utterances of some alarmists who hear in every whisper a note of war, and see in every summer cloud a hand of warning against an enemy.

Eighty-two Human Lives and Five Million Dollars represent the total expenditure of blood and treasure by Belgium, thus far, in the conquest of the Congo. King Leopold has been carrying forward his enterprise since 1879, and the largest force he has had at work at any time was last year, when the white men employed by the Congo State numbered 227. The average death rate is very nearly ten per cent., not a very alluring prospect to Europeans. Still, little Belgium has made great headway in the "Dark Continent," and has contributed some of the brightest and most enterprising spirits to exploration and Christianization that the century has produced. Indeed, had it not been for the fostering care of Belgium and the generous philanthropy of Leopold, very little of real value would even yet have been known about the vast Congo region, which is now the centre of attraction for the European powers, and which promises to be by far the finest part of Africa for commercial as well as missionary enterprise.

A Million Jews are Practically Banished by the recent edict of the Czar of Russia. It is now believed by prominent Hebrews in New York that the bulk of this million of expatriated Hebrews will inevitably find its way to the United States as soon as possible. Thousands of them will doubtless arrive without means, and in this event the law for the exclusion of such immigrants will no doubt be strictly enforced. But a very large proportion of the Hebrews who come from Russia bring with them not only strong and willing bodies, but full purses as well, together with good business training. Many of them are skilled tradesmen. Should the Czar's ukase take effect in earnest, this country, far from suffering by the flood of new arrivals, is rather likely to be benefited. An appeal is to be made to Secretary Blaine, asking him to intercede with the Russian Government against the threatened expatriation; but it is hardly likely that any serious interference would be tolerated in the matter. As a rule, the Hebrews who do come here, no matter how unfortunate, are never a charge upon the public. Pauperism is a reproach that does not lie at the door of the Jew. There is no race in the world that takes the same care of its poorer members, and in this respect the Jews may be said to be a shining example to many Christian communities.

NEWS SUMMARY.

July 28: Steamer Virginia Strikes Excursion Steamer Louise in Chesapeake Bay; Nine Lives Lost—Father Laurentz, Spurious Priest, Victimizes Catholic Clergy in St. Louis and Chicago—Guatemala Again Defeated by Salvador.

July 29: Peace Restored at Buenos Ayres After 1,000 Lives Sacrificed—Six Persons Poisoned by Green Tea, Elizabeth, N. J.—Directors World's Fair Decide to have Agricultural Exhibits at Jackson Park, Chicago.

July 30: Business Part of Seneca Falls, N. Y., Burned; Loss $700,000—Discussion on Tariff Bill Deferred in Senate—88 Dead Miners Taken Out of Exploded Mine at St. Etienne, France.

July 31: Eighteen Deaths from Sunstroke in New York City—Tornado in New Hampshire—Blaine Visits Harrison at Cape May—Eighty Deaths Daily from Cholera at Mecca.

August 1: Great Famine in Soudan; 100 Deaths Daily—Salvadorian Rebel General Rivas Defeated and Slain—Illinois Legislature Passed World's Fair Bill.

August 2: Intense Drought Ruining Western Wheat Crops—Steamer Sunshine, 150 Passengers, Struck Rock off Orient Point, Long Island Sound; All Saved in Boats—Nihilist Plot Discovered, St. Petersburg; Several Arrests.

August 3: Great Damage by Hailstorms Northwest—Morales Bermudez Chosen President in Peru—Family of Ten Prostrated by Rat Poison, Atlanta, Ga.; Three Dead—Civil War Threatened in Samoa.

BRIEF NOTES.

Every reader of this journal should read carefully the second page of the cover this week. It would be a pleasure to send to every one of our friends one of these beautiful silver souvenirs of the great work in which we are engaged.

The first Russian "Temperance Society" has just opened headquarters at St. Petersburg.

The Bible school at Chautauqua has over one thousand members. Twenty-five universities and colleges are represented among the members.

The fund for the purchase of the "missionary wagon" for Erzroom, Turkey, for which the Young People's Missionary Society of the Lincoln Park Church, Chicago, has been working, is nearly completed. The wagon will cost $350.

We remind our readers that the annual meeting for Bible study, conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall, commences to-day at Ocean Grove, N. J., and continues until August 10. In former years a great blessing has attended these meetings.

A bed has been endowed in the Seney Hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y., by the Florence Nightingale Society of the Hanson Place M. E. Church, at a cost of $5,000. This is an evidence of the growing tendency to practically obey the Lord's injunctions as to the care of the bodies as well as the souls of the poor.

At the Church of the Strangers on July 27 Dr. Deems' place in the pulpit was filled by Tsche She Dge, a converted Chinaman, who has been doing missionary work in his native land. He said that the day is not far distant when all China will be Christianized.

A Prophetic Conference of Baptist ministers will be held in November next, commencing on the 19th in Brooklyn, N. Y. The conference will meet in Dr. McBride's church. Rev. George C. Needham has consented to take charge of the preliminary arrangements.

The Floating Hospital of St. John's Guild, New York, is running its summer trips again. On one of its excursions last week 1,455 sick mothers and children were on board, and 66 of them were admitted to the seaside home. Subscriptions to aid this most Christ-like work may be sent to the treasurer, 21 University Place.

As some misapprehension exists in regard to the governing power of the Christian Endeavor Society and the authority which it exerts, it is proper to say that there is no central board of authority or control. The United Society of Christian Endeavor simply serves as a bureau of information. It exercises no authority, demands no allegiance, levies no taxes and does not even record the names of societies unless they wish to be recorded.

THREE IMPORTANT PRECEPTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Hear thou my son, and be wise, and guide thine heart in the way." Prov. 23 : 19.

Solomon's Exhortation Baptized—I. The Injunction to Hear—How to Test a Sermon—Hear to Obtain Faith—Not for Other People—How Expectant Legatees Listen to the Reading of a Will II. Be Wise—Try to Understand the Gospel—To Yield to It—Hearing Followed by Action—III. The Guidance of the Heart—Only One Way—Often Described in Scripture—An Old Way—Narrow—Its Joys for those who Enter—An Orchard Hedged with Sour Apples.

SOLOMON, in this verse, gives three precepts. I am not very careful as to what limited meaning he personally attached to his words. I am going to baptize his precepts into the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. I shall put into them a fullness of gospel meaning, and I shall press them home upon the heart, praying the Holy Spirit to lead every unconverted person to whom these words shall come, to obey these three precepts at once. My voice is to each one. I have a message from God for thee, and for thee. Be not disobedient to the heavenly summons. The first precept in my text is "Hear;" and the second is, "Be wise;" and the third is "Guide thine heart in the way."

I. We will begin with the first precept, which is contained in the word

"Hear."

The exhortation to hear is a very important one. As I understand it and use it at this time it means, hear the Gospel. "Take heed what ye hear." There is only one way of salvation. Mind that you hear the one and only Gospel. Be very careful of your Sundays: you will not have many of them. Do not go on the Sabbath to hear whatever comes in your way, or you may hear to your ruin. Go to hear the Gospel. "How shall I know where the Gospel is preached?" Well, you will not have to inquire long: you may readily judge for yourself. Unless the name of Jesus is sounded often, depend upon it you are in the wrong place. It will not take you long to find out whether the man preaches of works or grace, ceremonies or faith, man or Christ. You can soon discover the gospel sermon or the moral essay, for the very temperature of them differs. Mere morality teaches men to dance, but it does not discern the fact that they have lost their legs. The gospel gives the lame man his feet, and then shows him how to use them. You need a Saviour: you do not want to be deluded with some theory of saving yourself. Go where you hear about the Lord Jesus and His redeeming blood.

To Get Faith.

When you have found out the gospel-house take care that you hear with the view of obtaining faith in the Lord Jesus. Aim at that blessed thing. "Faith cometh by hearing." It will be idle for you to stop at home, and say, "I will try to believe." This is unreasonable, and not according to the laws of mind. It is folly to attempt to try to believe; there is a far better way. Go and hear what it is which you are to believe, and, as you hear it, if it be faithfully told out, and if the preacher is, in his own person, a witness to the truth, you will be greatly helped in the matter of believing. Faith comes of knowledge and evidence, and hearing brings you these.

Next, I would say, hear for yourself. The great object of a hearer should be to hear what God speaks to him. I am glad that God should speak to my neighbor; but my neighbor must listen for himself, and not for me. The Roman orator began—

"Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears." He needs much the loan; for people usually lend their ears to one another, and not to the speaker. They will sit and wonder what Mrs. So-and-so thinks of the sermon; it is so pat for her. Leave her alone, friend! Think about what is pat for yourself. Do you not know that in every sermon there is something for yourself, and your first duty is to give heed to that which is for you? Come with me to a house. A will is to be read. A dozen people have come home from the funeral, and they are going to hear the will read. Perhaps they cried a good deal at the funeral; but they will not cry now, if the person they have buried has left a decent sum among them. They are all ear for what the lawyer has to read. Will you be wise enough to hear a sermon in that fashion?

And then, dear friends, hear

When the Sermon is Done.

"How can I hear when it is all done?" This is a very important point. I went to see a poor woman in the hospital one day, and she said to me, speaking of the sermons she had heard, "Sir, You seem to talk to me all day and all night while am lying here." I said, "Well, I hope I do not keep you awake." "No," she said, "but as I am awake I hear you talking to me through everything I see. You have used so many things as illustrations, that everywhere I have you in my memory." I was pleased, and inwardly wished that I could always preach in the way she described; and I should do so if I always had hearers such as that sick woman had evidently been. Ah, dear friends! the way to hear a sermon is to hear it afterward.

Above all, hear the gospel as the voice of God. When a man hears the preacher, not as a man speaking on his own account, but as God's servant; and when the truth spoken is not measured by its oratory, nor weighed by its logic, but is judged of by the Bible, as to whether it is the very truth of God or not; then it is that men hear to profit. Those who compare sermons with Scripture are noble, like the Bereans of old. If you can say, "I hear the word, not as the word of man, but as the word of God," it will have its effect upon your heart.

II. The next precept is

"Be Wise."

What does that mean in this connection? It means, first, try to understand what you hear. Get to the bottom of it. Look it up; look it down; look it through. Look over it, but do not overlook it. When you have heard the words of the Gospel, say to yourself, "I would know what this Gospel is. With the ins and outs of it I am going to make myself acquainted, if the Lord will teach me. I will know what I must do to be saved, and why I must do it, and how it will save me." God give you thus to be wise, by getting an understanding of the Gospel!

Next, "Be wise:" that is, believe the Gospel as it comes from God. You will not be wise to doubt it; but you will be wise to believe it, for it is true, and sure. This is an age of doubt; it is in the air. No man is, nowadays, thought to have any sense if he does not doubt even the best established truths: and yet I do not think that it takes any great quantity of brain to be a doubter. With a very strong effort, I might manage to doubt—to doubt my father's word (I have never done it, mark you!): to doubt my brother's faithfulness; to doubt my wife's love to me. By such efforts I should doubt myself into an abyss of misery, and should become a glorious fool. To turn the power of doubting upon spiritual realities would be even more fatal; for that would take away my hope beyond the grave, and plunge me in despair. Doubt is sterile; it produces nothing; it destroys, but it cannot create.

Next, "be wise:" that is, be affected by what you have heard. Yield your heart up to the Word of God. Some people are they are more like stone than flesh. There are congregations where you may preach your own heart out, but you cannot get at their hearts. You might as well preach to the statues in St. Paul's Cathedral or Westminster Abbey as preach to them; they are impenetrable and immovable. He that is wise permits the truth to come into full contact with him. Be wise, my hearer! Yield yourself up to the truth; for it will do you good, and no harm. Do not resist it; do not evade it. Let the heavenly wind blow on you; for it brings healing. If it bids you hate sin, hate sin. If it bids you repent, repent. If it entreats you to believe, believe. Be what the Gospel is meant to make you.

Hard to Move;

Once more, "Be wise;" that is, take care do what you hear. Have you never seen people crowding into a place of worship? Do they in this place often press upon one another to hear the word? Yes, yes; and when they come, and they have heard it, what have they done with it? The great mass of them have done nothing with it. Did you ever go to a physician? Did you ever wait in the room of a great man? Did he hand you a prescription? Tell me, did you leave it on the table? Did you fold it up carefully, and put it into your pocket? Did you keep it there? Did you not take the medicine made up? Did you not take it? "No," you say, "I was satisfied with seeing the doctor." Dear friends, you smile at this description of folly; for it is such gross wisdom. Be wise, then; do not hear the Gospel in vain by neglecting its commands. If you know how to be saved, obey the command; do not be lost in darkness with light shining under your eyeballs. Do not go to hell with the words of heaven standing open before you. I say, you hear and be wise. Turn what you hear to speedy practice. God help you to do so for His mercy's sake!

III. Now comes the last of the precepts

"Guide Thine Heart

in the way." There is but one way. "I say," mark: that is to say, in the way of dominion; and this is one, and one only. Some people get comparing the different ways of salvation. This is frivolous and foolish; for he preaches any other than the one gospel is cursed. Suppose a man wants to go to York, and he says, "Well, I want to go to York; the road to London is a better road, and a shorter road." What matters the character of the road if it does not lead where you want to go? Say you want to go to York; then what road will you take? You do with any road but that which leads to York? There are many ways; but what will you do with any but the way everlasting? There is one royal road which leads to God, to eternal life, and, heaven. Never mind what other ways are or are not; go you the right way. Take the hilly road of Self-denial. Climb heaven on your hands and knees, if it must be; but make up your mind that you are going there by God's way.

That way is often described in the Scriptures. Shall I tell you what the Bible says about the way? Well, it calls it the way of the Lord. You are not in the right way unless you are with God day by day. A religion that has no God in it is irreligion. Atheism cannot lead you to heaven, nor can any form of deism, though it be baptized into the name of Christianity. If God be not Chief, Head, King, Lord, Sovereign, you are not in

The Right Road.

It is Christ's way, too; for He says, "I am the way." You are not on the right way unless Christ is first and last with you. His precious blood to put away your sin, His glorious resurrection to be your justification, His ascension to heaven to take possession of a place for His second coming to receive you to Himself—all these are the way. Christ is all in all to man who is on the right road. Note this!

Sometimes it is called the way of faith. It is the only way to heaven. Do what we will, we cannot mend the life which we have made; the flaws and fractures will appear. Justice demands punishment for past transgression. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." We are saved by grace through faith, as it is written, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, thou shalt be saved." The way of faith is the way to glory.

It is also called the way of holiness. My hearer, are you in that way? This is the high way, and it leads to the city of the living King. Do you hate sin? Do you follow righteousness? Would you scorn a lie? Do you keep your word even when it is to your personal loss? Do you endeavor to act fairly to your workmen, kindly to your servants, fully to your masters, uprightly to all? Yes.

el that you have erred, are you humbled ieved? Do you endeavor for the future and the point in which experience has l you to be weak? Do you watch against ation, and daily cry to God for strength come it? Depend upon it, he that would happy hereafter must be holy now.

road to glory is also called the "way of
" We must seek after peace of conscience, with God, peace with our fellowmen. If is to be peace, our way must be peace;
contented mind is a thing to cultivate.
n this way!

ne tell you two or three more things which le says about this way. It is

The Old Way.

ids us ask for the old paths. True reis no new thing. Your mother was saved; uld not doubt it. Be saved in the way led your mother safely. If there might ew way. I would not try it: one cannot af-do play experiments with the only soul he That which has saved those who have efore is quite good enough for me. I love nk of friends in glory: their footprints me. The moderns have struck out a new together; their road is both new and broad.

Were the saints of former ages all mis-
The martyrs—did they die for a false-and shed their blood for doctrines which m explodes? The men of whom the was not worthy, were they all the dupes ories which time has disproved? Were l-fashioned believers all wrong? No, my en, they were not wrong; their lives and leaths prove that they were right. We e wrong if we leave the old and tried paths ese new cuts which lead into fathomless f unbelief.

in, we are told in the Bible that it is

A "Narrow Way."

re expressly admonished that "Wide gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth truction, and many there be which go in t: because strait is the gate, and narthe way, which leadeth unto life." "Oh," one, "I like a man who is broad in his
' Do you? Possibly you are in the broad ourself; and if so, "a fellow-feeling makes adrous kind." How can you, in the teeth
y Scripture, admire the broad way? for it leads to destruction. "I cannot endure y views," cries one. Cannot you? Then are you going to do? Do you refuse to the narrow way? Yet that way leads to nd though "few there be that find it," I have thought it well worth your while to of the few.

I will not keep you much longer. I am eaking upon this third precept: you are your heart into your religion. In no busian a man prosper if he is half-hearted.
on without heart is a wretched affair.
nan who professes to fear the Lord, and ly puts half his heart into his godliness, ake a great failure of it. He is a poor, able creature who has enough religion to at his enjoying sin, and not enough to him enjoy holiness. He that goes right ie heart of godliness will be made happy but no one else.

A Story of Sour Apples.

How how the joy of religion is proportion-the degree of it, I sometimes tell a story.
parable most instructive, and fully to the
and therefore I cannot help repeating it.
story of a man in America who was fond owing the choicest apples. He asked a oor to come up to his orchard and taste ples, which he greatly praised as the best world. He asked him again and again, ill the friend did not come. He therefore that there must be a reason for his re-
"Well," said the other, "the truth is, that ay, as I was driving by your orchard, I an apple or two that had dropped into the and I picked up one and tasted it, and it at of sight the sourest thing in all creation.
very much obliged to you, but I have had h for one lifetime."

"Oh," said the owner, "do you know I went forty miles to buy those sour apples, and I planted them all along the hedge; for I thought they would be good for the boys, and keep them from picking and stealing. They are a fine sort for that particular purpose. But if you will come and see me, I will lead you inside the orchard, and you will find a sweetness and a flavor which will fill your mouth with delight." "I see," said the other, "I see." Do you also see my drift?
All around the outside of religion there are sour fruits of prohibitions, rebukes, repentances, and self-denials, to keep the hypocrites out. Have you never seen how long they pull their faces, as if their religion did not agree with them?
and that is because they have eaten the sour apples on the outskirts. But, oh! if you would come near to the faith and joy which are in Christ Jesus, if you would give all your heart to heavenly pursuits, you would find it quite another thing. Then would your heart "rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

The last word I have to say is, oh, that everyone here present who is not saved, would attend to these three precepts now!

Hear Now!

Make up your mind that if salvation is to be had, you will have it. Be wise at once, lest you be wise too late. Say, "It would be folly to delay; for I may soon be dead and buried. I will have Christ to-day, my mother's Christ, my father's God." Be wise, and cry to God to help you; cry for the Holy Spirit to enable you to lay hold on eternal life, and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ for immediate salvation. Trust him. Remember what I told you of Luther the other night, when he said, "I shall not save myself. Christ is a Saviour; it is His business to save." Put your soul into your Redeemer's hand. He is a Saviour, and He will save all who trust Him. I would do anything to draw you to the Lord Jesus, who is the way of life. We shall soon stand at God's great judgment seat, and I shall have to answer for my preaching. Therefore I entreat you to be wise. Why should I give in my account with grief? "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near." May the Lord lead you to do so, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

ONLY ONE REMEMBERED.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 17:
"Were there not ten cleansed? Where are the nine?" Luke 17: 17.

IT was a wild night on the Atlantic coast.
The storm swept in great gusts around Mon-tauk Point, carrying in its shrieking arms blinding masses of foam, caught from the white-capped waves far east of where they enter Long Island Sound.

"It's the foulest night we've hed in a dozen year," said old Matt Titus, captain of the life-saving crew at the extreme eastern headland of the island. "I thought as how I heerd a gun, sometime ago, Ben," he added, turning to a stout, bearded man, who stood beside him peering through the darkness.

"There! That was a gun, sure 'nuff, Cap," exclaimed the younger man, as the sullen boom of a small piece of ordnance came across the waves from a northerly direction.

Ben Wilson was patrol that night, or rather one of the two patrolmen on duty at the little station; for in thick weather the outlook for vessels is doubled. His keen ear again caught the sound of the gun.

"She's comin' right on, Cap, and she'll be driven on the shallows in an hour."

Off he dashed to the station which stood a couple of hundred yards back from the surf, the old captain following. The men were already up; they had been awakened by the violence of the gale, and were now in readiness for the captain's call.

"Out with the cart!" he cried, and six brawny fellows sped to the shafts of the machine that stood ready for instant service. "Jump her!
Jump her!" called out Ben, lustily. And the cart fairly flew over the heavy sand, impelled by the arms of the life-savers.

Boom! boom! went the gun. The flash could now be plainly seen illuminating for a moment the outline of a bark-rigged vessel that was dashing madly toward the shallows, where so many noble ships had found their graves. A moment more and there was a cry from her crew that could be distinctly heard on shore, even above the roar of the tempest. It was a bitter cry for help. Yet she could not be more than five hundred yards off. It was only a question of a very short time when that terrible pounding would break her in pieces. No ship, however staunch, could stand it an hour.

"Bear away, men! Out with the number seven line!" called Captain Titus, hoarsely, the flocks of foam dripping from his bushy gray beard.

The little brass gun belonging to the station was quickly placed in position, loaded, the shot-line attached, and as Ben, the mate, fired it, the swish of the metal could be heard as it hurtled through the air in a line for the distressed bark.
Just before firing, a rocket had been sent up to signal the bark's crew that help was at hand and to look out for the line.

"Will they catch it, captain, do you think?"
asked Ben, anxiously.

"God grant they may," said old Matt fervently. "It's a black night and they haven't many chances for their lives."

A shout told them that their prayer had been answered. The crew of the bark had caught the thin line and made it fast. And now the station men attached the "guide line," and the men on the doomed vessel, responding to another signal, began to haul in. It seemed an age before it was adjusted and then the slowest work of all—the paying out of the big hawser—began.
Captain Matt had decided promptly to use the "breeches buoy" to take the wrecked crew ashore. No boat, he well knew, could live a moment in such a surf.

Slowly and perilously the transfer from the bark to the shore was accomplished. First came the mate in the buoy, to test it and encourage the terror-stricken crew. Then, one by one, came the seamen. They had faced the gale for many hours and now that relief was at hand, they were like madmen in their desire to get ashore, and fought with each other, while the great rollers broke over the decks of the bark.
The captain, unable to control them, stood by his vessel till the last. Then he remembered, Joe, the cabin-boy, and looked about to find him.
The lad had been hurt by a sea that had almost swept him overboard and he lay, more dead than alive, and forgotten by all save his commander.
Joe was tucked safely in the buoy and was soon hidden by the blinding surf. On reaching shore, he was unconscious. Following him came the captain, who, as he stood safely on the beach and looked in the direction of his stranded and sinking vessel, seemed the picture of despair.

The sailors were kindly cared for by the hospitable station-men. Poor Joe, however, still lay unconscious, and was rubbed and pounded in the hope of bringing back the life that the cruel waves seemed to have washed out of his young body. As the long night drew to a close, the labors of the life-savers were rewarded, and the cabin-boy once more breathed naturally and then fell into a deep sleep from which he awoke strong and refreshed.

It was the morning of the holy Sabbath. The sea, calmed down after the gale, rode in gentle billows, and the skies were blue and peaceful.
The bark had utterly disappeared and hardly a trace of the frightful storm of the night remained. It was a mile to the nearest village and old Matt, with several of his men, was already preparing to go to service at the little white church when Joe peeped out of the window of the snug dormitory at the station. The color had come back to his face and as he looked around, he saw Ben standing beside him.

"Well, my lad;" said the hardy life-saver,
"You're all right, are you not?"

"Yes," replied the cabin boy. "I feel just a bit shaky, but I'm able to get up. Are those the church bells we hear?"

The Cathedral of Buenos Ayres. The Scene of the Battle of July 27th.

"Yes, some of our men are going to the village. Are you strong enough to come?"

"Oh, I should so like to go!" replied Joe. "I want to thank God for bringing us all out of that awful gale."

Just then Captain Titus entered. When he heard what the lad had said, he smiled.

"My boy," he began, taking the brown hand in his own knotty fist, "That's right. Never forget what you owe to the good God who is always watching for his children on the sea as well as on the land. Your mates have gone;—never mind," he added as the cabin-boy expressed surprise. "They left this morning in a hurry. I tried to get them to stay with us over to-day, and come to the little chapel where we worship, but they reckoned not. The captain said he had to look after the ship's insurance; I think it would pay to look after the men's souls as well. Now, if you're ready, we'll go. I have a little trap here and we'll drive over, for you're not strong enough yet to walk."

The wreck and the rescue had been the morning talk of the village and the church was crowded. In his sermon, the preacher feelingly alluded to the peril of the previous night and to the duty of thankfulness to our Heavenly Father for his care of those who go down to the sea in ships. And all eyes were turned on the pale cabin-boy who sat in Captain Matt's pew, and whose young, sweet voice joined in the simple hymn of praise. But the nine who had been saved with him were far away from the scene of thanksgiving.

"Now, my lad," said Ben the mate, as they drove back to the station, "never forget that you owe God a life, and that wherever you may go, you must always do something for him. It may only be to throw rope, or lend a hand, or pull an oar, but be sure you do it, my boy, no matter whether you get thanks from the world for it or not. Let those be ungrateful who will, but don't you ever forget Him, and depend on't, He won't forget you in your hour of danger when the storm is blackest and the gale is singing a requiem in the ship's shrouds."

"I never will," said the cabin boy solemnly,

As he spoke he looked seaward, and the light of the sun, reflected on the bosom of the Atlantic illumined his face with a glory that seemed like that of the angels,

THE ARGENTINE REVOLUTION.

THE news received last week that a revolution had occurred in the Argentine Republic did not take the public altogether by surprise. Signs of popular discontent have been manifest for a year, and on July 26, culminated in open revolt. The troops in the garrison of Buenos Ayres refused to obey orders, and marched on the government building (a picture of which appeared in this journal on February 19.) The city police and a handful of soldiers who remained loyal to the government, defended the building with extraordinary valor. Fighting continued all day Sunday, and the advantage was with the insurgents. The president withdrew from the capital until reinforcements could be brought up from the provinces. But disaffection had spread. One battalion summoned to repress the rebellion went over to the insurgents with arms and baggage. "On Monday the Navy also joined in the revolt, and trained its guns on the government building. Some of them being fired struck the Cathedral on the other plaza and did considerable damage.

As matters were growing serious and an armistice was arranged with the insurgents, and the cessation of hostilities the representation of the United States and other countries attempted to mediate. Wednesday a telegram received stating that order had been restored. The President had returned, and the government was exercising its functions as usual.

The revolt has been well described in the hot journal. "The government and people have been moving too rapidly. They have been in too great haste to develop the resources of the country. The building of docks, the construction of long lines of railroads, and other costly enterprises have been taken on borrowed capital. The country is too thinly settled and the commerce is too immature to render them immediately profitable. Ultimately they will unquestionably yield large profits. In the meantime, however, the capitalists who lent the money wanted interest and dividends. They had stipulated for payment in gold and of this commodity the government had scant supply. The total cost of the government and the railroads is said to be over a thousand millions of dollars. The interest on a large part of this had to be raised by taxation. The burden has been equally distributed, would have been heavy, but it was rendered more intolerable by the peculiar situation. There are a large number of newly settled immigrants in the Argentine Republic and these were attracted there by several inducements, one of which was that for ten years they should be exempt from taxation. The sum required from the individuals was therefore disproportionate to their means.

It is never difficult to stir up disaffection against a government when the tax-collector makes frequent and large demands. Near revolutions in history have originated from financial problems. The working men minated in open revolt. The troops in the garrison of Buenos Ayres refused to obey orders, and marched on the government building (a picture of which appeared in this journal on February 19.) The city police and a handful of soldiers who remained loyal to the government, defended the building with extraordinary valor. Fighting continued all day Sunday, and the advantage was with the insurgents. The president withdrew from the capital until reinforcements could be brought up from the re swept into al treasury to national credily convinced overnment is t if not cor-begins to think ange of gov-might be bene-lissatisfaction ads and ripens lution. This uation in the Republic.

hedral of Bue-a picture of here given,
the north side
a that formed ground. It is ent structure ual in size to ated Cathedral Dame in Paris.
ating capacity persons. It he site of the commenced by Garay in 1580.
nt edifice was l in 1752. The with its twelve columns is a ition. In 1862 num was beausculptured bas commemorare-union of Ayres with the rovinces. An te subject for nd in the scene of Joseph embracing
ren. (Genesis 45:15).

Celmann, whose portrait is here given,
h President of the Argentine Republic.
ected in August, 1886, and inaugurated tober following. He succeeded Presi-a, who was his brother-in-law. Roca dier who fought his way to the Presinair, but Celmann was a civilian, a phys-rofession, and a man of considerable and culture. The Presidential term is The area of the country over which covers 1,204,486 square miles (about the size of the United States) and has ion of nearly four millions.

BUILDING OF THE TABERNACLE.

(See Illustration.)

romised last week, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD now have on this age a picture showing the stage on to completion, that the new Brooklyn le had reached on the first of this
If they will compare it with the picture splendid structure which appeared in nal on May 14th, they will see that it is e way to realization. The progress is than appears at first sight, because the the foundations below the level of nd has been done, and that, as everyws, is a very tedious, as it is a very impart of the building.
cture, which has been sketched on the by our own artist, must be eminently g to our readers, because it is largely eir efforts that the edifice is in the ad-state there indicated. They have availed es of the opportunity placed in their y the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERd have supplied the treasurer of the cle with the funds necessary to prose-work. They have also the gratification ng increased Dr. Talmage's opportunifulness by multiplying the number ers of the journal he edits, and by giver circulation to the soul-stirring ser-e delivers.
y be hoped that this practical proof of ver of individual effort will encourage Present Stage of the Brooklyn Tabernacle Building.

every reader to persevere. There should be no relaxation of effort until the topstone is put in its place on the summit of the edifice, and every dollar of the cost is paid. That so much has been done already, inspires us with confidence that complete success will be achieved. It can be done if every individual reader will do his utmost. It will be a noble achievement to accomplish, noble in itself and noble as a tribute to the great preacher. In future years, when the tale is told of the pastor mourning over the ruins of his burned church, and it is related how the people who appreciated his genius, his labors, and his devotion, came to his rescue and rebuilt his Tabernacle, the words which the prophet used in a greater sense will seem not inappropriate: "They gave him beauty for ashes, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

Written expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 494.)

SUSPENSE.

ON the same evening that the lawyer and his wife discussed the possibility of Howard Wescott becoming engaged to Miss Addie More, and what effect such an engagement would have on the young man, the couple in question were walking through the city suburbs by moonlight. Wescott had joined Miss More after the service, and was escorting her to her home. They seemed to be enjoying the walk, and as if they were willing to prolong it, for they took the long way by the river, and stopped frequently to watch the play of the moonbeams on the water.

It is no doubt true that men and women seldom, if ever, realize their ideals of marital felicity, not because they are positively unhappy, or acknowledge even to themselves that they have been disappointed in their choice of a partner, but because all of us are weak and human, and cannot attain that perfection with which the romantic fancies of youthful love clothe us. Married life usually becomes prosaic enough, the struggle for bread often taking the place of love's fond dream, and all too soon both husband and wife find that the other is intensely human. Shall we, therefore, decry all romance, and tell two young lovers standing on the river-bank in the city of Basserrine, on that Sunday night, that all their sweet hopes are mere chimeras, appearing so beautiful only because "distance lends enchantment to the view?" We would not be so cruel as to disenchant them. Let them indulge their young dreams. The waking will not hurt them, if they have the true metal in them. In the future, whether it brings joy or sorrow, they will often look back to this moonlight scene, when they lived in "The twilight that surrounds

The border-land of old romance."

and they will be the better for the retrospect.

Howard left Miss More at the gate of her own residence on Elm Avenue, after making an appointment for a lecture, and then hurried home. A glance at the house in which she lived with her parents, a sister and two brothers, showed the young man that she was not wealthy, though in comfortable circumstances, and would, therefore, have to be loved for her own sake, if at all, for no dowry, of any extent, could be expected with her. He was rather glad it was so. No glitter of gold would tarnish his motives, he thought, conscious of the mixed character of his metaphor. "What's gold compared to a girl worth gold?" he mused, on the way home.

The next Friday evening he had occasion to go to the railway station on some business for his brother-in-law, when he met Robert Heritage with his "grip" in his hand, ready to take the train, which would be due in a few minutes.

"Ah! You are off for a trip, are you?"

Heritage's face flushed a little as he replied: "I'm going to run over to Crawley. Will be back to-morrow in the afternoon."

"Well, I'm glad you don't intend to stay over Sunday, for I should scarcely care to go to the Bible-class if you were not there."

"Look out for your motives, Wescott," laughed Heritage, "and be careful you don't think more of the teacher than of the teaching. 'It's not an unworthy mortal,' he continued, seriously, "who can save you; nothing but the truth can do that, the truth as it is in Christ."

"But it makes a good deal of difference through what kind of a channel the truth comes to one," maintained Howard. "You remember the colored preacher's remark in giving out before the collection, the hymn 'Salvation's free,' 'that is quite true, brethren, but much depends on the conduit. You have to pay for that according to its worth and power.'"

Heritage smiled and nodded his head, but he said: "Oh! pure water is just as good whether you drink it out of a gourd or a silver goblet, isn't it?"

"Perhaps; but I should prefer them clean and sweet, or I shouldn't care to drink out of either of them."

"Ha! ha!" broke merrily from Heritage's lips. "I fancy you would use a filter in any case. Well, good-bye. Don't fail to come to the class on Sunday;" and he swung himself aboard the train, which was just beginning its gliding movement from the station.

On the train Heritage's thought ran: "Wescott is a noble young fellow. It is a pity that such talent, such sincerity, such large-heartedness have not been devoted to the service of Christ. How useful he might be! And then a man's responsibility is commensurate with the talents God has entrusted him with, and his punishment must be correspondingly severe, if he misuse them. I must do what I can to win the gifted fellow. By the way "he continued," I saw him with Miss More at the service last Sunday evening. If I mistake not, that is the beginning of an intimacy that may end in a genuine love-affair. What a splendid match it would be, if they were both Christians! But as it is—well—I feel disturbed for Wescott; in fact, I'm not quite easy in my mind about either of them, for knowing what I do know about Miss Addie More's attitude toward Christianity, I fear a little for their influence on each other. Well, I cannot interfere without appearing officious, and must let matters take their own course."

Heritage's thoughts then drifted to his own affairs, which at that time were of an engrossing character. It had been almost two months since his last visit to Crawley. First, he had been compelled to go East to settle up some matters relative to the old family estate, and then, after his return, Metta had informed him that she was going away on a month's visit. But she had now returned, and it was with contending emotions of fear and hope that he was on his way to keep an appointment with her at her home. He felt that he had some cause for apprehension. During the past two months, her letters had come fitfully, and were, moreover, couched in formal and even frigid phrases, lacking that naïve outspoken quality that had characterized her communications before his last visit, and that had often set his pulses throbbing wildly. He could not think what had occurred. However, he would soon know. He was fully resolved to make his declaration on this visit.

Her greeting that evening when he called was courteous, but scarcely cordial, as he noted with a pang. Her manner was more or less constrained, though she tried to throw off the bonds that seemed to hold her natural vivacity in check. Heritage was puzzled, and although his confession of love rose to his lips more than once, he restrained himself, feeling that the time was not opportune. They tried to discuss a number of themes of mutual interest, but the conversation often became strained, because the subjects were foreign to their thoughts. She played several selections from Bachman, though not with her wonted lightness of touch. At last, having proposed a drive into the country on the morrow—an offer she accepted with a slight flush of embarrassment—he took his leave.

At nine o'clock the next morning his carriage stood at the curb before her door. As he helped her into the seat, he noticed how unnaturally pale her face was, the wild rose hue having vanished from her cheeks. Still the dark blue disk of her eyes shone, and she was more lovely than ever, clad in a costume of some mezzo-tinted stuff, with no ornament save a white rosebud on her bosom.

They had soon left the town behind them, and were slowly climbing a hill, up whose long slope the yellow road wound in graceful loops and curves, and then descended on the other side to a wide valley with a flexuous creek and vari-colored meadows and upland fields. From the hill-top it was a magnificent stretch of scenery, holding the spectators spell-bound. The air was redolent with the odor of clover-blossoms, wild flowers bedizened the fields, the meadow-larks were giving their flute concerts, while in the woodland beyond a hollow the brown-thrush carolled gaily. It was a day for love and romance. Metta's feeling of constraint soon wore off under the combined wizardry of the bright sunshine and green landscapes, and she held her own in the conversation with more freedom than on the previous evening, while her cheeks began to glow like damask roses.

"This scene reminds me of the one we admired so much on our way home from the Commencement almost a year ago," remarked Heritage. "Do you remember?"

Did she not remember? Was not every incident of those epochal days when she first met the man by her side, stamped indelibly on her memory? And yet what sorrow, what misgiving they had brought her! She was glad, however, that he had referred to the college Commencement, for she had determined on the use of a little finesse, if opportunity afforded. She felt justified in resorting to these tactics, for her woman's intuition told her that he was bent on bringing matters to a crisis during that drive. Step by step she adroitly led the conversation up to the time when they stood together on the street of Constans after they had been introduced by Professor Detwold.

"Isn't it strange how trifles will impress themselves on one's mind?" she said; and looking at him furtively, she added: "For instance, as we were separating that evening, I remember a tall brunette who passed by and looked at you as if she meant to transfix you with her black eyes. Her presence seemed to disturb you a little, I remember."

Again a vivid flush shot over Heritage's visage. Metta noticed it, and a pang flew to her heart. "I'm afraid he is guilty," was her mental comment. Then she added aloud: "I have often wondered if you knew her."

"Yes—I knew her during my college days," he admitted, with apparent reluctance.

"Ah! that is the reason you were so disconcerted by her sudden appearance, was it?" said Metta, as if she meant to banter him. "Perhaps your relations with her were—" She hesitated.

"My relations with her were not wholly pleasant, I acknowledge. I'm afraid both of us were foolish, and—and— But I don't care to discuss the affair. It—it stirs unhappy memories. Just now, Miss Chapman, my thoughts are engrossed with the present."

Had he been aware of the construction she would put upon his faltering, half-incoherent sentences and embarrassed manner, he would have spoken more frankly and explained the unhappy episode of his college life fully; but the twinges of conscience that that event had caused him for so many years made him loath to dwell upon it. Metta's face grew pale. He could not explain; he had been false to Dolly Pressley, and had broken her heart; and now he was not even honorable enough to acknowledge his fickleness and deception. So her thoughts ran. And yet when she looked up into his face, she could scarcely believe that a man who seemed so frank and honorable, could be guilty of an act of duplicity; he did not look like a heartless man, an unprincipled flirt, such as her suspicions had painted him.

But when an hour later, as they were driving in the cool shade of some over-arching trees, around the spur of a hill, he tried to take her hand, she withdrew it kindly but firmly. In his consternation he broke out into an avowal of love, making such a confession of his heart's yearning for her as only an honorable man can make to the woman of his choice. She listened in mute distress, her heart prompting her to accept his proffer of love, but her reason at war with her heart's decision. No; she could not accept him now; and her courage failed when she thought of asking him about his relations with Dolly Pressley.

"You must wait a week or two for my answer," she said. "I must consult my parents first, and besides—but I will write you my decision as soon as possible."

He drove back to town in a tumult of agony. He could not but admit that Miss Chapman was justified in taking time to consider a question of such momentous importance. It was right, too, that she should consult her parents as she had said; but he felt that if there had been no barrier, she would have given him some ground for hope. As it was, all he could do was to wait patiently for her reply. A woman would have had more tact, and would have perceived where the difficulty lay; but our sex is generally blind in such matters.

The next day he returned to Bassett. It was hard to bear the suspense, especially when he remembered the mysterious constraint that had been so palpable in Miss Chapman's manner; but with his characteristic decision and unselfishness he put aside his own trouble and soon became absorbed in the preparation of his Bible lesson for the next day, for it was one of peculiar interest. Perhaps he may say a word that would drive the arrow of conviction through the armor of his sceptical pose, whose spiritual welfare he had so much heart.

His joy can be better imagined than described when young Wescott said to him the next morning, as they walked together along the street after the service:

"Heritage, the lesson to-day has made a deep impression on my mind. I can't describe the feelings that stirred me while you were speaking. You explained the proper use of our talents; that they have been entrusted to us by God for His service and that we are culpable guilty of the sin of misappropriation, as you call it, if we employ them merely for ourselves. Now, I want you to understand how an honest doubter puts the case to his own mind. Well, I am not wholly convinced that your premises are true, for I am still in doubt as to the inspiration of the Bible and—if you can believe in even of the existence of God; yet if your premises are true—and they may be, for all I know—I am guilty of a great wrong. I am robbing God and am more culpable than the man of the parable who buried his talents, for I have been appropriating mine to my own selfish purposes. Now, the first question to be decided is this: Are your premises correct? Is there a God? Has He these claims upon us?"

"You are very logical. I assure you that this is a way—"

"I know what you would recommend," intimated Howard. "Yesterday I read the last installment of your story as far as it has been published. It describes the 'conversion' you call it, of a doubter, and is positively thrilling. The scene haunts me. I couldn't sleep last night for thinking of it. Before my father I could see the poor man, in his lonely retreat on the mountain side, wrestling with doubt, confessing his sin, crying to God for help, and finally struggling through the awful mental darkness into the wonderful light. Why, sir, I almost followed him into that radiance, and then the darkness settled about me again, only it seemed more like the palpable gloom of Erebus than ever before. Heritage, I want you to tell me whether that scene was a real occurrence or pure invention." Howard's lips quivered as he put the interrogatory.

"It was real, Wescott; it was my own experience."

"What!"

"In that scene I have merely described the mental throes through which I myself have passed."

Howard grasped his companion's arm and pressed it hard against his side with a love and longing that could not be told, while the former gathered over his eyes and choked his words.

"I felt that there must be a good deal of autobiography in that story, or you never could have written as you did. That is the secret of its power over me. Of course, it has not wholly convinced me; the unbelief is still in my heart, rendering me as those old demoniacs of New Testament times were rent; but I long for assurance you seem to feel, and that the sceptical character of the story gained. Do you think that experience is for every one—for me?"

"Whosoever will," quoted Heritage, solemnly. "Him that cometh to Me, I will in nowise cast out!"

"Ah, I see! No proviso is made except that we come," murmured Howard.

(To be Continued.)

ONAL WITCH CONVERTED
 A literary illustration of the power in the conversion of a witch is furnished by Rev. O. saw the woman in 1885, a witch recent visit, and was amazed which had occurred. He ne of the services we held in en I was there in 1885, a witch present. She sat on the floor or, so that she could go away at. During the service some er, and at once she ran away. el and I went to visit a heathen o miles distant. There was a d crowds of people had come e coming of age of the chief's his female witch doctor had or to perform some certain o make the girl lucky, and to m her all evil spirits. These e performed before our arrival. there the great heathen dance gun. The women and girls eir heathen finery, and each ai and dancing shield. The e was decorated beyond all the e jumped, and leaped, and e changed the chant and step e seemed like one possessed I gazed upon her I wondered e to save a woman like her. t up to God that His Divine aw even her to Christ. Last n the people came to salute urn to the country, I noticed as very much affected when I and then Daniel told me this doctor, now sitting at the feet hed, and in her right mind. spirit had come upon her, and eep away from the services."

THE PEACEMAKER.

in Exeter Hall, London, was ed recently in the sequel to a fight was stopped. An el-an, who related the story, said: as a little girl was going to y two boys fighting. Instead e street and getting out of the e boldly up to them, and put n each asked them to be oys were very much taken d before they knew exactly e doing they shook hands, themselves friends again. But t done with them, she asked ould go with her to the Sun- The boys had enough of the e adolescence in them to be grati- itation of that kind from a ll dressed girl, and they ac- r. The lads stuck to the school e learned to love Christ. They ed and received into the ntually both gave themselves work, and when one of them or the Foreign Mission field, ed himself too and they went After many years work they to their native land again. e to see the two boys who ends that Sunday by the little gentleman asked in conclus- yes," from all parts of the is one," said the speaker, nd on the white head of a d on the platform near him, ouching his own breast, "is nd the little girl? Well she is nder in the gallery. About go she became my wife."

PRISONED PRISONER.

not God pardon the sinner nts?" is a question often ask- ists who insist on the necessi- he atoning blood of Christ. k the question forget that jus- that sin must be punished. e the fact in human govern- not see its necessity in the nment of the world. The fol- nt was recently used by Mr. cessful Scottish evangelist, to eiple on which the atonement said: "A provost in Lanark- boy had a special friend from scarcely ever separate. When ol they were both apprenticed to the business of weaving, which was then the staple industry of the ward in which he lived. One of them signed the temperance pledge, but the other refused to do so. When their native town was created a burgh, the former was elected a councillor, then a baillie, and ultimately a provost.

One day a prisoner was brought before him, whom he at once recognized as his old friend. At the same time the prisoner recognized the provost, and at once came to the conclusion that his punishment would not be severe. The prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty," saying he was drunk at the time and remembered nothing about the misdeed with which he was charged. It was however, clearly proved, and the provost, rising in his place, said he had no other alternative but to inflict the extreme penalty of the law, sixty days' imprisonment or $25 fine. The prisoner was wonder-struck at the severity of the sentence, but before he had recovered from the shock he received another, by the provost taking the money from his pocket-book, saying, as he handed it to the fiscal, 'The law is honored by the payment of this money.' Then turning to the prisoner, he invited him to come to his house after the adjournment of the court. There he reasoned with him and prayed with him, and induced him to sign the pledge. As it was in the provost's power to discharge the prisoner, for old companionship's sake, many persons would think that in imposing the fine and paying it himself he wasted his money. But the provost had respect to the majesty of the law, which he felt it to be his duty to vindicate. That is the lesson we learn from the sacrifice of the only begotten Son of God that "He might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." (Rom. 3: 26.)

A LOST ESTATE.

AN eminent preacher gives the following account of a domestic crisis which had a happy issue. He says: "I was once residing with some wealthy people who owned two estates in the district. One day I saw a carriage, drawn by two gray horses, drive up to the door, and two strange gentlemen came out, and after their departure I noticed that my entertainers, seemed very much troubled. Some of them retired upstairs, and when they came back it was evident from their appearance that they had been weeping. Then they told the whole matter. The gentlemen whom I had seen were lawyers sent by their aunt. Many years before, their father was seriously ill, and not expected to recover. His sister had come and nursed him most tenderly, and so touched the patient with her kindness that he said she should have one of his estates, by will if he died, and by gift if he recovered. He did recover, through her gentle nursing. She left his house, and soon afterwards left the country for foreign travel from which she had just returned and now she sent her lawyers to take possession of the promised estate. Her brother, now an old man, considered it his duty to act up to his promise, and the estate was to be given up to his sister, and this was the cause of the grief among his daughters. When I had heard their story I said, 'I have an estate, far larger than the one which your aunt claims, and my Elder Brother is taking care of it for me. It is of that estate that I am going to speak in the church to-morrow. Will you come and hear about it?' Next day six of them came, though the snow was falling heavily. At that service every one of the six gave their hearts to Jesus. When last I wrote to one of them I asked, 'What of the lost estate?' 'It matters little about it now,' was the reply. 'It is in the family still, and we are thinking far more of our heavenly one than of it; and had it not been for the loss of it we might never have gained our heavenly possessions.'"

A CONVERTS LOAN.

"BUSINESS is business and religion is religion; I keep them distinct," is an expression very commonly used; but some of God's children have found that there is neither need nor advantage in keeping the two apart. There are thousands who have proved in their own business experience that God keeps His promise. "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He will direct thy paths. (Prov. 3: 6.) An instance in point is furnished by a Christian pastor in Austria who says: "Last spring a farmer was introduced to us through one of our regular attendants. He listened very attentively to our Bible readings. Soon after he lost almost all his little fortune by the dishonesty of a lawyer. He came to me and with tears told me his great trouble. His house and land were to be sold, and in a short time he, with his wife and six or seven children, would be homeless. I read to him the promise, 'If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that ye shall ask, it shall be done for them by My Father who is in heaven.' Then we knelt down together and prayed. On his way home he called upon an acquaintance, a man who formerly led a most dissolute life, but who for many months has been a regular attendant at our meetings. This man was led by the Lord to offer to lend the needed sum of money to the poor peasant, and thus our prayers were answered. The man's thankfulness was great. He has often said it was most remarkable that the Lord so overruled all, that he became acquainted with His Word before his misfortunes came. In his dark state he would probably have drowned himself, as, alas! so many here do. He has been the means also of enlightening his wife and family and some of his neighbors."

200,000

Estey Organs have been sold in the last fifty years.

An enormous number! No other Organ has been so popular. No other Organ has had such a sale.

We want to secure the best conception of 200,000 Organs. We ask some reader of this paper to give us an illustration of the number 200,000 which will show how great it is.

Here is one specimen illustration.

"Allowing 40 minutes to load an organ on a team, deliver it at the railroad depot, and return to the factory for the next organ, it would take 45 years to ship them all."

This is a good illustration. Perhaps you can do better. Will you not try?

ESTEY ORGAN CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

Branch Offices: 159 Tremont Street, Boston. 831 Broadway, New York. 18 North 7th Street, Philadelphia. State and Jackson Streets, Chicago. 916 Olive Street, St. Louis. Marietta and Broad Sts., Atlanta, Ga.

An interesting Book of Facts (containing 24 pages with 46 illustrations) entitled, How Large is 200,000, will be mailed free; one copy to one address.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

FRUIT DIET Is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds, in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 777 Broadway, New York City.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts. If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address. CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING. SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cts. a bottle

BEECHAM'S PILLS cure bilious and nervous ills. BEECHAM'S PILLS cure sick-headache.

Peculiar

To itself in many important particulars, Hood's Sarsaparilla is different from and superior to any other medicine.

Peculiar in combination, proportion and preparation of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the full curative value of the best known remedies of the vegetable kingdom.

Peculiar in its medicinal merit, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown.

Peculiar in strength and economy—Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "100 doses one dollar." Medicines in larger and smaller bottles require larger doses, and do not produce as good results as Hood's Sarsaparilla. Peculiar in its "good name at home"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell, where it is made, than of all other blood purifiers.

Peculiar in its phenomenal record of sales abroad, no other preparation has ever attained such popularity in so short a time. Do not be induced to take any other preparation. Be sure to get

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

EVERY MOTHER

Should Have It in The House.

Dropped on Sugar, Children Love

to take JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cramps and Pains. Relieves all Summer Complaints, Cuts and Bruises like magic. Sold everywhere. Price 35c. by mail; 6 bottles Express paid, $2. L. S. JOHNSON & CO., Boston, MASS.

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING on your Boots and Shoes.

Sold by all Dealers.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS HAPPY. DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED.

Any Lady Can Now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting Dresses.

No one using a Chart or Square can compete with The McDowell Garment Drafting Machine in Cutting Stylish, Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Garments. Easy to Learn, Rapid to Use, Fits any Form, Follows every Fashion. An invention as Useful as the Sewing Machine. Free 30 days to test at your own home. Send for Illustrated Circular.

THE MCDOWELL CO. 6 West 14th Street, New York City. We know the machinery to be thoroughly reliable, and that these machines are a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

BAILEY'S

Compound light-spreading Silver-plated Corrugated Glass

REFLECTORS

A wonderful invention for lighting Churches

Halls, etc., Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.

BAILEY REFLECTOR CO.

108 Penn Ave. Pittsburgh, Pa.

METAL CEILINGS.

BEST for Churches, old or new; for Schools, Stores and Residences. ARTISTIC

H. S. NORTROP, 18 Rose Street, New York.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.

Van Houten's Cocoa

The Original--Most Soluble.

Ask your Grocer for it, take noother. [65]

Sample Vial "RUBIFOAM" sent free by E. W. HOYT & CO., Lowell, Mass.

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Talmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by T. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $3. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN FERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890. In the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

XIII., No. 33. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PICTURES OF SCENES IN DAMASCUS. (From Photographs Brought from Syria by Dr. Talmage.)
MANN IN PLACE OF MANNA. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER: A Novel Aim for a Pension—A Boy's Dangerous Jump, Etc.
WHITE AND GOLD. A Story of the S.S. Text.

PICTURE OF A STREET IN PORTO ALEGRE.
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. By P. W. E.
PREVAILING PRAYER. S.S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
MEETINGS MID-WEEK, Etc. By Dr. Talmage.
A Blind Convert—A Dying Chief's Song—America Helping Europe—Fidelity of African Converts—Three Indian Types, Etc.
A SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S EVENTS. (Illustr'd.)

A JOYFUL PASTOR. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
PORTRAITS OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES IN BRAZIL.
PICTURE OF A GROUP OF LIBERATED SUDANESE SLAVES. (From a Photograph.)
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev. Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)

SCENES IN MODERN DAMASCUS FROM PHOTOGRAPHS SECURED BY DR. TALMAGE.

1. The Leper Refuge on the Reputed Site of the House of Naaman—2. Inner Court of a Damascus House—3. An Arab Family Group at Supper.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

CORN IN PLACE OF MANNA.

"And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land." Joshua 5: 12.

The Celestial Commissariat—The Two Batches of Bread Kneaded by Angelic Fingers—Its Cessation Its Place Supplied from the Deserted Barns—
I. God Sends Especial Relief for Especial Emergency—The Crisis in the Wilderness—The Crisis of the Christian Life—Christ's Help in Sickness—In Sorrow—A Woman's Humiliation in Ohio—
II. Gospel Corn for Ordinary Circumstances—A Dietary Experience in Paris—The Only Food for a Hungry Soul—The Infidel's Diet—How the Gospel Corn was Prepared—Its Characteristics—A Ship Aground on Long Island Coast.

ONLY those who have had something to do with the commissariat of an army know what a job it is to feed and clothe five or six hundred thousand men. Well, there is such a host as that marching across the desert. They are cut off from all army supplies. There are no rail-trains bringing down food or blankets. Shall they all perish? No. The Lord comes from heaven to the rescue, and He touches the shoes and the coats which in a year or two would have been worn to rags and tatters, and they become storm-proof and time-proof, so that, after forty years of wearing, the coats and the shoes are as good as new. Besides that, every morning there is a shower of bread, not sour and soggy, for the rising of that bread is made in heaven, and celestial fingers have mixed it, and rolled it into balls, light, flaky, and sweet, as though they were the crumbs thrown out from a heavenly banquet. Two batches of bread made every day in the upper mansion—one for those who sit at the table with the King, and the other for the marching Israelites in the wilderness.

I do not very much pity the Israelites for the fact that they had only manna to eat. It was, I suppose,

The Best Food Ever Provided.

I know that the ravens brought food to Elijah; but I should not so well have liked those black waiters. Rather would I have the fare that came down every morning in buckets of dew—clean, sweet, God-provided edibles. But now the Israelites have taken their last bit of it in their fingers, and put the last delicate morsel of it to their lips. They look out, and there is no manna. Why this cessation of heavenly supply? It was because the Israelites had arrived in Canaan, and they smelled the breath of the harvest-fields, and the crowded barns of the country were thrown open to them. All the inhabitants had fled, and in the name of the Lord of Hosts the Israelites took possession of every thing. Well, the threshing-floor is cleared, the corn is scattered over it, the oxen are brought around in lazy and perpetual circuit until the corn is trampled loose; then it is winnowed with a fan, and it is ground and it is baked, and, lo! there is enough bread for all the worn-out host. "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land."

From among the mummies of Egypt, and Canaan have been brought grains of corn, exactly like our Indian corn, and recently planted, they have produced the same kind of corn, with which we are familiar. So I am not sure which kind of grain my text refers to, but all the same is the meaning.

Relief in Emergency.

The bisection of this subject leads me, first, to speak of especial relief for especial emergency; and, secondly, of the old corn of the Gospel for ordinary circumstances.

If these Israelites crossing the wilderness had not received bread from the heavenly bakeries, there would, first, have been a long line of dead children half buried in the sand; then, there would have been a long line of dead women waiting for the jackals; then, there would have been a long line of dead men unburied, because there would have been no one to bury them. It would have been told in the history of the world that a great company of good people started out from Egypt for Canaan, and were never heard of, as thoroughly lost in the wilderness of sand as the City of Boston and the President were lost in the wilderness of waters. What use was it to them that there was plenty of corn in Canaan, or plenty of corn in Egypt?

What they wanted was something to eat right there, where there was not so much as a grass-blade. In other words, an especial supply for an especial emergency. That is what some of you want. The ordinary comfort, the ordinary direction, the ordinary counsel, do not seem to meet your case. There are those who feel that they must have an omnipotent and immediate supply, and you shall have it.

Pain and Sorrow.

Is it pain and physical distress through which you must go? Does not Jesus know all about pain? Did He not suffer it in the most sensitive part of head and hand and foot? He has a mixture of comfort, one drop of which shall cure the worst paroxysm. It is the same grace that soothed Robert Hall when, after writhing on the carpet in physical tortures, he cried out, "Oh! I suffered terribly, but I didn't cry out while I was suffering, did I? Did I cry out?" There is no such nurse as Jesus—His hand the gentlest, his foot the lightest, His arm the strongest. For especial pang especial help.

Is it approaching sorrow? Is it long, shadowing bereavement that you know is coming, because the breath is short, and the voice is faint, and the cheek is pale? Have you been calculating your capacity or incapacity to endure widowhood or childlessness or a disbanded home, and cried, "I can not endure it?" Oh, worried soul, you will wake up amidst all your troubles, and find around about you the sweet consolation of the Gospel as thickly strewn as was the manna around about the Israelitish encampment! Especial solace for especial distress.

Or is it a trouble past, yet present? A silent nursery? A vacant chair opposite you at the table? A musing upon a broken family circle never again to be reunited? A choking sense of loneliness? A blot of grief so large that it extinguishes the light of sun, and puts out bloom of flower, and makes you reckless as to whether you live or die? Especial comfort for that especial trial. Your appetite has failed for everything else. Oh, try a little of this wilderness manna: "I will never leave thee, I will never forsake thee." "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee." Or is it the grief of A Dissipated Companion?

There are those here who have it, so I am not speaking in the abstract, but to the point. You have not whispered it, perhaps, to your most intimate friend; but you see your home going away gradually from you, and unless things change soon it will be entirely destroyed. Your grief was well depicted by a woman, presiding at a woman's meeting in Ohio, when her intoxicated husband staggered up to the platform, to her overwhelming mortification and the disturbance of the audience, and she pulled a protruding bottle from her husband's pocket, and held it up before the audience, and cried out, "There is the cause of my woe! There are the tears and the life-blood of a drunkard's wife!" And then, looking up to heaven, she said, "How long, O Lord! how long?" and then, looking down to the audience, cried, "Do you wonder I feel strongly on this subject? Sisters, will you help me?" And hundreds of voices responded, "Yes, yes, we will help you."

You stand, some of you, in such a tragedy today. You can not even ask him to stop drinking. It makes him cross, and he tells you to mind your own business. Is there any relief in such a case? Not such as is found in the rigmarole of comfort ordinarily given in such cases. But there is a relief that drops in manna from the throne of God. Oh, lift up your lacerated soul in prayer, and you will get omnipotent comfort! I do not know in what words the soothing influence may come, but I know that for especial grief there is especial deliverance. I give you two or three passages; try them on; take that which best fits your soul: "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." "All things work together for good to those who love God." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I know there are those who, when they try to comfort people, always bring the same stale sentiment about the usefulness of trial. Instead of bringing up a new plaster for a new wound, and fresh manna for fresh hunger, they rummage their haversack to find some crumb of old consolation, when from horizon to horizon the ground is white with the new-fallen manna of God's help not five minutes old!

But after fourteen thousand six hundred consecutive days of falling manna—Sundays excepted—the manna ceased. Some of them were glad of it. You know they had complained to their leader, and wondered that they had to eat manna instead of onions. Now

The Fare is Changed.

Those people in that wandering army under forty years of age had never seen a corn-field, and now, when they hear the leaves rustling and see the tassels waving and the billows of green flowing over the plain as the wind touched them, it must have been a new and lively sensation. "Corn!" cried the old man, as he opened an ear. "Corn!" cried the children, as they counted the shining grains. "Corn!" shouted the vanguard of the host, as they burst open the granaries of the affrighted population, the granaries that had been left in the possession of the victorious Israelites. Then the fire was kindled, and the ears of corn were thrust into it, and, fresh and crisp and tender, were devoured of the hungry victors; and bread was prepared, and many things that can be made out of flour regaled the appetites that had been sharpened by the long march. "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land."

Blessed be God, we stand in just such a field to-day, the luxuriant grain coming above the girdle, the air full of the odors of the ripe old corn of the Gospel Canaan. "Oh!" you say, "the fare is too plain." Then I remember you will soon get tired of a fanciful diet. While I was in Paris, I liked for a while the rare and exquisite cookery; but I soon wished I was home again, and had the plain fare of my native land. So it is a fact that we soon weary of the sirups and the custards and the whipped foam of fanciful religionists, and we cry, "Give us plain bread made out of the old corn of the Gospel Canaan." This is the only food that can quell the soul's hunger.

There are men here who hardly know what is the matter with them. They have tried to get together a fortune and larger account at the bank, and to get investments yielding larger percentages. They are trying to satisfy their soul with

A Diet of Mortgages and Stocks.

There are others here who try to get famous, and have succeeded to a greater or less extent; and they have been trying to satisfy their soul with the chopped feed of magazines and newspapers. All these men are no more happy now than before they made the first thousand dollars; no more happy now than when for the first time they saw their names favorably mentioned. They cannot analyze or define their feelings; but I will tell them what is the matter—they are hungry for the old corn of the Gospel. That you must have, or be pinched, and wan, and wasted, and hollow-eyed, and shriveled up with an eternity of famine.

The infidel scientists of this day are offering us a different kind of soul food; but they are, of all men, the most miserable. I have known many of them; but I never knew one of them who came within a thousand miles of being happy. The great John Stuart Mill provided for himself a new kind of porridge; but yet, when he comes to die, he acknowledges that his philosophy never gave him any comfort in days of bereavement, and in a roundabout way he ad-that his life was a failure. So it is with all el scientists. They are trying to live on scopes and crucibles and protoplasms, and charge us with cant, not realizing that there is such intolerable cant in all the world as perpetual talk we are hearing about "positivism," and "the absolute," and "the eternal," and "the everlasting no," and "the unity," and "the latent potentialities," and "the cathedral of the immensities." I have been translating what these men have been saying, and I have been translating what they have been doing, and I will tell you what it all means—that it means that They Want to Kill God!

My only wonder is that God has not killed me. I have, in other days, tasted of their actions, and I come back and tell you today that there is no nutriment or life or health in anything but the bread made out of the old of the Gospel. What do I mean by that? I mean that Christ is the bread of life, and taking Him, you live and live forever.

But, you say, corn is of but little practical use as it is threshed and ground and baked. I say, this Gospel corn has gone through that process. When on Calvary all the hoofs of hell and scorn came down on the heart of Christ, and all the flails of Satanic fury beat him long and fast, was not the corn threshed? When the mills of God's indignation against sin caught it between the upper and nether rollers, was not the corn ground? When Jesus descended into hell, and the flames of the lost wrapped Him all about, was not the corn roasted? Oh, yes! Christ is ready. His pardon is ready; His peace all ready; everything ready for you. Are you ready for Him?

Simplicity Itself.

I say, "That is such a simple Gospel!" I say it is. You say you thought religion was a strange mixture of elaborate compounds. It is so plain that any abecedarian may understand it. In its simplicity is its power. If you could, this morning, realize that Christ died for you from sin and death and hell, not only to minister to your neighbor and your father, but your child, but you, it would make this like the judgment-day for agitations, and, no longer able to keep your seat, you would leap up crying, "For me! FOR ME!" God grant you, my brother, may see this Gospel with open eyes, and hear it with your own ears, and feel with your own heart that you are a lost soul, but that Christ comes for your extrication. Do you not take that truth and digest it, and make it a part of your immortal life? It is only that you have noticed that invalids cannot take kinds of food. The food that will do for one will do for another. There are kinds of food which will produce, in cases of invalidism, a speedy death. But you have noticed that persons, however weak they may be, can take bread. Oh, soul sick with sin, invalid in your transgressions, I think this Gospel will do for you! I think if you cannot take anything else, you can take this. Lost—found! Condemned—pardoned! Cast out—invited in! That is

The Old Corn of the Gospel.

You have often seen a wheel with spokes of different colors, and when the wheel was rapidly turned all the colors blended into a rainbow of exquisite beauty. I wish I could, to-day, take peace and the life and the joy and glory of the Gospel, and turn them before your soul with the speed and such strength that you would be charmed with the revolving splendors of a rainbow which is above every name—the name of God—once with tears of exile and in blood of redemption, but written now in burnished crown of life, sceptre and transangelic throne.

There is another characteristic about bread, that is, you never get tired of it. There are here seventy years of age who find it just as appropriate for their appetite as they did in boyhood, their mother cut a slice of it around the loaf. You have not got tired of bread, and that is a characteristic of the Gospel. Old Christian man, are you tired of Jesus? If so, let us take His name out of our Bible, and let us with pen and ink erase that name wherever we see it. Let us cast it out of our hymnology, and let "There is a Fountain" and "Rock of Ages" go into forgetfulness. Let us tear down the communion-table where we celebrate His love. Let us dash down the baptismal bowl where we were consecrated to Him. Let us hurl Jesus from our heart, and ask some other hero to come in. Let us say, "Go away, Jesus; I want another companion, another friend, than thou art." Could you do it? The years of your past life, aged man, would utter a protest against it, and the graves of your Christian dead would charge you with being an ingrate, and your little grandchildren would say, "Grandfather, don't do that. Jesus is the one to whom we say our prayers at night, and who is to open heaven when we die. Grandfather, don't do that." Tired of Jesus? The Burgundy rose you pluck from the garden is not so fresh and fair and beautiful. Tired of Jesus? As well get weary of the spring morning, and the voices of the mountain rannel, and the quiet of your own home, and the gladness of your own children. Jesus is bread, and the appetite for that is never obliterated.

The Indispensable.

I notice, in regard to this article of food, you take it three times a day. It is on your table morning, noon and night; and if it is forgotten, you say, "Where is the bread?" Just so certainly you need Jesus three times a day. Oh, do not start out without Him; do not dare to go out of the front door; do not dare to go off the front steps, without having first communed with Him! Before noon there may be perils that will destroy body, mind and soul forever. You can not afford to do without Him. You will, during the day, be amidst sharp hoofs and swift wheels and dangerous scaffoldings threatening the body, and traps for the soul that have taken some who are more wily than you. When they launch a ship they break against the side of it a bottle of wine. That is a sort of superstition among sailors. But oh, on the launching of every day, that we might strike against it at least one earnest prayer for divine protection! That would not be superstition; that would be Christian.

Then at the apex of the day, at the tiptop of the hours, equidistant from morning and night, look three ways. Look backward to the forenoon; look ahead to the afternoon; look up to that Saviour who presides over all. You want bread at noon. You may find no place in which to kneel amidst the cotton bales and the tierces of rice; but if Jonah could find room to pray in the whale's belly, most certainly you will never be in such a crowded place that you cannot pray. Bread at noon! When the evening hour comes, and your head is buzzing with the day's engagements, and from the abrasion of rough life, and you see a great many duties you have neglected, then commune with Christ, asking His pardon, thanking Him for His love. That would be a queer evening repast at which there was no bread.

Your Whole Nature is Sore

This is the nutriment and life of the plain Gospel that I recommend you. I do not know how some of our ministers make it so intricate and elaborate and mystifying a thing. It seems as if they had a sort of mongrelism, in religion—part humanitarianism, part spiritualism, part nothingarianism; and sometimes you think they are building their temple out of the "Rock of Ages," but you find there is no rock in it at all. It is stucco. The Gospel is plain. It is bread. There are no fogs hovering over this river of life. All the fogs hover over the marsh of human speculation. If you can not tell, when you hear a man preach, whether or not he believes in the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, it is because he does not believe in it. If, when you hear a man preach, you can not tell whether or not he believes that sin is inborn, it is because he does not think it is congenital. If, when you hear a man talk in pulpit or prayer-meeting, you can not make up your mind whether or not he believes in regeneration, it is because he does not believe in it. If, when you hear a man speak on religious themes, you can not make up your mind whether or not he thinks the righteous and the wicked will come out at the same place, then it is because he really believes their destinies are conterminous.

Do not talk to me about a man

Being Doubtful

about the doctrines of grace. He is not doubtful to me at all. Bread is bread, and I know it the moment I see it. I had a corn-field which I cultured with my own hand. I did not ask once in all the summer, "Is this corn?" I did not hunt up The Agriculturist to get a picture of corn. I was born in sight of a corn-field, and I know all about it. When these Israelites came to Canaan and looked off upon the fields, the cry was "Corn! corn!" And if a man has once tasted of this heavenly bread, he knows it right away. He can tell this corn of the Gospel Canaan from "the chaff which the wind driveth away." I bless God so many have found this Gospel corn. It is the bread of which if a man eat he shall never hunger. I set the gladness of your soul to the tunes of "Ariel" and "Antioch." I ring the wedding-bells, for Christ and your soul are married, and there is no power on earth or in hell to get out letters of divorcement.

But alas for the famine-struck! Enough corn, yet it seems you have no sickle to cut it, no mill to grind it, no fire to bake it, no appetite to eat it. Starving to death, when the plain is golden with a magnificent harvest!

The Beached Ship

I rode some thirteen miles to see the Alexander, a large steamship that was beached near Southampton, Long Island. It was a splendid vessel. As I walked up and down the decks and in the cabins, I said, "What a pity that this vessel should go to pieces, or be lying here idle!" The coast-wreckers had spent thirty thousand dollars trying to get her off, and they succeeded once; but she came back again to the old place. While I was walking on deck, every part of the vessel trembled with the beating of the surf on one side. Since then I heard that that vessel, which was worth hundreds of thousands of dollars was sold for three thousand five hundred, and knocked to pieces. They had given up the idea of getting her to sail again. How suggestive all that is to me! There are those here who are aground in religious things. Once you started for heaven, but you are now aground. Several times it was thought you had started again heavenward, but you soon got back to the old place, and there is not much prospect you will ever reach the harbors of the blessed. God's wreckers, I fear, will pronounce you a hopeless case. Beached for eternity! And then it will be written in heaven concerning some one that he was invited to be saved, but refused the offer, and starved to death within sight of the fields and granaries full of the Old Corn of Canaan.

AMERICA HELPING EUROPE.

THOUGH our traditions and the principles of our system of government keep the United States clear of complication in European politics, it appears that we are not debarred from useful work on the other side the Atlantic. A grateful recognition of American influence was made on July 21 by the Premier of Bulgaria, M. Stambouloff. In the course of an interview with a correspondent of the New York Herald, he said: "In the regeneration of Bulgaria, one of the most potent factors for good with us has been the American Roberts College, kept going by the Presbyterian Church in Constantinople. The professors were our friends and counsellors twenty-five years ago, when Bulgaria was never heard of outside of Turkey. For a quarter of a century forty or fifty young Bulgarians were graduated from this model institution, fighting ever unselfishly on the side of their country. The alumni of this American college may well claim a proud place in our future Walhalla."

MODERN DAMASCUS.

(See Illustration on first page.)

Points of Interest for Travellers—A Reminder of the Great Massacre of 1860—Abd-el-Kader's Heroism—Beautiful Interiors—The Leper's Hospital on the Site of Naaman's House—A Family Garden Party.

THE intelligence brought by the cable a few days ago, that Turkey was distributing arms among the Kurds, clearly pointing to the instigation of new outrages on the Christian population of the Mohammedan Empire, will vividly recall to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the terrible atrocities that followed a similar policy by the Porte in Armenia and Roumelia twenty years ago. All Christendom was horrified, thirty years ago, by the news that six thousand Christians in Damascus and the surrounding towns and villages of Syria had been butchered by the fanatical Kurds, Arabs and Druses, who form the bulk of the Mohammedan population of that portion of the Turkish dominions.

To-day THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives on the first page a number of illustrations of Damascus, reproduced from pictures secured during the recent trip of Dr. Talmage to the Holy Land especially for this journal. Of all the cities mentioned in Scripture there is none more beautifully situated or with a darker history than the capital of ancient Syria. Successively held by Babylonians, Persians, Egyptians, Jews and Mohammedans, every change has witnessed the destruction of many of its fine buildings, noble sculptures and magnificent monuments. The Romans restored much of its grandeur. Its last and worst transition was when it came and became the centre of a vast Mohammedan empire. During this period it was the scene of many bloody encounters in which the great crusaders, Baldwin and Conrad, met and fought with Saladin and Nureddin, and the Cross and the Crescent struggled for the mastery beneath its walls; yet since it first passed under the power of Mohammedanism, the flag of the Prophet has never ceased to wave over its towers and citadels.

Under the Sway of Islam

The Turkish populace of Damascus and the surrounding villages are intensely fanatic, and the wealth and influence of the Christians have at different times aroused their cupidity and excited their worst passions. In 1860 serious trouble arose between the Maronites and Druses, two Syrian tribes near Damascus. For many months the Arabs in Damascus had been persecuting the Christians and Jews who occupied the older section of the city. Finding they could do this without remonstrance, the fanatics summoned the neighboring tribes, and on the afternoon of July 9, 1860, began an attack upon the Christian quarter in force. Soon the dwellings of the Christians were in flames, and the inmates, fleeing from fire, found themselves opposed by hordes of men armed with scimiters and muskets, who shot them down ruthlessly in cold blood. Bands of Arabs, Druses and Kurds kept up the work of slaughter from sunset till dawn on the following day, when they were relieved by others who continued the butchery, until the streets of Damascus were Running with Christian Blood.

The terrified survivors, appalled at the turn of affairs, appealed to the British Consul, Mr. Brant, but he was powerless. Before sunset of the second day the Christian quarter was in ashes; the men dead or dying; the women and children scattered throughout the Mohammedan provinces, and either sold into slavery or distributed among the harems of their Moslem persecutors. During the massacre, hundreds apostatized under the threat of instant death; but their act was futile, for after they had sworn on the sacred books of the Koran and been circumcised, they, too, were cruelly slaughtered. It is estimated that six thousand fell beneath the sword of the fanatics during these two bloody days in old Damascus.

Amid all the riot and carnage there was one bright spot—one haven of safety, to which the doomed Christians turned in their despair. Abd-el-kader, with his troop of Algerines, afforded a refuge to hundreds of the fugitives. As fast as his soldiers brought them in, he hid them from the mob in his own house, the churches and the public buildings, placing a guard at each to prevent invasion. In these sanctuaries, the refugees could hear on the streets without,

The Cries of Their Fellows

and the shrieks of terror that came from the women, after their defenders had been cut down and overpowered. The Mohammedans knew the old soldier and veteran of many battles as a man not to be trifled with; that his Algerines would stand by him against ten times their number. Still, as they crowded around and hemmed in Abd-el-kader on all sides, it seemed as though he must give way and surrender the refugees.

"Wretches!" he cried, "Is this how you honor the prophet? Shame upon you! You will yet live to repent. Not a Christian will I give up. They are my brothers. Stand back, or I will give my men the order to fire!"

Before the guns of his Algerines the mobs moved back. But though the slaughter was stayed in Damascus, it still raged in the mountains and villages of Syria. In the town of Zaleh, whose population was almost wholly Christian, the butchery was frightful, scarcely a man being left alive. The population had armed themselves, but upon being guaranteed protection by the Turkish authorities, they surrendered their weapons and were almost immediately slain.

Since that time

Better Days Have Dawned

for the Christian in Damascus. He lives no longer in terror of assassination; he does business unmolested, and is permitted to exercise his religion unhindered by the Moslem. The ancient city has become one of the central points of interest for travellers, and those who visit the Holy Land and pass through Syria, find there much to attract and instruct. The "Street called Straight," mentioned in Acts, intersects the city from east to west, and is divided into three avenues by Corinthian colonnades. At each end is a triple Roman gateway. Near the Christian and Jewish quarters, which have been rebuilt, are many of the principal buildings and bazars. Still, most of the houses are in a state of decay. The private houses are wretched-looking affairs as to exterior, but the interiors of many present fine specimens of artistic decoration. Their mud walls and mean doors hide beautifully tessellated pavements, cool courts, where marble fountains send sprays of water among evergreen foliage of orange, lemon and citron trees, and make it a delightful retreat during the heat of the day. As shown in the picture of a Jewish mansion, on the first page, the carving and fretwork are in the rich, arabesque style prevalent in the Orient, and are examples of the most delicate workmanship. The building in question, is probably the house of some wealthy Hebrew merchant and is a fair example of the ornamentation common among the better class of dwellings in the East.

Another familiar and picturesque scene is the group of Arab women and children dining à fresco in the garden of the home. The women, with faces carefully concealed by the yashmak or veil, sit around the little table and feed the children, while the Nubian servant sits by, ready to assist. The table on which the viands are served is a marvel of dainty carving, fit to adorn the collection of a connoisseur.

The picture that possesses the strongest interest for the traveller and Bible student is that of a bleak-looking and crumbling edifice, which is said to stand upon the site of the house of Naaman the Syrian, whose seven times repeated bath in the sacred Jordan cured him of his leprosy and his unbelief. The hospital stands in a secluded part of the city, but within the walls, as in many Eastern cities, including Jerusalem and Shechem, lepers are permitted to dwell within the gates. Their asylum at Damascus as unattractive as can well be imagined. At gates can be seen little groups of lepers, their distorted bodies, mutilated hands, and vacuolated expressionless faces, making them objects of general pity and aversion.

The Lepers' Hospital,

There are many other points of interest in this ancient city, some of which were illustrated in a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some of the attractions claimed are of doubtful authenticity, such as that in a Mohammedan mosque, where the

Head of John the Baptist

is said to be contained in a little chapel, while his body lies elsewhere. Others, however, are to be well authenticated, as in the case of the scene of Paul's conversion, which is still pointed out on the highway between Banias and Damascus, a short distance from the city; the hole in the wall from which the apostle escaped being lowered in a basket, while the soldier searched for him, and the house of Ananias, of which have been already referred to in columns of THE HERALD in connection with the recent visit of Dr. Talmage to Holy Land. Paul introduced Christianity into Damascus; firmly planted a colony of the early apostolic Church there, which flourished through many generations.

Under Moslem rule, Damascus has become a city of beautiful ruins, mosques and beggars, where the appeal to Allah mingles with the solicitation for alms on every street corner, in spite of all the changes it has undergone, its interest for the Christian remains undiminished.

OF WHITE AND GOLD.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 13: "Everyone that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." Luke 14: 14.

FAR away in one corner of the land was an institute called the School of the Ministers. With its massive walls of stone, its small and deep-sunken windows, it had the appearance of some old monastic building centuries ago. Within its seclusion one hundred orphan boys were trained and sent forth to the world to minister to the needs of the higher natures of their fellow men.

One of these pupils was a sunny-faced boy with large dark eyes and dark curling hair.

Apollo, pulling up with the rays of living, not more beautiful than you Nello. The warmth of the sun's gleam from the depths of his glorious eyes and darkened the tints in his cheeks and lips.

To him the place was dear and cheerful. On pleasant days he would run off, and throwing himself on the grass, would lie in the warm sunlight. Some voice from the school would call him within. He wearied of the dull routine, longed to go out into the world, so full of the song of birds, so bright with the flight of butterflies. He would not sing in the chapel, the walls were too narrow, he said. Once out into the sunlight he would rival the happy birds.

Not far from the school was a city, called the Beautiful City of Scarlet and Gold, a gay, laughing, thoughtless, wicked city, full of life and song, of pleasure, and of sin. Gayly caparisoned horses, decked with ribbons, drew happy people through the beautiful streets. Pleasure boats drifted idly down the tide of its river. Flowers bloomed only to grace the bright room, or to shine in the hair of light-hearted women.

In the midst of the Beautiful City of Scarlet

Gold rose a cathedral, like a gigantic water-rising from the filth and mire of the lake. The now-white spire, pointing ever to the stars, was a constant rebuke to the people of the city. They always seemed in a hurry to pass it, and few of them ever entered it.

As yet there was no choir there, for the elders had decided never to pay a worldling for singing their sacred music within those walls, so far they had found no Christian with a voice that would do justice to the place.

One day the Beautiful City of Scarlet and Gold added a young musician to its attractions. The dark-haired, dark-eyed youth who sang and played so sweetly was none other than the friend Nello who had escaped by night from the school.

He was soon sought out, and was invited and accepted. After a few months, a thunder-bursting summer sky, a plague fell on the Beautiful City of Scarlet and Gold, and its inhabitants fled in terror to the mountains. Nello was one of the first to be taken down, and soon found that he had no friends. After lying by the roadside for days, he thought of the cool and quiet of the hospital at the school, and decided to return there. "I shall go back there," he said to himself, "if I live I shall do my duty,—humbly, at the end."

His tired limbs slowly dragged him back, where he was kindly received by the good nurses. Good nursing and good food slowly brought him back to health and strength.

A pale-faced little fellow, he crept out once more into the warm life-giving sunshine, to see his face in the waving grasses and watch the happy insect world. Here he always found inspirations, and to-day, with the songs of the birds in his ears, his own heart burst unto song, and a delicate thrill of melody surprised the who heard it.

He soon made the chapel walls ring with his music. When the plague had run its course, the people had left their mountain homes, they missed the beautiful little singer, and when they found that he was singing in the chapel of the school of the ministering came there to listen to him. Thus the brothers had access to the hearts of many whom before they could never reach.

After a while they opened the choir door of the lily-white cathedral, and invited Nello to be the leading singer, because he had worked so faithfully in the little chapel where his marvellous voice had been the means of doing so much good. Those who had listened to him there, crowded the cathedral, and thus a little while was sown which in time ripened into a great harvest.

A few years later the city was re-named the Beautiful City of White and Gold.

A BOY'S GRATITUDE.

A little athlete who has become a Christian worker in the London slums, was paying some visits in the squalid district near the bank of the Thames when he heard the cry, "Help! boy on board." He rushed to the barge from whence the cry proceeded. It was down Bank-side, on the Surrey side of the river. He saw bubbles rising to the surface, telling the spot where the lad had gone down, and without hesitation he sprang in and dived to the bottom, put his arm round the boy and brought him to the surface. He took him to a drug store where, after some efforts, animation returned, and the boy was restored to his mother. Some days after this, the rescuer was out on the river in the boat he kept to help him in his work, and he pulled up to a wharf and stepped off. In a moment a street-boy was at his side as usual with the request, "Shall I hold her head, sir?" Giving the boy the line he walked away. Presently he returned and took the line from the hand of the boy, at the same time offering him a penny, which, however, the lad made no attempt to take. Looking at the boy in some surprise, he perceived a big tear in his eyes, while the boy said, "You took me out of the water last week, sir, and saved my life. I can't take your money." When Christians are asked for contributions to the Lord's work, they too often forget what they owe Him. (Philemon 19.)

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Misplaced Confidence in the Docility of a horse caused the loss of a life some time ago. A harness maker of Paterson, N. J., says that a gentleman drove into that town and called at his place for a new bridle that had been ordered a few days previously. The bridle was ready and the gentleman thought he would like to have it put on at once. Before complying, the harness-maker asked him to alight. The gentleman said, no, it was unnecessary; the horse was perfectly quiet, and would not be a minute without a bridle. The moment the horse felt himself free, and before the new bridle could be put in place, he dashed madly down the street, the buggy swaying to and fro behind him. Before he could be stopped he rushed across a sidewalk, smashing the buggy against a lamp-post. The driver was hurled to the ground, and the horse falling near him, kicked him on the head, crushing in his skull with his iron-shod hoofs. A similar mistake is sometimes made still nearer home. Men who have been accustomed to keep their love of intoxicating liquor and other evil passions under restraint, fancy that they are completely subdued and that no harm will come if the restraint is relaxed on some special occasion. The confidence is generally misplaced, as the victim learns by bitter experience. Even Paul had to keep his body in subjection. (1. Cor. 9: 27.)

A Boy's Jump Nearly Cost Him His Life in New York last week. Among the patients received in the accident ward of the Manhattan Hospital was a lad seventeen years old, who was a plumber's assistant. He had been working with his employer in a row of many-storied flat houses in Harlem. He had been fascinated by the square air-shafts which run between the houses from basement to roof. He was warned to keep away from them, as they are sixty-five feet deep, but he was peering over and looking down whenever he had opportunity. Being sent one day from one house to another, he resolved to jump across the shaft. There was no need to do so, as it was easier to walk round, but he wanted to jump. He took the trouble to climb to a sill four feet from the floor, and, standing there, tried to jump into an opening on the other side, only three feet away. It was not much of a leap for an active boy, but he miscalculated; his forehead struck the lintel of the opposite opening and he fell down the shaft. Providentially, a small joist projecting from the side, about two feet from the bottom, broke his fall. He was considerably hurt, but after a day or two in hospital he was well enough to leave. Every one who remembers his own boyish experience, or has had much to do with boys, can understand why that lad preferred that leap to the easier way of going from house to house. Older people have more sense, but, unhappily, they frequently do not exercise it in spiritual matters. When they become anxious about their salvation they ask what they shall do to be saved, expecting to earn salvation by a long and laborious process of self-reformation, or by penances, or large gifts, instead of taking the simple way of trusting in Christ. (Rom. 4: 5.)

A Novel Claim for a Pension has been Submitted by a farmer to a western lawyer for presentation to the Government commissioner. His story is, that one night during the war, he learned privately that he had been drafted. He could not afford to hire a substitute, so he knew he would have to go. He wished he had taken the offer of a man in an adjacent town who was seeking a substitute, and offering a thousand dollars for one.

Then it occurred to him that he had not been formally notified of his having been drafted. As he would now have to go to the war anyway, he might as well go as that man's substitute and get the thousand dollars. So he started out the same night to find the man. He was so much afraid that some one would get ahead of him that he quickened his pace into a run, and ran so fast and so far that he had to rest. He sat on a stone by the wayside, and, the night being frosty, he caught cold and has had dyspepsia ever since. He thought he was entitled to a pension, and was much astonished when the lawyer declined to push his claim. It is much to be feared that in the conflict between the Church and the world, there are some who have enlisted under the banner of the cross with similar mercenary motives. When religion is popular, men who have no union with Christ in spirit or principle, enroll themselves in our churches for what they can get. They often gain the worldly advantage they seek, but not for them are the rewards which Christ gives to those who leave all to follow Him. (Mark 8: 34-36.)

The Reports of the First Execution by Electricity which were published by the daily press last week, have horrified all who have read them. The execution took place in the State prison at Auburn, N. Y., on August 6. The victim was a man named William Kemmler, who was about thirty years of age. The crime for which he suffered was the exceptionally brutal murder of a woman who had special and peculiar claims on his kindness and consideration. Society would have had no feeling for him but that of contempt had not his been the first case in which the new law was to be applied, which substituted the electric current for the rope, as an agent of death. There had been a great deal of discussion about this law, because, while its advocates had claimed that it was a more merciful form of death than hanging, its opponents had contended that it would be more painful. Careful preparations were made for the execution. The man was strapped in a chair, and the current applied to his head and the base of his spine. After seventeen seconds the doctors pronounced him dead and the current was shut off. Then respiration recommenced, the man's limbs were frightfully contorted and he foamed at the mouth. The current was resumed after a painful delay, and this time so powerfully and so long that his hair and flesh were burned. That the man must have suffered awful torture, if he retained consciousness, there can be no doubt. The very effort to give him a swift, and painless death seems to have intensified his agony. His case furnishes an awful illustration of the warning. "The way of transgressors is hard." (Prov. 13: 15.)

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

By P. W. E.

Daniel's Seventieth Week—Intervenes Between the Rapture and the Judgment—God in His Old Testament Attitude—The Opening of the Seals—A Significant Pause—The Sounding of the Trumpets—A Time of Many Woes—The Development of the Prince—Flight from Jerusalem—The Close of the Seven Years.

THE Church is now waiting for three stupendous events. The first of these, the coming of Christ for His waiting saints, was described in these pages last week. The second is the Great Tribulation. This hour of temptation is the time intervening between the coming of the Lord for His saints and His coming with them. It is also known as the seventieth week in Daniel's prophecy (Dan. 9: 24); therefore a cycle of seven years, commencing after the Church had been caught up into heaven. The Scriptures referring to this period occupy portions of the Psalms, Prophets, and the New Testament, especially the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, and the most of Revelation.

During these seven years, God, by means of very severe judgments, prepares the way for Christ's earthly kingdom. He subdues His enemies and purifies His people. With the end of the third chapter of Revelation the Church disappears from the earth. "The things which are" pass away and "the things which shall be after these" are presented to our view. After this, God is not seen in the character He has ever manifested toward the Church, but in that in which He reveals Himself in the Old Testament Scriptures. The Church has been caught up to meet Christ in the air and the dead saints have been raised, and are glorified in the presence of God; the work of judgment is about to begin, and the "lightnings and thunderings and voices" issuing from the throne, announce that God is seated on a throne of righteousness, and not, as now, on a throne of grace through righteousness. A sealed book is in His hand, the seals of which are opened by the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, who alone is found worthy to open them. Christ first appears as the slain Lamb, and as such He opens which he has received from God. See Rev., chaps. 6-8. The first four of the seals usher in judgments of conquest, bloody wars, famine, and wide-spread devastation and disease. The fifth seal shows persecution to be raging; and a prayer for judgment rises from the souls of the martyred saints, which announces that the day of grace is over and the day of retribution has begun.

The Seals of the Book

On the opening of the sixth seal, there is a general shaking of the powers of the earth, and universal consternation prevails. There is no repentance, no cry for mercy, merely a terror of vengeance, and a frantic desire to escape, as is shown by their hiding "in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains," and saying "to the mountains and rocks, fall on us and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." This horror is premature, as the judgments of the great day of wrath have but begun.

"The Beginning of Sorrows."

Then a pause of great significance occurs. The judgments that follow are of a more terrible character, and a special election of God is signified, marking those who shall pass through them without suffering death. Twelve thousand are sealed in the forehead from each of the twelve tribes of Israel; and a countless multitude of Gentiles, though not thus sealed, are shown as passing through "The great tribulation," and obtaining the victory, having "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." The line between Israel and the Gentiles appears again, which during the Church period was obliterated.

After this respite, the seventh seal is opened—(Rev. 8.) Then another and more dreadful series of judgments falls upon the world. These are introduced by seven trumpets sounded by seven angels, and during the time of these judgments, Christ is no longer seen as the Lamb slain, but in angelic character as "the Messenger of the Covenant." As such He offers up the prayers of the saints; and the answer is the fire of God's consuming judgment cast on the earth, which also shows that the day of Christ's patience is over, and the day of vengeance has begun. The trumpets follow in rapid and dreadful succession. The first four announce wars, tumults, delusions, and anarchy, spread over a third part of the world, referring most likely to the Roman Empire, which has been revived.

Before the peal of the last trumpet, we see Jerusalem once more inhabited by Jews, with the temple rebuilt and the temple-worship re-established. For particulars on this point, let us turn to Daniel chap. 9. At the beginning of that week or cycle of seven years, there is to be a person who "shall confirm a covenant" with many for one week. This covenant is to be made with the majority of the Jewish people. The person is mentioned in the previous verse. That prince is the prince of the people that destroyed Jerusalem. The Romans destroyed the city; thus the prince must be the head of the Roman Empire, who is to appear upon the scene in these closing days of the times of the Gentiles. A covenant is concluded between him and many of the Jews, who will then have returned to Jerusalem and revived their old sacrifices. There is a remnant, however, the elect Jews, who refuse to join this treaty, and on account thereof are subjected to cruel persecution. In the midst of the week the prince stops the sacrifices and changes times and laws. This last half week, when wickedness and misery culminate, is three and a half years, or "a time, times and half a time," or "forty and two months," or "one thousand two hundred and three score days," expressions which frequently occur in the description of those fearful events, preceding the restoration of Israel and the establishment of the reign of the Lord on the earth.

"The Prince That Shall Come"

The Crowning Act

of the prince's wickedness is the setting up of some abomination, or idol, which brings down desolating judgment. Then the elect remnant flee, without a moment's delay, from the city, as told by the Lord in His discourse. This remnant, under the symbol of a woman, flees "into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand, two hundred and threescore days."

Satan and his human tool become the objects of religious worship. "And they worship the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worship the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him? And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name, and His tabernacle, and those that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over all kindred and tongues and nations; and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." We here see civil government is received directly from the dragon, and allegiance and worship rendered to him and his instruments.

Thus at the close of the week of tribulation we have all the Satanic powers of earth combined against the Lord and His Anointed. "The heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us." All nations will gather against Jerusalem to battle, "and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished."

"Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

All these events are included in the hour of temptation. Satan works, through his agent "with all power and signs, and lying wonder and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness. Such, then, is "the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world." The climax will be, when the Son of Man comes in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, and all His saints with him.

FIDELITY OF AFRICAN CONVERTS.

THE troubles in Africa, owing to the scramble in which the European powers are engaged for control, has seriously affected missionary operations and has caused the missionaries some anxiety as to their safety. A letter from Mr. Sanders, who is laboring in Bihe, which is published in the Missionary Herald, vividly describes one of these times of apprehension. She says

"One morning Miss Bell was in school with some little children from the village, whom she is trying to gather in, when some one came and called them out, and they all started on their way for the village. We were very suspicious as she came right over to tell us. She had hardly arrived when the boys came in from work. They said they were urged on all sides to leave as the chief was coming that afternoon to plunder us. Finally their relatives had ordered them to carry all their belongings to the village. They replied, 'We will take our things to the village, but we will go where the whites go.' Cinyuna, the oldest, steadiest boy in the place, said the chief was surely coming. There were men, from all the villages within six or eight miles, skulking around in the woods to rush and have a share in the spoils. We put up what clothes we thought would be most serviceable, put some pins, needles, thread, comb, brushes, in our pockets, ate our dinner and awaited. Mr. Sanders had the cattle driven and shut up, for we have quite a herd now. You may imagine we could not settle down any regular work. About three o'clock the herd-boy came back (he lives about two miles away) and said the old man of their village said he was a fool to run away from his work. 'The chief was Sandele's (Mr. Sanders's) friend etc. Then we breathed more freely. About fifteen minutes later a messenger came from one of the headmen of the country about five miles away, who has always been friendly to saying that, though he had heard we were to be plundered, 'We should lay our hearts to rest, as the chief had distinctly said, "Sandele was not to be touched." Then we unloaded our pockets, took off some extra clothes, and were more comfortable."

Since then, the chief has personally given his assurance to the missionary that no harm shall come to him or to the mission.

THREE INDIAN TYPES.

THE results of the Indian's association with the white man were vividly sketched in a recent speech by Bishop Whipple, whose portrait a life appeared in this journal on Dec. 15, 1889. He said: "Some years ago Bishop Charles Hervey went with me to the Indian country. We had delightful services. After the communion, we were sitting on the green sward near a house. The head chief said, 'Your friend came across the water; does he know the Indian's history?' I said, 'No.' He said: 'I will tell him. Before the white man came the forests and prairies were full of game, the rivers and lakes were full of fish, the wild rice was Manitou's gift to the red man. Would you like to see one of the Indians?' There stepped out on the porch an Indian man and woman dressed in furs, ornamented with porcupine quills. 'There,' said the chief, 'my people were like those before the white man came.'

"'Shall I tell you what the white man did to us? He came and told us we had no fire holes, no fire canoes. He said that if we would let him our land he would make us like white men.'

"all I tell you what he did? No, you had better see it." The door opened, and out stepped a poor, degraded-looking Indian, his face bearded with mud, his blanket in rags, no leggings, and by his side a poor, wretched-looking man in a calico dress. The chief raised his head and said, "Manido, Manido, is this an In-ian?" The man bowed his head. "How camest thou?" The Indian held up a black bottle and said, "This is the white man's gift." Some of us bowed our heads in shame.

"Said the chief, 'If this were all, I would never have told you. Long years ago a pale-faced man came to our country. He spoke kindly, and seemed to want to help us, but our hearts were hard. We hated the white man and would not listen. Every summer, when the snow was high, he came. We always looked to see his tall form coming through the forest. One year I said to my fellows: "What does this man come for? He does not trade with us; he never asks anything of us. Perhaps the Great Spirit sent him." We stopped to listen. "Shall I tell you what it has done for us?" The door opened, and out stepped a young man—a clergyman—in black frock-coat, and by his side a man neatly dressed in black alpaca dress. Said the chief, "There is only one religion in this world which can lift a man out of the mire and tell him to call God Father, and that is the religion of Jesus Christ."

PREVAILING PRAYER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

3. Lesson for August 24; Luke 18: 1-14; Golden Text, Luke 18: 14.

Christ's Injunction to Pray Always—The Duty of a Prayer Life—A Wise Child's Attitude—The First Petitions of the Lord's Prayer—Speedy Answers Promised—May Seem Tardy to the Petitioner—Publicans More Uncommon than Pharisees Still—The Pharisee's a Godless Prayer—The Publican Man Conscious of Helplessness—Had the Contrite Heart which God Loves—The Man Justified.

THE great Teacher had been speaking of His coming again, and especially in relation to His selection which should be then made of those who are ready to meet Him. (Matt. 24: 40-44.) He had reminded His disciples again of a former teaching, that "Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it." And, in this connection, "He spake a parable to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not faint." "Watch ye therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and stand before the Son of Man." (Luke 21: 36.) Not only in relation to His coming, but also a habit of life under all circumstances, we are taught to pray always and for all things. "In everything be anxious; but in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God, and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your heart and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." (Phil. 4: 6, 7 R. V.) And again, "Pray without ceasing; in everything give thanks, for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you." (1 Thes. 5: 17, 18.) And yet how few lead

A Real Prayer Life

How much more common it is for even Christians to give a short time to a kind of general prayer once or twice a day, and then, in exceptional circumstances, to refer matters to God when everything else fails! If we pray always, we do nothing all day long, or any day, apart from God, and this is one of the secrets of successful, or prevailing, prayer. It is a pettish child who seeks to overcome a father by tormenting him into satisfying his whims. It is a wise son who studies his father's mind, and, to, after due consideration, proposes to him nothing which he knows will be as great a trial to his father to give as to him to receive. Prayer is not meant to spoil God's children by ordering them a means to get their way and will; it is a channel by which we may discover His will, and then claim the will of God on the highest grounds. This is why the first petitions in our Lord's model prayer are, "Hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; thy will be done." The Master said, "There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, nor regarded man; and there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him saying, 'Avenge me of mine adversary.'" The widow was making no unjust or extravagant claims. The judge was bound by the responsibility of his office to enter into the cause of the oppressed, and the law of God ordained, "Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child." (Ex. 22: 22.) But this unprincipled judge would not for awhile." He sinned against his vocation as judge; but afterward he said within himself: "Though I fear not God nor regard man, yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me." Ungoverned by any principle or any sense of what was due to the poor widow or consistent with the duties of his office, he let himself be driven into helping her from purely Selfish and Unworthy Motives.

Not so our God. He may keep His children waiting for their sakes, in order to put their faith and patience to the test, but He is ever consistent with Himself. "Hear what the unjust judge saith. And shall not God (the just judge) avenge His own elect which cry day and night unto Him?" When they depend upon Him for all things and at all times, shall He leave their cause unheard, or abandon them in the time of trouble? "He is long-suffering over them" (R. V.), when He keeps them waiting, not captious in Himself. "Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh, shall He find the faith (i. e., of His coming) on the earth?" "I tell you that He will avenge them speedily," not tardily, like the unjust judge. "Speedily?" you say, "why there is a prayer of mine which has been unanswered these twenty years!" And yet, when you look back from the other world, and see all the time and all the long way of wandering that it took before God could so bring you into His line of things as to make it safe to answer that prayer, you will say in the light of eternity, "He did it speedily."

"What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." (Mark 11: 24.) Some lay hold of this promise and think they have only to get up a feeling of certainty in their hearts, which a will set on anything very easily affords them, and that then God is bound to come into their will, and hear their prayers. And oh, how many disappointments there have been on this line! Let us understand that God is never our servant. He who "doeth according to His will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth" (Dan. 4: 35), cannot lend Himself to satisfy the whims and fancies of an unsundered will. Faith is not a feeling of certainty that a thing is going to be.

Faith is Union with God,

with His thoughts, His plans, His ways. The widow could not count upon the unjust judge; faith does count upon God, but with a holy reverence which wants nothing but that which He wills, and asks nothing for itself. The object of prayer is, not to bring God down to our little minds, but to raise us up to union with His mind. Every day we see more how utterly dependent we are upon Him, and true prayer looks away from, and beyond, second causes in all things, and recognizes and appeals to the hand of an Almighty God.

In the audience which at this time heard the words of Jesus, were Pharisees as well as disciples; and now He turns from His little flock, and speaks a parable to "certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others." So long as it is possible for us to despise any other, however low, however fallen, it is evident that some sense of importance and superiority still remains within us, and none of this can accord with Him who "emptied Himself," or "made Himself of no reputation." (Phil. 2: 7.) "Two men went up into the temple to pray, the one a Pharisee, the other a publican." Their followers are everywhere; there are few congregations in any sect or in any country, where we do not find the Pharisee, and, although the publican is a much rarer specimen of humanity, he also appears everywhere from time to time. "The Pharisee stood," his very attitude was one of assurance and self-satisfaction, he was pleased with himself, and this was to him an equivalent to, or a substitute for, God being pleased with him. In fact, he had never made acquaintance with God, and therefore he could not, in reality, seek to please Him. His religion was all a part of his self-importance, and went to minister to the self-gratification which was the ruling motive of his life. "He prayed with himself," he knew no other God, was conscious of no other presence.

His prayer ran thus, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican; I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess." And when the prayer was finished, he felt bigger than ever in his own eyes. And yet nothing had been done. If anyone had asked him, "How is it that you have not become an extortioner, unjust, etc.?" He would have said, "I never was a man of that kind; I never followed a bad example; I have always kept myself from low society; I am superior to all that kind of thing." And the very saying so would prove who was the god he prayed to in his heart. He really believed he had himself to thank for all his boasted goodness. Oh, how little he knew that before God he was a fool, that in heaven he was classed with the wicked who "through the pride of his countenance will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts." (Ps. 10: 4.) But let not those of us who are saved think that therefore we have altogether parted company with the Pharisee. All self-satisfaction, all self-applause, all love for the glory of men, savor of the Pharisee. All we do for the eye of man, is of the Pharisee; every self-dependence, all counting upon ourselves which makes us independent of God. We must die to all which is of the Pharisee, that Christ alone may be exalted in our hearts and lives. "And the publican out of sight of man, but well seen of God, "would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven but smote upon his breast," as though to say, "It is all wrong here, I have no one to blame but myself. It was a broken-hearted" and "a contrite spirit." The broken-hearted publican despised only one man, it was himself; he was the sinner. Ashamed to look up, he could find in himself no warrant to draw near to God. While the Pharisee could compare himself to his own advantage with the publican, the poor publican, losing sight of man, compared himself with the law of a holy God, and was utterly undone. And such a spirit God loves, "He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds." (Ps. 147: 3.) He dwells "in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." (Isa. 57: 15.) God was afar off from the Pharisee who took up so much place in his own prayers that there was no room left for God.

Standing Afar Off,

But the publican, who stood afar off, found that God was at home with the broken heart, and asked it for His dwelling place. The penitent man was unconscious of any other presence in the temple but that of God, but most surely he and God were meeting. The broken, conquered publican "went down to his house" another man, "justified," saved, happy. He had met with God. And now if anybody had asked him, "Did you meet with God?" He would have had a tale to tell, his full heart would have burst out. "Yes, 'bless the Lord, O, my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name. Bless the Lord, O, my soul, and forget not all His benefits. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities." He came to God in God's own way, and his prayer prevailed. But the Pharisee went away empty. "For every one that exalted himself shall be abased, but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICES, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE, Editor.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; will be sent two months for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 4 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

All P. O. money orders for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made payable at Station D, New York.

In reply to numerous inquiries, we state that no change has been made in our terms to agents. They are allowed, on all ordinary subscriptions, the same commission as in former years.

MEETINGS MID-WEEK.

A FEW words about the uses of a week-night service. Many Christians do not appreciate it; indeed, it is a great waste of time, unless there be some positive advantage gained. The French nation at one time tried having a Sabbath only once in ten days. The intelligent Christian finds he needs a Sabbath every three or four days, and so builds a brief one on the shore of a week-day in the shape of an extra religious service. He gets grace on Sabbath to bridge the chasm of worldliness between that and the next Sabbath, but finds the arch of the bridge very great, and so runs up a pier midway to help sustain the pressure. There are one hundred and sixty-eight hours in a week, and but two hours of public religious service on Sabbath. What chance have two hours in a battle with one hundred and sixty-eight? A week-night meeting, allows church membership utterance. A minister cannot know how to preach unless in a conference meeting he finds the religious state of the people. He must feel the pulse before giving the medicine, otherwise he will not know whether it ought to be an anodyne or a stimulant.

If you were ever in the army you know what it is to see an officer on horseback dash swiftly past carrying a despatch. You wondered as he went what the news was. Was the army to advance, or was the enemy coming? So every Christian carries a despatch from God to the world. Let him ride swiftly to deliver it. The army is to advance and the enemy is coming. Go out and fulfill your mission. You may have had a letter committed to your care, and after some days you find it in one of your pockets; you forgot to deliver it. Great was your chagrin when you found that it pertained to some sickness or trouble. God gives every man a letter of warning or invitation to carry, and what will be your chagrin in the judgment to find that you have forgotten it!

A week-night meeting widens the pulpit till all the people can stand on it. Such service tests one's piety. No credit for going to church on Sabbath. Places of amusement are all closed, and there is no money to be made. But week-nights every kind of temptation and opportunity spreads before a man, and if he go to the praying-circle he must give up these things.

The man who goes to the weekly service regularly through moonlight and pitch darkness, through good walking and slush ankle-deep, will in the book of judgment find it set down to his credit. He will have a better seat in heaven than the man who went only when the walking was good and the weather comfortable, and the services attractive, and his health perfect. That service which costs nothing God accounts as nothing. A week-night service thrusts religion in the secularities of the week. It is as much as to say, "This is God's Wednesday, or God's Thursday, or God's Friday, or God's week." You would not give much for a property the possession of which you could have only one-seventh of the time, and God does not want that man whose services He can have only on Sabbath. If you paid full wages to a man and found out that six-sevenths of the time he was serving a rival house, you would be indignant; and the man who takes God's goodness and gives six-sevenths of his time to the world, the flesh and the devil, is an abomination to the Lord. The whole week ought to be a temple of seven rooms dedicated to God. You may, if you will, make one room the Holy of Holies, but let all the temple be consecrate. The week-night service gives additional opportunity of religious culture, and we find it so difficult to do right and be right, that we cannot afford to miss any opportunity. Such a service is a lunch between the Sabbath meals, and if we do not take it we get weak and faint. A truth coming to us then ought to be especially effective. If you are on a railroad train and stop at the depot, and a boy comes in with a telegram, all the passengers lean forward and wonder if it is for them. It may be news from home. It must be urgent or it would not be brought there. Now, if while we are rushing on in the whirl of every-day excitement, a message of God meets us, it must be an urgent and important message. If God speaks to us in a meeting mid-week, it is because there is something that needs to be said before next Sunday.

THE HUMAN SIDE OF CHRIST.

AS a representative of evangelical Christianity, we say that, while we firmly believe in the divinity of Christ, while we fall at his feet exclaiming, "My Lord and my God!" we believe as heartily in His human side. He was the Son of Mary as well as the Son of God. He touched humanity at all its points except sin. From the cradle to the cross He carried our nature, was tempted in all points like as we are, sounded the depths of human woe, human weakness and human want. By His twofold nature He becomes the "Daysman" for whom Job longed. Being both God and man, He can be a mediator between God and men. We believe, too, that Christ dwells in the heart of His believing people through His Holy Spirit, and that our bodies become the temples of the Holy Ghost. Thus they who were the heirs of shame have become the heirs of glory; the children of wrath have become the children of God. So much of the race as believes in Jesus is thus developed and redeemed. But in order that this development and redemption may begin, and the perfect work be finally wrought, we must be born again. Christ was first conceived of the Holy Ghost, or He could not have been born of the Virgin Mary. Conceived of the Holy Ghost in our hearts He is born there, and we rejoice in the presence of Christ the Hope of Glory in us.

Evangelical Christians believe that Christ as man obeyed the law in behalf of his people, and that the righteousness thus wrought out by Him is imputed to His people by faith. This could not be if Christ had not become very man.

CHRIST IN THE COUNTRY.

WE never find Christ at a country-seat, save in the eighteenth chapter of John.

The Saviour was not apt to be acquainted with people who owned country-seats. The merchants of Jerusalem had suburban residences. Christ had somehow become acquainted with one of these men, and been invited by him to come out to the country home. There were gardens surrounding the house. After the heat and excitement of the day in the city, it was pleasant to go out and sit and walk under the trees and among the flowers. Jesus is in the garden one night, and sees the gleam of torches and lanterns. Judas and an armed band are coming to take Him captive. In this rough way was ended the season of reflection and recreation. You find here, as elsewhere, that Jesus loved the country. We find Him among the mountains and sitting by the sea. He pressed a lily in His sermon. He caught a bird for a text. He walked in the garden the night of His capture. So it is a good sign when a Christian finds company, and suggestiveness, and refreshment in the beautiful things of God's world. There may be means of grace in a hyacinth or japonica. It is well when in the small door-yard of a city residence a patch of luxuriant grass is cultivated, or a clematis is taught to climb. A man can preach better of love and of faith and heaven, when there are camellias on the pulpit.

It is no evidence of weak sentimentality when a Christian loves natural beauty. Jesus resorted to a garden. No doubt Christ selected the garden of this country-seat as a place for private devotion. He who has no spot for secret prayer is a starveling Christian. A man has sorrows, temptations, sins and deliverance that are no one else's business. He is a fool who tells the world everything. There are prayers that belong only to God's ear. Better have some place consecrated to private prayer. Choose a pleasant place if possible—not the garret, not the cellar, but a room, warm, light, cheerful. There is no use in penance. When you invite Jesus to meet you, open for Him the most cheerful and pleasant place you can find. Jesus resorted to a garden. Notice also that was while in this beautiful suburb of the city sitting in the summer night, among the trees that He was captured of His enemies. We are never more subject to attack from our spiritual enemies than when in the garden of ease. There is less danger for us when out in the conflict of life than when we sit down to rest. It is while unarmed and in quiet that pride breaks in, and indolence and worldliness "with lanterns and torches." We need ever to be on our guard. "Watch therefore, and what I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch!" We cannot have so high a hedge about our garden that Judas cannot break through.

CURRENT EVENTS.

When the Remains of John Ericsson, the great engineer, inventor and naval constructor, are removed from their temporary resting-place in the Marble Cemetery, on Second Street, New York, to his native Sweden, extraordinary honors will be paid to his memory. A fleet of war-vessels will salute the dead hero, and an official escort will accompany the steamer that conveys to Swedish soil the ashes of the man whose name will long be remembered as the in-tor of the iron-clad Monitor, the destroyer of the Merrimac. But neither will Ericsson's scientific triumphs on the side of peace be soon forgotten; for to him the industrial world owes the improved calorific engine, the hydrostatic pump, pyrometer and many other useful appliances. Ericsson, who died last year, in this country, was born in Sweden in 1803, and came to the United States in 1839. All his life was devoted to improvements in steam-machinery, and his workshop on Beach Street, New York, was well-known to the best engineers of America and Europe. He was, moreover, a man of admirable Christian character, and greatly beloved. The Swedish societies of New York and other cities will unite in a great demonstration in his honor when the transfer of the remains takes place, and it is understood that the Swedish Government will rear a monument to his memory in a prominent public place in the city of Stockholm.

The Past Week has Been a Somewhat Eventful one in foreign lands. After vainly endeavoring to temporize with the indignant people of the Argentine Republic, President Celman resigned his office and the government was entrusted to the hands of Vice-President Pellegrini. There was a suspicion that the resignation of Celman might be a trick, and the Senate, at first refused to accept it; but that body ultimately concluded to bow to public opinion. With this change public confidence seems to have revived and the more serious troubles, which brought about the recent revolution, are held for the present at least. Peace has also been restored between Salvador and Guatemala, though affairs are still complicated there. Costa Rica has been recognized as Provisional President of Salvador. In Europe, the general outlook has assumed a pacific character. Lord Salisbury the British premier, at a banquet in London, said the Powers had never been more peacefully disposed towards each other than now.

The Federal Election Bill, Since Passing Under the revision of the Senate, has been so greatly changed and modified that very few of the original features that raised such a storm of discussion when the measure was first introduced by Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge in the House remain. The Senate has, among other changes, omitted that referring to the presence of troops at the polls; the provision for a household canvass has also been stricken out; the drawing of jurors by Commissioners has been omitted and the penal offences have been added down to simple misdemeanors, instead of felonies as in the original. The Judge of the Circuit Court is authorized to appoint supervisors of election; ballots wrongly cast are not counted, unless the tally sheet shows that the number of votes does not equal the names on the poll lists, and in such cases enough votes shall be added to the tally sheet to equalize it with the poll lists. Where the election officers refuse to administer the oath to voters, the supervisor can administer it; but the refused vote cannot be cast, and all the supervisors can do is keep a record of the application. In every case the registration, the election, and the certification are left in the hands of the local authorities, except when inspectors are provided for a whole Congressional District. The latter are to be appointed by the Court, and they are empowered to issue certificates of election, which certificates shall be used by the House of Representatives. These are the main changes. President Harrison is said to highly favor the bill in its amended form, and an effort will probably be made to pass it during the present session, although its success is doubtful, owing to the strong opposition, even among Republicans to any Federal interference whatever with the rights of the States to govern their own affairs.

One of the Most Thrilling Experiences Ever recorded in the history of ocean vessels was that which befel the steamer Portia, while on her way from Pilley's Island, St. Johns, to Halifax, last week. On July 30th, when near Fogo Head, the lookout descried a huge iceberg right in the steamer's path. The Portia sailed alongside, when suddenly the berg broke in three pieces with a deafening report. All three went under the water, and one of the detached masses, reappeared under the very bows of the Portia, which slid on the smooth surface of the berg and rose clear from the sea. The steamer swayed and tipped over, threatening to pitch from the icy mass into the sea. Fortunately the agitation of the ocean by the breaking of the bergs produced a series of waves that swept the steamer clear of the ice, and the danger was over almost as quickly as discovered. During the time the vessel was on the berg, she was clear even to the keel. Although there was a partial panic among the passengers, it was shortlived, and the coolness of the captain and chief officers was admirable. The bow of the Portia was slightly damaged and her cabins flooded, but she showed no other marks of her strange encounter.

The Tenth International Medical Congress, now in session at Berlin, has this year an American representation of 623 members, including many of the most distinguished physicians in the Union. The veteran Professor Virchow, who is almost as great a parliamentarian as he is a scientist, presides at the sessions of the Congress. A multitude of papers will be read to the delegates, including many by such notabilities as Professors Pasteur, Gibier, Koch, Sola Mendes, Mackenzie, and others whose names are known throughout the scientific world. Thus far the most interesting has been a paper by Professor Koch, the great investigator, whose portrait is given in this column, and whose discovery of the bacillus tuberculosis, or consumption germ, several years ago, excited a sensation in the profession. Although his theories have been repeatedly attacked, he has been successful in commanding for them the highest support. He now announces what will be good news to hundreds of thousands of sufferers, that he has discovered a substitute germ which is capable of killing the bacillus and curing the disease.

The Greatest Labor Strike in Ten Years was begun in New York on Friday, August 8, when, in obedience to orders from the Knights of Labor, the switchmen, engineers and yardmen of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad left their posts without warning and almost brought the traffic of the Vanderbilt system of lines to a standstill. Besides the Central, the New York and Harlem and the New York, New Haven and Hartford were also crippled. The agreed-on signal for the strike was the words: "Webster's Dictionary," which was telegraphed to the different local leaders of the Knights by the General Executive Committee, and promptly obeyed. Thousands of passengers at New York were kept in town, and complaint of the action of the Knights was loud and general. The latter declare they are fighting in self-defence, and will stay out until the Central recognizes their organization and agrees to make promotions on the basis of long service, as the men demand. The strike threatens to extend to every road running out of New York city. Thus far no violence is reported, except at East Syracuse, where militia dislodged strikers who took possession of the freight yards.

NEWS SUMMARY.

August 4: Emperor William Visits Queen Victoria—Medical Congress Opens at Berlin—Elections Held in Alabama and Kentucky; Democrats Victorious.
August 5: Greek Patriarch, Constantinople, Resigned—Governor Fifer, Illinois, Signed the World's Fair Bill—Italian Riot, Brooklyn, and Anarchist Riot, Elizabeth; policemen injured; several arrests.
August 6: Fatal Railway Accident, Bohemia—British Fleet left Newport—William Kemmler Executed by Electricity, Auburn Prison, N. Y.—Iowa Democrats Nominate State Ticket; Leading Address Speaks of Cleveland and Gov. Boies as Democratic Presidential Ticket, 1892.
August 7: Gen. Miranda Defeated in Salvador by Gen. Ezeta—Cholera Reaches Madrid—Queensland Cabinet Resigned—Attempted Riot Among Convicts, Charlestown Prison, Mass., Soon Quelled.
August 8: Great Strike of Switchmen and Freight-handlers, N. Y. Central, Harlem and New Haven and Hartford Railroads—Britain Formally Surrenders Heligoland to Germany—Czar Suspends Anti-Jewish Edict of Banishment.
August 9: R. R. Strike Spreading; Freight Perishing in Yards; Police Reserves Called out at Different Cities—President Harrison goes to Boston to Attend G. A. R. Encampment.
August 10: Militia Disperses Rioting Railroad Strikers at East Syracuse—K. of L. Threatens to Make Strike General—John Boyle O'Reilly, Famous Irish Poet, Dead—Rain, Hail and Lightning Storm Unroofs Churches, Damages Crops, New York.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Samuel Sheffield Snow, the Second Adventist preacher, is dead. He was pastor of Zion Church, New York. A society of young Mormon women has been organized in Salt Lake City each member of which has given a pledge not to marry a polygamist.

Major George A. Hilton is holding services in Sullivan County, N. Y. this week. He is about to set out on a Western tour, in the course of which he has promised to conduct evangelistic meetings in Nevada, Washington and California. Many prayers are being offered by his friends in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, for God's blessing on these meetings.

Dr. Thomas Gallaudet, the indefatigable friend of deaf mutes, asks that on August 24, when the Gospel for the day in Protestant Episcopal churches is Christ's miracle of the healing of the deaf and dumb man, the collections be devoted to aiding Gospel work among deaf mutes. He says that there are forty thousand of them in this country and that ten ministers, four of whom are deaf and dumb, are laboring among them.

Rev. D. M. Heydrick has had the pleasure during the intense heat of the past few weeks, of conveying to the beach large numbers of invalids, sick children and overwrought mothers for a day's enjoyment of cool, life-reviving breezes. The railroad companies have assisted, by placing a large car capable of holding over a hundred persons at his disposal at reduced rates, and a restaurant-keeper by the sea provides meals at cost. Mr. J. H. Ryder, a philanthropic citizen of Brooklyn, N. Y., has supplied the funds. In this way many lives have been saved and many ailing persons restored to health. We mention this Christ-like work in the hope that other wealthy men will follow Mr. Ryder's example and help some hard working friend of the poor, like Mr. Heydrick, to thus benefit the poor of our large cities.

An appeal to the Protestant Churches of all lands has been issued by the American Council of the China Inland Mission in response to the General Missionary Conference recently held at Shanghai, China. That Conference urgently asks for men and women to travel through China distributing books, preaching to the masses, aiding Christian education, and exhibiting the benevolent side of Christianity in healing the sick. The Council hopes that one thousand such workers, evangelists, teachers and physicians, will be obtained within five years of this time. The Council's headquarters are at 30 Shuter Street, Toronto.

A JOYFUL PASTOR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I thank my God upon every remembrance of you," etc. Philippians 1: 3-7.

The Best of the Apostolic Churches—I. Paul's Memory of it All Happy—And Tender—Offered Joyful Prayers for Them—They were in Fellowship with Him—Members who Bury Themselves—II. Paul's Confidence—In the Work being Divine—A Growing Work—Is to be Perfected—Not Till the Lord Comes—Confidence Confirmed by the Life—III. Paul Ascribes the Glory to God—His Faith in a Great Principle.

THE statement Paul makes about the Philippian church shows to what a high estate a church can come. Beloved, we of the Tabernacle never wish to be like the church in Galatia, which was bewitched by false teachers, who led away the people from the vital doctrine of justification by faith. Paul had to be very sharp with them, and to lay down the grand fundamentals of free grace, so as to bring them back to the one sure rock on which they ought to have been builded. Into that condition, by the grace of God, we have never fallen. At the same time, I am afraid we have never reached as far as the Philippians went; and this morning it is my intense desire that, while I show you what they attained, every member of this church may resolve, in the Holy Ghost, that he will labor to bring us to that happy condition.

His Church.

I. First, in the church at Philippi we see a people whom the apostle remembered with joy. This is seen in his declaration that all his memory of them was happy: "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you." Taking the long run of his acquaintance with them, remembering them, from the time when he preached by the river-side, and Lydia was converted, even until the moment of his writing to them as a prisoner in Rome, he knew nothing of them but that which gave him joy. He bethought him how they had of their own free will ministered again and again to his necessities, when no other church was mindful of him. He says, "Now ye Philippians know also, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed for Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only." Their grateful benevolence caused him to thank God. He had no dash of bitter in the cup of his happy memory of them. All along, as he remembered their prayers, their courage, their faith, their labor, their unity, their constancy, their zeal, their thoughtfulness, and their liberality, he felt unmingled gratitude to the Author of all these excellent things. I trust there are many ministers who, with perhaps some slight reserve, can say of their people, "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you."

Tender Associations.

Again, all the apostle's remembrance of them was tender. They had been most kind to him personally, and most hearty in their co-operation with him in his labor of love, so that when he was thanking his own God for his choicest mercies, his mind brought before him these dear people. Brethren, in the relation of pastor and people I notice in many places an absence of anything like tender affection; and when that is gone the very joy of the gospel is gone from the preacher, and to a very large extent from the people. They invite him to take office, they pay him a wage more or less scanty, and then they send him about his business because they are tired of him. Can they expect a blessing upon such a hireling ministry, from which holy relationship is absent?

Again, all Paul's memory of Philippi excited gratitude in his mind. All good people are not equally good. There are some in the world whom we hope to meet in heaven, with whom fellowship is difficult. If they were on the other side of the Atlantic we might love them better than when we see much of them. It was not so with the Philippians—Paul thought of them with devout gratitude to his God that there were such people, and that he had come into personal contact with them. He knew the ins and outs of them, and yet he could thank his God whenever he thought of them. Dear friends, may it be so with us, that men of God may thank God for the existence and the work of of this church!

Again, all his prayers for them were joyful. He says, "Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy." For some we have had to pray with tears and sighs, and for others with trembling; but the Lord so heard Paul in the past with regard to these Philippians, that every time he began to pray in prayer, a joy in bearing their names before the Lord, and a sweet assurance that he was not praying in vain. His was not the cry of anguish, but the request of delight. When we pray for those who are our joy, and for that which will be their joy, we may well mingle joy with earnestness.

He Felt Liberty

Now, why was all this joy in the apostle's mind with regard to the saints in Philippi? This is the point I desire to press upon you. Paul rejoiced because all along they had been in hearty fellowship with him in the best things. Observe: "For your fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now." There are churches wherein the minister is nominally the leading officer; but he cannot lead, for the church does not follow. Paul seemed to stand alone when he was with the Galatians; but the Philippians were at his side and all around him, bearing him on from victory to victory by their unanimous fellowship. For this he thanks God; and well he might.

They were in fellowship with him concerning his one sole object—"For your fellowship in the Gospel." If you look at the Revised Version it is "for your fellowship in furtherance of the Gospel." The apostle so did they. He was earnest to carry it to the regions beyond; so were they. If he preached, they would be there to encourage him. If he held special meetings, they were ready to help. If money was required, every man was ready according to his means, without pressing. Each one felt as earnest about the work as did his minister. They were enthusiastic for the furtherance of the Gospel: they were heartily with him where he most valued their sympathy.

Longed to Spread the Gospel;

This fellowship began early: "from the first day" of their conversion. I think we could prophesy what converts will be from what they are at first. Some begin warmly, and gradually cool down; but we seldom know them to develop much heat of zeal if they begin in lukewarmness. When we join a church, it is well that from the first day we inquire of the Lord, "What wouldst thou have me to do?" The kind of recruits which we desire in Christ's army are those who are in fellowship with us for the furtherance of the Gospel from the very first. I like to see the convert at the prayer-meeting, the cottage-meeting, or the Bible-class, or the Ragged-school, or the Sunday-school, or the Tract Society, doing what he can to help others.

Self-Buried Christians.

He that begins early begins hopefully. Concerning some older Christians, we could not speak of their fellowship in the Gospel from the first day, for they were slow in coming forward; but I hope they will do all the more now, to make up for it. I have heard of an advertisement of a burial club which began thus, "Seeing that many persons find it extremely difficult to bury themselves"—That is not my experience; for I should have to say, "Seeing that many church-members find it exceedingly easy to bury themselves." We receive them into our number with pleasure, but we hear no more of them. We have the distinguished privilege of enrolling their names in our book, and that is all. We give them our right hand of fellowship, but they do not give us their right hand of labor. Where are they? Where? Echo answers, Where? The Philippians had fellowship in the Gospel from the first day.

Then mark, that they were men of good wind, who could keep up the running; they were as patient and persevering as they were zealous at the first. "From the first day until now." Until now. Some run well for a time, but that time is short. Oh, for the men who will live as long as they live; and not die while they are alive! How many who should have been our helpers are lost to us! They have grown indifferent, or they have become advanced in years, and fancy that they can now do nothing because they cannot do all they once did. We can always do something for Jesus if we are willing. There is as truly a service in the church for the most venerable as for the most active. Let no man cut himself off from the privilege of serving the Lord Jesus "from the first day until now."

His Confidence.

II. Paul saw in the Philippians a people whom he regarded with the utmost confidence: "Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." What was Paul's confidence, then?

His confidence was that the work in their hearts was a divine work. The Lord Himself had begun a good work in them. This is a vital matter. Everything turns upon the question, "Is this conversion a divine work or not?" The man is altered for the better; the woman is certainly improved; a work has been done; but is it God's work? or is it the work of the flesh? Ah, dear friends! a moral change may sometimes look so much like a spiritual change, that onlookers cannot detect the difference. The child of nature, finely dressed, is not the living child of divine grace; and how are we to tell the one from the other? "By their fruits ye shall know them." The apostle had found the Philippians true in their partnership in the Lord's work. They suffered for their Lord patiently, they defended the faith bravely, they spread it zealously, and their lives confirmed it; and so Paul said to himself, "This is the finger of God; the Lord Himself has begun this work. How happy we are when we can have this confidence of every member of the church."

Paul could see, in the next place, that it was a growing work, for the Lord was still performing it. The work of God is Always a Growing Work.

If things do not grow they lack one of the chief marks of life. You put into the ground something which looks like a living plant, and after it has been there six months you find just the same, without a single bud or shoot. What do you say of it? Why, you conclude that it is an artificial production, devoid of life. We do not grow better, surely it is because we have no goodness wrought in us. If we do not grow in grace it must be because we have no grace. Paul saw God carrying on the work in the heart of the Philippians, so that they were from strength to strength; and about this I was confident.

He was also confident that God would perfect it. He says, "He will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." Shall we be absolutely perfect until then? I think not. Perfection in the scriptural use of it is not at all what those men of it who boast of perfection in the flesh. O says, "We shall be perfect at death, shall we not?" It is not so written here; but, "He will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." We may be perfect in death, doubtless, as to the moral and spiritual nature; but a man has body as well as a soul, and it needs both parts to make the perfect man. He will be perfect to his whole manhood.

When The Lord Shall Come,

and the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. Paul desires lights to make the Christian leap over that lit rivulet called death, and swallow up the thought of dissolution in the far grander fact of the coming of the Lord. The second advent ought to be more on our minds than the hour of our death.

You have no idea of what a perfect man would be like. "Thou seest not that body that shall be like." God will give us such a body as it pleaseth Him, and to each one a body of his own. If you have never seen wheat growing, you would never

Imagine that the shrivelled grain of corn would reduce the blade, the ear, and the full corn in the ear. Take an example still more striking; many very tiny seeds produce flowers which excel in beauty of form and color; could you have ever guessed that the insignificant seeds could have come to this? Even so, the body is sown in weakness, but it is raised in power. It is sown in corruption; raised in incorruption. The star of to-day will be the sun of to-morrow.

Furthermore, their long-continued character confirmed the apostle in his confidence; for he said, "Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the Gospel, ye are partakers of my grace." When he was bound, they were Not Ashamed of His Chain.

When he was in prison the jailer washed his robes, and refreshed him at his table; and this proved an omen of loving liberality throughout life. When Paul was taken away to Rome, the Philippians took care that he should not be left helpless, but they sent out of their poverty to his assistance. He felt confidence in a people who could do this. Shame turns many of the weaker sort aside; but the faithful despise it. Besides, they were partners with Paul in the defence of the Gospel. If any Galatian teachers came their way, they gave them the cold shoulder; for they would not give up the grand old Gospel to please the wise men of the period. In this way, my brethren, have you also stood by your own minister in those protests against error which have cost him so dear. Your faithfulness gives me great confidence concerning you. The people who can bear the attacks made upon you, and the baits held out to you, can be relied upon under God. You are not ashamed of my bonds, for you are with me in the defence of the Gospel in this day of falsehood.

The Divine Worker.

III. My third point is this, that although Paul speaks concerning the excellence of the Philippians, he views them as a people for whom he gave all glory to the grace of God. He did not raise them, but the Lord who had saved them. Observe how he began, "I thank my God." In that was done he sees reason for gratitude to God. Brethren, if we win a single soul, let us humbly thank God for it. If, after years of labor, any one of you should bring but two or three children to Jesus, you will have reason to thank God to all eternity.

But Paul also, after he had thanked God, kept praying for what was still needed. "Always every prayer of mine for you all making request." See, dear brethren: at Philippi he has not only begun with God, but he goes on with God. He has much more to do, but he does not tempt to do it without his Lord. Oh, that all workers were of this mind! We deal with God a little. A person exclaimed, "Let us get up revival." The revivals which men can get up had better be left alone: we need to get revivals down. If we get a revival up, it must come from beneath; but if we get a revival down, it comes from above. Lord, revive us: we pray for it, and when it comes we will praise thee for it.

As to his confidence about the future of his converts, it was all in God. It was not confidence in them apart from the work of God in them. He says, God began it, and

God Will Carry it On.

It does not depend at all on the strength of their principles, nor the force of their resolutions, nor the excellence of their habits; but it relies upon God, who will perform what He has begun. Did not Paul begin it? No, no; or if he had begun it he would have to carry it on; and that could not be. Did not they begin themselves? Certainly not. It is with the manner as with the Romish Saint Denis. You have heard the old fable, that when he had his head cut off he picked it up and walked a thousand miles with it in his hand. A scoffer said that the thousand miles' walk was not at all remarkable; it was only the first step that had any difficulty in it. Just so; when a soul goes to heaven, if it takes the first step in its own strength, it can walk all the way; and then it will have all the glory. God commences the good work, however faint and feeble the beginning may appear.

Beloved friends, I close when I say the apostle derives his confidence from a great principle. The great principle is, that what God begins He will perfect. For if He did not do so, where was the wisdom of beginning? Some men are always great at beginnings; but they have no stay in them: they change their minds. Does the Eternal God suffer change? Is it not said that He is "without variableness or shadow of turning"? Granted an immutable God, and we may be sure that grace will complete what grace begins. Nor can God forsake the work of His own hands from want of long-suffering. A man might begin to bless another, and that other might be so ungrateful that the benefactor grew impatient, and gave him up. Will God fail in grace? Assuredly not. "His mercy endureth for ever."

But, beloved, albeit that where God has begun a good work He will carry it on, this does not put prayer aside; for Paul prays for these very people. Neither does this lessen the necessity of a holy life; for Paul is only confident about saints who were hearty "in the defence and confirmation of the Gospel," and partakers of divine grace. He felt confident of the

Ultimate Perfection

of those converts only who had a divine work within them, and proved it by their fellowship in the furtherance of the Gospel. How can we profess that grace is in our hearts by divine implanting if we live in secret sin? How can we hope to persevere if we have not begun? If we do not join in the prayers and efforts of the church of God, how can we hope to partake in the reward at the coming of the Lord? The question as to whether God has begun saving work in us must be answered by our faith and our life; and if it be satisfactorily proved that He has begun it, we can depend upon Him to finish it. If, on the contrary, we have reason to fear that He has not begun it at all, we should not deceive ourselves, but take up our true position. We may still cry to Him as sinners, and look to Jesus as the Author of faith. This will be wise, and this will be successful; for Jesus says He will cast out none that come to Him. "This man receiveth sinners." I hope every unconverted person here this morning, who sees that salvation is God's work, will say to himself, "I will even look out of myself to Him who is able to begin the work in me. If He begins, carried on, and completes salvation, then my want of strength need not make me despair, for He is able, though I am not. He will work all my works in me, and I shall praise His name."

A BLIND CONVERT.

In last week's issue of this journal was a facsimile of the Lord's Prayer in the language of Laos, a district of the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, containing over a million inhabitants, nearly all of whom are worshippers of Buddha. Mrs. Hugh Taylor, who, with her husband, is laboring among these benighted people, sends the following account of the solitary Christian in one large city: "Dr. McGilvray and his daughter were about to visit the Provinces of Praa and Nan, where missionary labor has not yet commenced, and my husband and I accompanied them as far as Nan. The morning of the fourth day we entered a dense jungle, where a native said: 'Why, yes, tigers are many through here.' In some places, vegetation was such a tangled mass that we could see it and nothing more except the elephant in front and the one behind and the sky above, while oftentimes even the sky was hidden. In the evening we emerged into the rice-fields, and at sunset pitched our tents just outside one of the gates of the city of Praa,—an old city with its high brick walls partly fallen and almost covered with vines and mosses. The next morning at services, a large audience was present, and for a heathen assembly, unusually quiet and attentive. In the evening, Noi Wonng was baptized. He is a young man whose home is in Praa, but who had been under the treatment of Dr. Peoples for sore eyes. He did not come for treatment in time, so that the doctor could do nothing for him, and now he is totally blind. But while here, failing to receive physical healing, he learned of the true and only God, learned that he was a sinner, and Jesus came to save. How our hearts go out to that one in his blindness and loneliness; the only Christian among thousands who prostrate themselves before every image of Buddha. But we trust that he may be able to show many that his Saviour is their Saviour too, and ere long he will not be the only one in that large city to worship the living God."

A DYING CHIEF'S SONG.

AN exceedingly beautiful incident is related by a recently returned missionary from New Zealand. He says that an aged chief of that country lay dying. His friends were gathered about his bed. He had been converted in middle life, and had been remarkable for his earnest and consistent life. Suddenly, as he lay there, his friends watching him, he began to sing. But it was not a hymn such as they would have expected him to sing, if, in such a crisis, he sang at all. It was one of the songs he used to sing in his old days of heathenism. It told of a maiden who had a lover—a faithful lover. She had not seen him for years; he had gone off into the distant seas, and now she was determined to seek him and join him. He sang of her voyage, in words well-known to those who stood around him, but with a meaning far deeper than they had ever put on the words, for they saw that under the figure of the forlorn maiden, he meant his own soul going forth on its last, long voyage, and under the figure of the lover, he meant that blessed Saviour whom he hoped now to join in that unknown sea. He sang how the maiden in her frail canoe went down the dark river; how she dashed down the foaming rapids; how the steep rocks closed in on either side; how through the black pass the river opened into the wide sea; still she was not afraid, for she looked forward all the more to being with him whom she loved forever. So singing, and so transfiguring the old Pagan song with the light of the Gospel, the Christian chieftain passed away.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Parable of the Acorn.*

It is a bright warm day; over the intense blue of the summer sky lazy clouds are floating; the drowsy hum of insects and the occasional twitter of a bird are all that seems to break the stillness. In the quiet of the woods, with its cool refreshing shade, stands an oak tree, its lofty branches stretching heavenward. It is indeed worthy of the name "royal" bringing with it a sense of strength and inspiration. On one of its wind-swayed boughs a small silver acorn rests in its wood-brown cup. As the wind playfully lifts the parent stem and tosses it back and forth, the little acorn drops to the soft ground beneath. "Oh what shall I do?" it whispers to the great tree above. "I wanted to be of use in the world and when I was on your beautiful branch I was an ornament if nothing else; but here, pressed down to the earth, what can I do for the great God who made me?"

"Hush! Hush!" whispered the oak; "wait and see what the Lord can do for you. It may be long until a way of usefulness opens; but be patient, for nothing that He has made on the beautiful green earth, or in the tossing seas beyond, is useless in His sight."

The little acorn sighed, but lay patiently the summer through, just waiting for the longed-for day of usefulness to open. The snows of winter covered it with their soft mantle, and the sweet breath of spring, with its resurrection powers, swept over the place where it lay and gradually, like the touch of a hand upon it, the new life came, and the tiny acorn began to see why it had been taken from its native branch.

*From Seed Thoughts by Annie Darling, a dainty little volume for King's Daughters, full of encouragement, stimulating thoughts and practical suggestions for the formation of tens. Pp. 77; Price 25 cents. Published by D. F. Randolph & Co., 38 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

Protestant Episcopal Missionaries in Brazil.

Years passed, and beside the parent oak stood a strong young tree. "Did I not tell you to be patient and wait, and the Lord would give you a work for Him and a place in His beautiful world?" the old oak asked. "Ah, yes, I see how much I can do for Him in these quiet woods, for under my branches will run the highway to the great city, and along it will come many a weary one, and many a sin-laden heart, and while they rest in my cool shade, I shall be honored by the King in being permitted to whisper a message for Him. Thank God for the tiny acorn; I did not know that the oak would follow."

It is in this very way that the Order of the King's daughters has grown since its early years. The life-giving power of prayer, like the soft breath of spring, has surrounded the tender plant and made it strong in faith, and thus the young oak has sprung up; the acorn is fulfilling its God-given mission, and is growing and expanding under the evident sanction and blessing of God, unto the great tree that shall cast forth its roots as Lebanon, and they that dwell under its shadow shall return.

A COMMAND OBEYED.

How few Christians have the courage to obey literally the Master's commands! One of the most difficult, and one that in the circumstances it was most exceptionally trying to obey, was actually put in practice with excellent results recently by a missionary on the Congo. Mr. Henry Richards, whom Mr. Stanley mentions in his new book, says that he was expounding the Gospel of Luke to the natives of Banza Nanteka and the language of the country being new to him, he gave some time to the preparation of each lesson. When he came to the passage, "Give to every man that asketh of thee, and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again," (Luke 6:30), his conscience smote him. He had not himself acted on that command, and how could he teach it to the people? The natives were incorrigible thieves, and he thought if he read this to them, and obeyed it himself, he would have nothing left. He waited and prayed for guidance. He was convinced the Lord meant just what He said. At length he gave the words to the people, and told them not many Christians obeyed them, and he had not obeyed them himself, but he intended to do so for the future. Very soon a man came forward, and said: "I want that;" and another, and another, till he had given some of his most valuable possessions away. He began to think he would lose all, when the tide turned. One of the natives who had looked on quietly, without taking part in the wholesale depredation, spoke out. It was time to stop, he said, the man must be protected. He spoke to one and another of his influential fellow-countrymen and then informed Mr. Richards that in future he would have no more applications. Any man who wanted something from him would pay for it. The assurance was realized. Mr. Richards still held himself ready to obey the command, but, as his friend had told him, no one came to beg or to steal. The incident powerfully helped his work among the people.

A DAUGHTER OF ABRAHAM.

THE deliverance through faith and prayer of a sufferer of many years, was described by Mrs. Willis, the thankful subject of the cure, at a recent meeting at Bethshan, as reported by Mrs. M. Baxter, in her magazine, Thy Healer. She said: "I was converted to God in 1876, at Ramsey. I was then suffering from spinal disease. I went to different hospitals; the last I went to was at Southampton. I was there some time and was then discharged as incurable. I went under several examinations and the doctors all pronounced me incurable. I knew the Lord had pardoned all my sins; I never lost the witness of that. There was not so much teaching then as there is now about trusting Christ for our bodies as we do for the salvation of our souls, so I concluded I should be a sufferer all my life. When the doctors said they could do no more, I went home and was much worse. My husband had to carry me up and down stairs. On one Sunday, I had a dear brother who was a local preacher with the Wesleys to tea with us, and then he and my husband went to chapel together. After they had gone, as I was sitting by the table, I drew the Bible near me and opened it at Luke 13, and read down the chapter until I came to these words: 'And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?' The Spirit of God applied those words to my heart, and showed me that I was a daughter of Abraham by faith in Jesus Christ. I knew that my sins were forgiven me, and that I was justified from all transgression, and lived in my first love. Then I said to myself: 'Don't you think the Lord Jesus is able to do now the same as in the days of His flesh?' I answered, 'Yes; I do believe.' And then: 'Do you believe the Lord Jesus is able to make your back straight?' I said, 'I do believe He is able;' and with that came the power, and the feeling that He had done it, and I said, 'Lord, I believe thou hast done it,' and I got up and walked, and from that day to this I have never suffered from that disease—never.

When my husband came home from the chapel, he found me walking about the room, and, praise Him, up to this moment I have walked in that way, and the Lord has in many ways made me a blessing to others."

BRAZIL AND THE GOSPEL.

(See Illustrations on this page.)

OUR illustration presents two American Missionaries, a native Catechist and his family. In September last, Rev. J. W. Morris and Rev. L. L. Kinsolving, presbyters of the Protestant Episcopal Church, started to found missions of that Church in Brazil. The American Church Missionary Society, in sending them, decided that they should labor where no other Protestant missions had been placed.

Their reception by the Presbyterian and Methodist missionaries was most cordial, welcoming them to an immense field but sparsely occupied. They went at once to a mountain town, and lived among the people, studying their language and habits. In the short space of nine months they were able to preach in Portuguese; and selecting a Christian young man as their catechist, they sailed from Rio, eight days down the coast, to Rio Grande do Sul, the most southern State of Brazil. In the town of Porto Alegre they opened a chapel, in their own hired house as in Apostolic days. At once it was crowded. They say, "The best of all was the way these people listened to the strange story of the Royal Wedding Feast, and listened, most of them with tears in their eyes. It must have been the power of the Spirit in answer to our earnest prayers."

After the second service, which was crowded like the other, a gentleman offered his house, a mile distant, for services, and Boaventura, the catechist, accompanied them. He had a New Testament with him, and they say, "The people came up to examine it. They had never seen one; priced it, looked into it, read some of it, and were, withal, as curious about it as the Lhattan Indians once were over the compass of Captain John Smith."

They have found an earnest young man, Vicente Brande, who is trying to establish a school, and to preach the Gospel, on his own responsibility, without aid from any Christian. He is anxious to be guided by them, and to assist in their work.

The second illustration shows a street in Porto Alegre. It is a beautiful city of some 50,000 inhabitants, and is situated upon a magnificent bay, opening from the Atlantic, and a ording room for extensive commerce. Its public buildings are very fine, and its people are refined and intelligent. They have great veneration for everything from our country.

A Street in Porto Alegre, Brazil.

Our missionaries say, A good, honest school is the great need here. Thousands of people dislike the Jesuit schools, and are anxious for an Evangelical school. An American school, by American teachers, would literally shake the town. By this time next year, send us at two earnest-hearted Christian women, who love children, love to teach, and above all, love the souls of men for Christ's sake—we could, through them, do a work in this growing town that would tell on the future of the whole new state and lay deep the foundations of a true church here."

Who will go as a clergyman or as a teacher?

The American Church Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Bible House, New York, to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is indebted for these pictures, has now two missionaries and two catechists in Porto Alegre and the surrounding country. When will the Church of Christ extend her hand to those who are seeking to grope their way out of darkness to the full light of the Gospel?

SLAVE GIRLS IN THE SOUDAN.

(See Illustration.)

THE accompanying picture is reproduced from a photograph which was taken at Cairo. It represents a group of slave girls whom the Arabs had bought or stolen in the Soudan and were carrying away to the markets, when the British forces in Egypt interfered and induced the Khedive to liberate. Whatever may be said of the motives which have led England to occupy Egypt and extend the sphere of her influence; whether or no the presence of British forces in Egypt can be justified, there can be no question as to the beneficent results that are flowing from the occupation. A determined stand is being made against the slave trade, and the Khedive is too sensible of the advantages he gains from the help of the British not to yield to the pressure they bring upon him to suppress the inhuman traffic.

It was the notorious Zebehr Pasha who brought the iniquitous business of slave-stealing and slave-selling in the Soudan to a perfect state of organization. The first heard of this inhuman brute was from the explorer Schweinfurth, who, in 1864, found him far up the Nile, living in a regal state. He was surrounded by a regular court, and had a small, well-disciplined army. Strongly fortified posts were garrisoned by his troops, forming a chain of forts across the Soudan. He had grown enormously rich by his traffic in slaves. His troops would raid a village, burn and pillage, kill all who resisted, manacle all who submitted, men, women and children, and drive them across the desert to be sold as slaves. Ismail had made him a pasha as a reward for distinguished service. This service consisted in Zebehr, who had a quarrel with the Sultan of Darfur, attacking that potentate, killing him, and adding his dominions to his territory of Egypt. His ambition was to be made the Governor of the Soudan, and it was his ambition that resulted in his downfall.

Zebehr went to Cairo to press his claims, taking with him a fund worth half a million dollars to spend in bribes. English influence was against him and especially the influence of Gordon, who eventually was made Governor of the Soudan. Zebehr was detained in Cairo, and Gordon went down to fight the slave-dealers. He intercepted several caravans. In nine months he rescued over two thousand slaves from the clutches of Zebehr's people, some of them being children not more than three years old. Meanwhile, Zebehr, in Cairo, was intriguing against Gordon and the English, and supplying the Mahdi with information which he used to only too terrible a purpose. The slave raids still went on, and to this day they have not been suppressed, though much curtailed.

A Group of Liberated Slaves in the Soudan.

How appalling are the horrors of these slave raids in the villages and how terrible are the cruelties practiced upon the victims has been graphically shown by the exhibition of a series of sketches of slave life recently made in the Soudan. One of these represents a one-armed man. Mr. Johnson says that when the man was captured a shackle was put on his wrist and tightly welded there. The operation caused the iron to eat into the flesh and caused gangrene, and when he was liberated his arm had to be cut off to save his life. In Gen. Gordon's story of his life in the Soudan there are still more horrible stories of cruelty narrated. Many of the poor victims were medically treated by his orders and some lives were saved, but in a large number of cases the patients sank under the barbarities they had suffered in the long march from their native villages to the markets. A terrible famine is now prevailing in the Soudan, due, it is believed, to the attacks of the slave stealers, who, in their raids, burn the crops and villages. The natives knowing their liability to these raids have been discouraged from sowing and planting.

Written expressly for The Christian Herald.

WHY HE WAVERED.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. Leander S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 510.)

THE Sunday described in the last chapter, was a momentous one in Howard Wescott's spiritual history. He stood face to face with Heritage in the street of Basserrine, with a strange, new feeling in his heart. "Ah!" he repeated, "that is the stipulation. We must come. Well, I suppose it is fair. I do not see why I should take any attitude but that of an humble learner. I have no particular mental gifts to be proud of, and, Heritage, I do want to learn."

"God will not withhold His Spirit from one who comes in that way," said Heritage. "Come into my library a little while, Wescott, and let us have a word of prayer together."

A half hour later, Howard walked from that room with a face that glowed. Not that he was a changed man, but that the way to the truth had been plainly opened, and he had resolved to pursue it. Some bitter trials still awaited him before the night of doubt would be fully dispelled, and they came from an unexpected source. However, before they are described, another incident must be inserted in its chronological order, as a prelude to the events that follow.

Before parting with him that day, Heritage had proposed that they go together to a four o'clock service in the afternoon, at a certain church whose pastor had gained some local celebrity as a rationalist, one who apotheosized his own powers of reason, and had more confidence in his own inspiration than in that of the Biblical writers; and yet he scarcely had the moral courage to make a public avowal of his heterodox notions. He probably shrank from infidelity, while he could not suppress his doubts, and therefore attempted a theological compromise between unbelief and orthodoxy.

At the appointed hour the young men entered the church, and found a meagre congregation of ultra-fashionable people, some of whom paid little heed to the preacher's essay. A feeling of aversion took possession of Howard's mind as he listened, and it must have left its impress on his face, for on their way from the church, Heritage said:

"What did you think of the sermon, Wescott? You didn't look very pleased."

"Do you call that a sermon?" said Howard.

"Only with a grain of salt, and a good-sized one at that," laughed the other.

"Well, I should call it nothing but chatter," averred Howard, impatiently. "I dislike dogmatism as much as any one, but to hint at this, and make a thrust at that, and say nothing after all, is positively exasperating. That man doesn't himself know what he believes, or if he does, he hasn't the courage to declare it. I couldn't help the feeling that he is really an infidel at heart, but doesn't like to say so."

"You think he has adopted a kind of hybrid theology, do you?"

"I doubt whether he has adopted any theology at all. His idea of preaching consists in giving a little thrust at orthodoxy and then taking it back; and then giving a little thrust at infidelity and taking that back. I don't wonder he has small congregations; most people want something more positive, more masculine, more bracing than he gives them."

"But you know there are several such preachers in the country who attract large crowds," argued Heritage.

"But they have genius, and people regard them as curiosities, or admire them for their brilliant talents," contended the young thinker. "This man has no genius; he is an ordinary mortal who affects astuteness and eccentricity, and in that way spoils everything. His production was very different from Dr. Hamlyn's sermon this morning. The Doctor left no one in doubt as to his position, and I couldn't help feeling thrilled by his earnestness, even if I didn't believe all he said."

"Yes, the Doctor is a grand man. I wanted to say several days ago, that I should like to have you go to him for advice. He can help you, I know. If I should be called out of town within the next few weeks—a dear friend of mine in the East is seriously ill—I hope you will remember that Dr. Hamlyn will be your friend, if you seek counsel of him."

Was there something prophetic in Heritage's words?

Afterward it seemed as if the provision for a possible separation had been prompted by a presentiment; but they parted easily and pleasantly as usual, and Wescott hurried to his home to take a hasty meal before going to hear Dr. Hamlyn's evening discourse.

"No man cometh to the Father but by Me," was the text that Dr. Hamlyn announced. The main thought of his sermon was, that the only way to know God with a positive assurance was to accept Christ, who came to reveal the Father to the world. Every man who truly accepts Christ knows, not only that God exists, but also that He is the Father of His people; in short, the God whose attributes are pictured in the Bible. The argument was enforced by apt illustrations drawn from history and experience.

"That was a wonderful, a powerful sermon," Howard said to Miss More, whom he joined at the church door and accompanied on her way home. "I never heard a sermon before that impressed me so deeply."

"Dr. Hamlyn always preaches well," was her rejoinder.

"I once thought," Howard went on, "that men who believed the Bible—I mean in the orthodox way—were narrow, unlearned, bigoted, and that a little more enlightenment would soon force them to revise their theology. But I declare, since I have made the acquaintance of Robert Heritage and Dr. Hamlyn, I've about come to the conclusion that I must have reckoned without my host. Both of them are cultured men, and not a bit narrow-sphered."

"I have often wondered how they can be so positive," said Miss More, in a voice that quavered a little.

Howard looked at her in surprise. "Do you mean," he said, "that you have doubts?"

"That is a home question, Mr. Wescott," she replied, with some hesitation. "Perhaps I ought not to answer. But I will be frank. I am constitutionally prone to scepticism. Doubt has been present in my mind ever since I can remember. Often while Dr. Hamlyn is preaching, I find myself trying to meet his arguments with counter-arguments of my own. I can't help it. I seldom speak of my doubts, for I do not love them, and would gladly exchange them for certainty, such as the minister spoke of to-night, if I could obtain it. My father was sceptical for many years. Doubt of revelation seems to be a part of my nature."

"Have you ever read anti-Christian literature?"

"Never!" she replied. "I have read the Bible a good deal, and have looked around me at the world with all its woe and anguish, and these doubts come without my bidding. I confess they make me unhappy. Mr. Wescott, I would give anything to be able to believe in the Bible as a revelation from God," and the tears gleamed in her eyes.

"How can you teach in the Sunday-school and sing in the choir under the circumstances?" It was a cruel question, and he could have bit his tongue the moment it was out.

The girl winced. "Do you think I am doing wrong?" she asked, presently.

"Forgive me the heartless question," he said, apologetically. "It was brutal to ask it."

"No; it was perfectly natural for you to think of it. My conscience has troubled me often on that point. I have frequently resolved to resign my position; but one thing has kept me from doing so. What would become of me if I did not come under Christian influences? if I could no longer sing those grand sacred melodies? I believe I should rush headlong into infidelity, and I shrink from that, for I don't see how it would solve any of my difficulties."

"Besides, your womanly instincts revolt against becoming an avowed unbeliever," said Howard. "It seems natural to expect to find religion in a woman. My brother-in-law isn't much of a churchman, and sometimes laughs at religious professors; but I believe he is actually proud of the fact that my sister is a sincere Christian."

As he spoke a deep crimson suffused her cheeks, but she kept her thoughts to herself. Then he told her of his own doubts, explaining that he had at one time been outspoken in his unbelief, but that all his objections had simply rebounded against himself, without accomplishing any good for others. He also spoke of Heritage's influence upon him, and asked her to read his Parted Lives, which she promised to do. From his heart he pitied her, and could almost have wept when he thought of the doubts that lurked in her mind against her will. Surely, he thought, as he pursued his homeward walk, there ought to be some power able to exorcise those doubts. Then he wondered whether Heritage had not that day pointed out the shining way to relief. The thought brought his friendly mentor to his mind, and with it came the reflection that perhaps Heritage had hesitated to introduce him to Addie More, because he knew something of her unsettled state of mind. Or might he have had another reason? No; Howard would not harbor the thought of a possible rivalry with his friend, who had given no sign of an attachment to Addie More. Still the thought troubled him, fight it as he would, and so, on the following Friday, he paid Heritage a visit at his room.

"I have been talking with Miss More," he said, "You remember you were kind enough to introduce me to her."

"Yes," said Heritage, "I have wondered since whether I was doing either of you a service. There is a little more congeniality between you than may be good for either. Excuse my taking the tone of a mentor, but you have seemed inclined to place me in that position, and one naturally takes advantage of it."

"I wish you to do so, if you will, Heritage," Wescott answered. "I need counsel and I believe you are precisely the kind of man who is able to advise me wisely."

"Thank you for the compliment, Wescott, I do not know whether you are right, but as you give me the opportunity I shall use it to the best of my ability and all my efforts will be to lead you to Him, who if any man lack wisdom will give it to him liberally and upbraid not. But about Miss More: My idea of a beneficial acquaintance with a lady is that the lady shall not be exactly of the same cast of mind as the man. She should be able to lead him in some measure. If she travels mentally in the same direction she increases the momentum which is not always well for him. I would rearrange many associations if I had the power. I have my ideal of a perfect unit composed of the male and female elements. Two unworldly romantic natures coming together lack the practical and do not make a good working unit in this practical world. On the other hand two commonplace practical natures coming together are apt to make life sordid, low and unbeautiful. I would have the feminine capable of supplying the elements the masculine lacks, whatever they may be. So both are benefitted by the association and each gets from the other new light on every subject and so both get an all-round nature. Now to come from the abstract to the concrete. Miss More has doubts of her own and if you introduce her to your doubts and she you to her's, you will between you pile up a considerable mountain which neither of you may be able to scale. Now if you or she were strong in the faith I think you might help each other. Of course I am speaking now of the mental constitution in a transition state. I would never recommend an avowed Christian becoming familiar with an avowed infidel. The thing would be horrible and would involve endless disputings, but in your state I think the acquaintance of a real earnest Christian girl would be more salutary than one with Miss More. I should not have introduced you had I not foreseen that you would have obtained an introduction easily from some one else if I had declined."

"Oh, do not worry about your share of the responsibility," said Wescott, "I do not think that Miss More will add to my doubts. She suffers too much with them herself to wish to impart them to anyone else. She would gladly have them removed. Still, I understand your principle, and there seems wisdom in it. I suppose, however, that it is congeniality that attracts every man to a woman."

"Well, I have delivered my soul," said Heritage, with a sigh. "Having put you on your guard, I am free to say that I have a high esteem for Miss More, and wish most heartily that we may yet have you both with us on the right side in this conflict between Christianity and unbelief."

Wescott replied: "I say amen to that most earnestly." He rose to say good-by to his kindly mentor as he spoke. As they stood with clasped hands Heritage said:

"I am going over to Moxon to-morrow, to attend the Teachers' Institute. I shall not see you for a few days. I have spoken of you to Dr. Hamlyn, and you will have a warm welcome from him should you like to consult him while I am away. He may help you better than I. I would advise you to see him."

Heritage stood at his door watching the handsome young fellow as he strode away, and offered a silent prayer that he might be led to lay all his doubts at the feet of Christ. Then he turned into his room to complete his preparations for his journey.

The next morning as he was on his way to take the train, the letter-carrier put an envelope into his hands, the address on which was in Metta Chapman's handwriting. He could not read it then, but seated in the carriage he opened it and read as follows:

"Dear Mr. Heritage: I have allowed so many days to pass before keeping my promise to write you, because I have been troubled about a matter which necessarily affects my decision. It is a delicate matter, and to ask you about it seems like inquisitiveness; yet it is better to seem inquisitive though I am not that, than to leave in doubt a matter which must weigh with me in deciding my answer. You remember that in our last interview I referred to that meeting between yourself, and a lady when we first became acquainted. I did so with a purpose, hoping you would explain it. The fact is that an account of your relations with that lady reached my ears reflecting seriously upon you. I could not believe that account, but I do not know how much truth there may be in it. I think I am justified in asking for an explanation from you. I must leave it for you to decide whether you will give it; but I cannot give you the answer you wish until the unpleasant impression the incident made on my mind is removed. I am sure whether you approve my request or not, you will admit that it is best to be frank in so serious a matter. Your friend METTA CHAPMAN."

Perhaps Heritage did not acquit himself so well as usual in his address at the Institute that day. His hearers said that he seemed distraught, and as if some trouble preyed on his mind. His thoughts seemed mixed and even his grammar was a little hazy. He was not doing himself justice, and like a wise man he shortened his address and sat down with a sigh of relief.

(To be Continued.)

"The Christian Herald" Binder. — Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

the world was made by God's creative the Hebrews marched to gain the land.
contains the law, holy and just and records the tribes enrolled—all sons of Sham's blood.
Deuteronomy records God's mighty ma into Canaan's land the host of Is-leads.
their rebellion oft provokes the Lord
ite.
records the faith of one well pleasing in ight.
Second Samuel of Jesse's son we read.
In First and Second Kings revolted his seed.
and Second Chronicles see Judah cap-ade,
ads a remnant back by princely Cyrus'
ills of Zion Nehemiah builds again.
er saves her people from plot of wicked read how faith will live beneath afflic-rod, s Psalms are precious songs to every
of God.
bs like a goodly string of choicest appear.
teaches man how vain all things are Song of Solomon exalts sweet Sharon's t, the Saviour and the King, the rapt shows.
Jeremiah apostate Israel scorns; Lamentations then their awful downturns.
In wondrous words of dazzling mys-and empires yet to come Daniel in and of mercy Hosea love to tell;
as the blessed days when God with all dwell.
s herdsman Amos received his call;
sh prophecies of Edom's final fall.
nes a wondrous type of Christ, our ord.
ances Judah lost—lost, but again re-res on Nineveh just judgment shall ped.
of Chaldea's coming doom Habakkuk's give:
phiah warns the Jews to turn, repent to those who saw the Temple built a prophesied of Christ's triumphant he last who touched the high prodord;
sublimely show the coming of the Mark, and Luke and John the Holy wrote.
up, the Saviour died—His life, and He ught.
ow God the Apostles owned with very place.
mans teaches us how man is saved
n Corinthians, instructs, exhorts, rs that faith in Christ alone the lives.
Philippians tell what Christians live to God and for eternity.
ns we are taught the Lord will in heaven.
Titus a bishop's rule is given.
as a Christian's love, which only know.
is the gospel prefigured by the law.
without holiness faith is but vain da.
is the narrow way in which the led.
epistles on love delights to dwell.
wful warning of judgment, wrath he prophecies of that tremendous day ad Christ alone—shall be the tremit's stay.

PRAYER IN A CRISIS.

THE man of strong faith finds the promise fulfilled continually: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." An instance of this fact is quoted by Dr. R. T. Pearson, formerly of Philadelphia, from the history of mission work in Turkey. He says: "In Turkey, in 1839, the Sultan Mahmoud said, 'There shall not remain in the empire a representative of the Christian religion.' Dr. Hamlin came into the house to Dr. Goodall, and said, 'Doctor, it is all over with us—we have to leave; the American Consul and the British Ambassador both say that it is no use to meet with anta- gonism this violent and vindictive mon- arch.' Dr. Goodall, sitting in his chair, moved to and fro with undisturbed serenity. Dr. Hamlin said, 'Well, you do not seem to give yourself much anxiety.' That de- vout and godly man looked up to heaven and said, 'Dr. Hamlin, One higher than the Sultan, in answer to prayer, can change that decree.' And they gave themselves to prayer, and the next day the Sultan Mah- moud died, and the decree has never since been mentioned, and is only a matter of history. There the ruler conspired against the King of Zion to defeat the plan of evangelising His empire and to expel His missionaries; and the King Eternal stretch- ed forth His rod of iron and instantly 'dashed him in pieces like a potter's vessel.' "In Siam, in 1851, there was a still more striking illustration of the fact that God in- terposes for His servants, in answer to be- lieving prayer. The king would not even allow the missionaries to get premises in which to live, or ground upon which to build, and would scarcely suffer them to obtain a lodging. They began to despair and were only waiting for a vessel to bear them away from the harbor of Bangkok, be- lieving that their work was all in vain; but meanwhile they called upon Almighty God to interpose, and again the King of Zion stretched forth His rod and smote that mon- arch, and broke him in pieces, 'like a potter's vessel.' And when his corpse was borne to burial, the question came up, 'Who is to be his successor?' and again they besought God to interpose. The king that was selected was the only man in the empire that had ever been trained by a Christian missionary. He was not himself a Christian, but in studying language and philosophy and history and political econ- omy with the missionaries, he had imbibed tolerant and catholic impulses, and he in- augurated in the Empire of Siam the most progressive and the most liberal policy in all Asia, and his successor, Chulalongkorn, is to-day the most enlightened sovereign on that continent. He and his wife are nursing father and nursing mother of Christian mis- sions. Only two years ago they made munificent presents to our American mis- sionaries to enlarge the borders of their hospital and dispensary work."

Dyspepsia

Makes many lives miserable, and often leads to self destruction. Distress after eating, sick head-ache, heartburn, sour stomach, mental depres- sion, etc., are caused by this very common and increasing disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla tones the stomach, creates an appetite, promotes healthy digestion, relieves sick headache, clears the mind, and cures the most obstinate cases of dys- pepsia. Read the following:

"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. In an hour after eating I would experience a faintness or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced. It relieved me of that faint, tired, all-gone feeling. I have felt so much better since I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, that I am happy to recommend it." G. A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass.

N. B. Be sure to get only

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach. FOR A DISORDERED LIVER try BEECHAM'S PILLS.

"In the Wash"

That's where your delicate handker- chiefs come to be "more hole-y than righteous"—certainly not in the show- like service required of them—more or less true of all things washed.

Give two equally delicate handkerchiefs equal service for one year.

Wash one with soap—usual way—the other with Pearlline without rubbing, as directed on each package—wash the one you value most with Pearlline—it will be far the best at the end of the year. The old-fashioned way of rub, rub, rub, is slow work, poor work, slow death to women—quick death to fine things, and renders coarse things useless long be- fore their time. Pearlline does away with all this. Costs but five cents to try it; directions for easy washing on every package; easy for you, easy on things washed. We can't make you try Pearlline—you would thank us if we could. Millions are grateful for its help. Envious soap makers try to imitate it—borrowed brains are cheap—and so are their productions.

Send it back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you. "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your gro- cer sends you something in place of Pearlline, do the honest thing—send it back.

JAMES PYLE, New York.

ENGLISH DECORATED

Dinner Set, No. 90. 112 Pieces.

Premium with an Order of $20.00

Or packed and delivered at depot for $9.00 Cash. We have hundreds of other Sets, plain and decorated.

THE LONDON TEA CO., 805 Washington Street, Boston.

JOHNSON'S ANODYNE LINIMENT

ESTABLISHED 1810.

Unlike any Other.

Originated by an Old Family Physician. THINK OF IT.

In use over 40 YEARS in one Family.

Dr. I. S. JOHNSON & Co.—It is sixty years since I first learned of this now celebrated remedy for the com- mon ills of life—Johnson's Anodyne Liniment; for more than forty years I have used it in my family. I say (unasked by you) I regard it one of the best and safest remedies that can be found, used internal or external, in all cases it is claimed to relieve or cure.

O. H. INGALLS, Dea. 2d Baptist Ch., Bangor, Maine. Should have Johnson's Anodyne Liniment in the house for Croup, Colds, Sore Throat, Tonsillitis, Colic, Cuts, Bruises, Cramps and Pains. Delays may cost a life. Relieves Summer Complaints like magic. Price, 35 cts. post-paid; 6 bot- tles, $2. Express paid, I. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass.

P. D. & S. Pens

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

Send 10 cents for Sample Card with 12 Pens. A. S. BARNES & Co., New York.

FRUIT DIET Is the best now. If you want the latest and best work on the use of fruits of all kinds, in all ways, send for FRUITS AND HOW TO USE THEM, price $1.00, just published. Address FOWLER & WELLS CO., 777 Broadway, New York City.

"MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP for CHILDREN TEETHING." SOFTENS THE GUMS, REDUCES INFLAMMATION, ALLAYS PAIN, CURES WIND COLIC. Twenty-five cts. a bottle

WE are IMPORTERS of Tea and Coffee; China and Crockery, and do the largest Tea and Coffee business in Boston (direct with con- sumers). We also carry a large stock and sell at the lowest possible Cash prices Dinner and Tea Sets, Sil- ver-plated Ware, Lamps, etc. To those who take the time and trouble to get up clubs for Tea, Coffee, Spices and Extracts, we offer premiums. In buying Tea and Coffee from us, you get full value for the money invested and get a premium, and you get goods that are direct from the IMPORTERS. If you buy Tea and Coffee from your grocer you pay three or four profits and pay for a premium but do not get it. In an article published in one of the largest dailies in this country it was claimed the tea bought from the retail grocer showed a profit of 100 per cent. The moral is plain, buy from first hands.

We have been doing business in Boston for 16 years and the publishers of this paper will tell you of our un- doubted reliability. We do a business of over $300,000 yearly, and our Cash sales of Dinner, Tea and Toi- let Sets, Silver Ware, Lamps, etc., amounted to $41,000 in 1889, aside from our Tea and Coffee sales. (Rogers Knives $3.50 per dozen). Our illustrated Price and Premium list tells the whole story. We like to mail it to all who write for it; it costs you nothing and will interest you. 120 pages.

SENSIBLE WOMEN

all want FERRIS'

GOOD SENSE CORSET WAISTS.

THOUSANDS

NOW IN USE.

Best for Health, Eco- nomy and Beauty.

BUTTONS at front in- stead of CLASPS.

RING BUCKLE at hip for Hose supporters.

Tape-fastened But- tons—won't pull off.

Gord. Edge Button Holes—won't wear out.

FIT ALL AGES— Infants to Adults.

Sold by Leading

RETAILERS

everywhere.

Send for Circular,

FERRIS BROS.,

Manufacturers,

341 BROADWAY, New York.

MARSHALL FIELD & CO., CHICAGO,

WHOLESALE WESTERN AGENTS.

THE HOUSEWIFE 4 months on trial for 10cts.

If you mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. HOUSEWIFE PUBLISHING CO., New York City.

SAMPLE COPY of Ladies' Home Journal and Premium Supplement, sent free to any address CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia.

AGENTS Proof $100 month made selling our new Talmage Book, also Mother, Home and Heaven, by F. L. Cuyler, $2.75. 10,000 Curiosities of the Bible, $2. E. B. TREAT, Publisher, New York.

THE PURE IN HEART.

BY LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

"Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." Matt. 5: 8.

Oh precious words! Oh promise sweet!
Oh standard lifted high,
For souls who fain would follow Christ,
To perfect purity.

They shall see God! Yea, day by day,
He walks in converse sweet
With such as these, and thus they grow
In His dear love complete.

They shall see God! O Holy One,
I rest in Thee secure,
For all my heart to Thee is given,
And Thou canst keep it pure.

Come Thou, and dwell Thy very self,
Within my inmost heart;
For pure life's streams shall flow, if pure
The fount from which they start.

Make heart and life one spotless page,
O'er which Thine hand may move,
And write in lines indelible,
Thy purity and love.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

For a "hot weather" medicine Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled. It neutralizes the depressing effect of the heat, by giving tone and strength to the whole system, and creating an appetite.

A MISSIONARY IN A BLIZZARD.

DURING a journey two years ago in the neighborhood of Lake Winnipeg the famous Canadian missionary, the Rev. Egerton R. Young, was caught in a blizzard. He says that he had with him only an Indian lad fifteen years old. They had two teams of dogs and but little food. For a while they battled on, hoping to make the shore, but ere long they were compelled to stop and confess themselves beaten. The blinding storm prevented them from seeing but a few feet ahead, and they feared lest they had wandered far out into the lake. A consultation was held, and a meal, the best that could be got, was made from frozen pemmican. A dog called Jack came close to his master's side, and shared his master's food. Soon a plan presented itself to Mr. Young: putting his arm around Jack's neck, he spoke to the intelligent creature—"Jack, my noble dog, do you know if it is very doubtful if we shall ever see the red light from the windows of our home again—doubtful if you will ever be on the grey wolf-skin before the study fire, while the youngsters roll over you in sport? I fear the snow will be our winding-sheet. I am going to trust myself to you, Jack; do the best you can for me." He then wrapped up Alec, the Indian boy, and lashed him securely to his sled, bidding him keep awake or he would be frozen to death. Arranging the dog train of his sled in order, he fastened its leader by a rope to the rear of his own, and, wrapping himself as best he could, shouted to the dogs, "Marche." The leader of the train was a magnificent white dog. He turned his head waiting for the word, "right" or "left." But Jack was tugging at his collar as if impatient to be off, so crying, "Go on, Jack, whichever way you like, I know nothing about it," off they started. It was then midday. On they went for hours. Ever and again Mr. Young would cry to Alec, "Don't go to sleep, or you will never wake till the judgment day," and Alec would answer back. The cold was intense. Still on, till night fell. Still forward, hour after hour, until three hours after dark the dogs broke into a gallop. Suddenly there was a shock. They had reached a great bank of ice and snow, made by the natives as they cut the ice to get water for their village. Soon the glad sounds were heard of the barking of Esquimaux dogs, and the dull red light from the wigwams told they had reached an Indian village. Out poured the men, wondering who could have arrived in such a storm. With care they lifted the helpless travellers off the sleds, carried them to the fire in the wigwam, and rejoiced with them at their wonderful escape. For seven and a half hours the faithful dogs had drawn them, a distance of over sixty miles.

A DESERTER'S EXCUSE.

ONE of the officers in high command in the British navy, who is an earnest Christian, relates the following incident which occurred recently: "A boy employed in one of my best ships ran away. We were rather surprised, as he had been a general favorite with all on board, and the captain was very fond of him. I resolved to endeavor to get him back, so sent for him. When he stood in my office before me, naming him I said, 'Whatever is the matter? Why did you run away from your ship?' But he kept an obstinate silence. 'Answer me, boy, what was wrong that you ran away?' Still no reply. 'Was not your food good?' 'Yes.' 'Were you too hard wrought?' 'Oh, no, sir.' 'Did you like your captain?' 'Yes.' 'Do you like the sea?' 'Yes, very much.' And it was not until after a great deal of pressing and many blushes that he at length told me that during a great storm which they had lately encountered, the captain had lost his temper, and sworn at the men, fearfully, and he could not bear to stay in a ship with a swearing captain. After dismissing the boy I sent for the captain, and asked, 'What kind of boy was that who ran away lately?' 'He was a first-rate boy, I am sorry I have lost him.' 'Well, do you know why he ran away?' 'No, I do not. I should like to get him back.' 'I had him up here,' I said, 'and after a great deal of pressing he told me that whenever a storm or any other emergency arose you were in the habit of swearing and taking the name of the Lord in vain, and he could not stand it.' 'Just like him,' murmured the captain, much moved by what I had told him. 'Noble boy! God helping me, I will never again swear or take that Holy Name in vain,' and as he said these words he brushed a tear from his eyes. He is now following humbly in the footsteps of his Lord."

A REVIVAL IN INDIA.

A LADY missionary at Balasore, Orissa, India, writing under date of June last, says: "We are having some old-fashioned Methodist meetings, singing, praying, confessing sins. We have two native brethren here conducting the services, and they are holding meetings all day, and nearly all night. These men are getting worn out. Even boys belonging to the orphanage, ask for the prayers of the congregation, hardly any of them have dry eyes, they cry and cry again, their feelings are so strong; I one youth had to leave the chapel to give vent to his sobs outside. These dear boys form themselves into a body and go singing along the road, not content with this, they go to the houses to fetch the people to the services. Whilst we were at dinner these lads came and begged permission for all our servants to accompany them to the chapel; this we gladly acceded to, for their benefit. All our servants are Christians. Of course, just now, there is a great deal of emotion, but it is certain great good has been done."

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

DO YOU WRITE?

The Nellie Bly Fountain Pen retails at fifty cents. A perfect pen—as good as the best, except that no gold pen is used. Useful to office men, collectors, salesmen, housekeepers, teachers and pupils. Sample sent to any address on receipt of price. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal discounts.
WM. E. PIAGET & CO.,
301 Broadway, New York.

Rubifoam

A PERFECT LIQUID DENTIFRICE
DELICIOUSLY FLAVORED.ITS USE INSURES
BEAUTIFUL
CLEAN TEETH

Price 25 cents

E. W. HOYT
& CO.,

LOWELL, MASS.

New York City, 21 East 14th Street.

METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. The most select musical school in the United States. Exceptional advantages: Voice, Piano-forte, Organ, Violin, Harmony and Languages. Successful musicians and eminent teachers comprise the faculty—all actual employment at the Conservatory. Prominent among them are: Dudley Buck, Albert E. Parsons, Director Piano-forte Department, Harry Rowe Shelley, Louis Arthur Russell, George M. Greene. Applicants without musical talent not accepted. Send for circular.
R. W. Greene, Gen'l Man'r. C. B. Hawley, Musical Dir.

Better than Tea and Coffee for the Nerves.

Van Houten's Cocoa

Appetizing--Easily Digested.

Ask your Grocer for it, take no other. [66]

TYPEWRITERS.

Largest like establishment in the world. First-class Second-hand Instruments at half new prices. Unprejudiced advice given on all makes. Machines sold on monthly payments. Any Instrument manufactured shipped, privilege to examine. EXCHANGING A SPECIALTY. Wholesale prices to dealers. Illustrated Catalogues Free.
TYPEWRITER 70 Broadway, New York.
HEADQUARTERS, 144 La Salle St., Chicago.

"Pigs may whistle, but they hae an ill mouth for it." Don't use common soap for scouring! It is not suited to it. Use

SAPOLIO.

Sapolio is a solid cake of Scouring Soap.

3 MONTHS FOR 10c.

To secure at once for our popular magazine, NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING, THE GREATEST OF ALL HOME JOURNALS, 25,000 new subscribers at ONCE, we will send it three months for only 10c. Regular subscription, $1.00. NATIONAL HOUSEKEEPING is a full 32-page magazine, with a handsome colored cover each issue. It is complete on all home subjects, PRACTICAL COOKING, RECEIPTS, KITCHEN and Dining Room Home Decorations, Brick-a-Brac, Needle Work, Short Stories of Travel and Serials by our best authors, Historical Notes, &c. Subscribe now, as you will never have such an offer again. Address, National Housekeeping, 72 Cortland Street, New York City.

CHANCE FOR ALL

To Enjoy a Cup of Perfect Tea. A TRIAL ORDER OF 3½ pounds of Fine Tea, either Oolong, Japan, Imperial, Gunpowder, Young Hyson, Mixed, English Breakfast or Sun Sun Chop, sent by mail on receipt of $2.00. Be particular and state what kind of Tea you want. Greatest inducement ever offered to get orders for our celebrated Teas, Coffees and Baking Powder. For full particulars address
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
P.O. Box 289, 81 and 83 Vesey St., New York.

28th EDITION REVISED AND ENLARGED.

THE KING'S SON;

A MEMOIR OF BILLY BRAY.
WITH PORTRAIT.

Of Billy Bray, the famous Methodist preacher of Cornwall, England, it may be truly said "he yet speaketh," although he has been dead for more than twenty years. It is reported that at least six hundred persons are known to have been led to Christ by reading his biography, entitled "The King's Son; or a Memoir of Billy Bray." These converts are found in all parts of the world, and come from almost every position of life. Noted infidels, eminent formalists, and cultivated scholars, as well as obscure and unlearned men, have been drawn into the kingdom of grace by his fascinating story. The most noted preacher of the age frequently finds the striking illustrations which enrich his sermons in the Life of Billy Bray. The editor, F. W. Bourne, has done his work well. The readers of "Daniel Quorn and His Religious Notions" will particularly enjoy this biography.

12 mo. Cloth. 160 pp. Price, 75 Cents.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

COOL MUSIC BOOKS

No, not Cool, but filled with that Restful, Harmonious, Soothing Music, which helps one wonderfully to Endure Extremes of Weather, Hot or Cold.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Piano Classics. Vol. 1. 44 pieces, -
Piano Classics. Vol. 2. 31 pieces, -
Classical Pianist. 42 pieces, -
Popular Dance Music. 66 pieces, -
Sabbath Day Music. 38 pieces, -
Operatic Piano Collection. 10 operas, -
Young Players' Popular Coll. 51 pieces, -
Classic 4-Hand Collection. 19 duets, -
Old Familiar Dances. 100 pieces, -

VOCAL.

On the whole, the most popular collection of merry, company entertaining songs, is College Songs. 82 bright melodies. 50 cts. Nearly 200,000 sold.

Popular Song Collection. 37 songs, -
Choice Sacred Solos. 34 songs, -
Choice Sacred Solos. Low Voice. 40 songs, -
Song Classics. Sop. or Ten. Vol. 1. 50 songs, -
Song Classics. Sop. or Ten. Vol. 2. 39 songs, -
Song Classics. Low Voice. 47 songs, -
Classic Bar and Bass Songs. 33 songs, -
Classic Tenor Songs. 36 songs, -
Classic Vocal Duets. 26 duets, -
Good Old Songs We Used to Sing. 125 songs, -

Send on your $, and receive book by return mail.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, Boston.
C. H. Ditson & Co., 867 Broadway, New York.

WINNED THE LARGEST, LATEST, STRONGEST, CHEAPEST.

By Ira D. Sankey Sunday School Song Book Publishers.
35 cts. per copy; 40 cts. by mail.
Biglow & Main, The John Church
New York and Chicago. Cincinnati & New York.

LADIES!

Use Only

BROWN'S FRENCH DRESSING

Awarded highest honors

Phila., 1876; Frankfurt,
Berlin, 1877; Amsterdam,
Paris, 1878; New Orleans,
Melbourne, 1880; Paris,
and wherever exhibited.

Paris Medal on every bottle.

Beware of Imitation.

100,000 DRESSMAKERS WOULD DRESSMAKING SIMPLIFIED

Any Lady Can now Learn to Cut Perfect-Fitting

Patented 1879-1885 1886-1888
No one using a Chart or complete with The McDowell Drafting Machine in Cutting Graceful and Perfect-Fitting Easy to Learn, Rapid to Form, Follows every Fashion, as Useful as the Machine.
Free 30 days to test at your own risk.
Send for Illustrated Circular THE McDOWELL CO., 6 West 14th Street, New York.

We know the advertisers to be thoroughly reliable, and machine is a really wonderful invention.—Editor.

FACIAL BLEMSH

The largest Establishment World for the treatment of Scap, Eczema, Moles, Wart, Freckles, Birthmarks, Mites, Wrinkles, Red Nose, Oily Skin, Acne, Pimples, heads, Barber's Itch, Scars, Powder Marks, Bleaching, Development, Hollow or Sunken etc. Consultation free at office or treatment, sent to any address on receipt.
JOHN H. WOODBURY, Dermatologist,
125 West 42d St., New York.

WOODBURY'S FACIAL SOAP
Skin and Scalp, at Druggists or by mail.

GARFIELD TEA Cures Constipation and Sick Headache

Free samples at all druggists or 319 W. 45th St.

Will be found invaluable for Cholera Infantum and all Summer Children or adults. It is medicine but will be sustained life whenever else fails. 4 sizes 25c, 50c, 75c, 1.00.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Preferred who can furnish a horse and give the time to the business. Spare moments may be employed also. A few vacancies in towns at B. F. JOHNSON & CO., 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1890, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.
 EDITED BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

Vol. XIII., No. 34. Offices, Bible House, N. Y.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20, 1890.

Price 4 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT OF REV. O. H. YATMAN and Picture of Young People's Meeting.
FORMING A GOSPEL TYPE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon
 at the Farmers' Encampment Last Sunday.
PICTURE OF OGDEN M. E. UNIVERSITY, UTAH.
OUR COUNTRY. Mr. Whittier's New Poem.
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.
ENTERING THE KINGDOM. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
POEMS FROM NEW BOOKS: Paul's Native City, Etc.
THE ADVENT OF THE SON OF MAN. By P. W. E.
SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S EVENTS. (Illustr'd.)

THE BEGINNING OF THE MIRACLES. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
THE OCEAN GROVE CONFERENCE.
IN THE CHINK OF THE DOOR. A Story of the S. S.
 Golden Text.
PORTRAIT OF THE LATE CARDINAL NEWMAN.
PICTURE OF AN ARAB SHEIK AT PRAYER.
WHY HE WAVERED. A New Serial Story by Rev.
 Leander S. Keyser. (Continued.)
A Business Man's Opinion—A Prayer Overheard—Taming a Shrew—A Little Wife's Heroism, Etc.
PICTURE OF A BUDDHIST TEMPLE IN INDIA.

REV. C. H. YATMAN—A MEETING IN THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S TEMPLE AT OCEAN GROVE.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

Preached last Sunday at the American Farmers' Encampment, Mount Gretna, Pa.

FARMING A GOSPEL TYPE.

Reminiscences of Farm Life.—Farmers Needing Sympathy not Flattery.—Scriptural Allusions to Farming.—Ancient Farming.—Analogy of Husbandry with Religion.—The Soul Needs the Plough.—A Farmer's Incentive to his Son.—Deep Plowing Necessary.—Crooked Furrows.—The Time for Sowing.—Right Seed Essential.—Men Who Sow Nettles.—The Work of the Harrow.—The Time of Reaping.—How Souls are Threshed.—The Hard Pull at the Last.

"Elisha the son of Shaphat who was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth." 1. Kings 19: 19.

FARMERS of America! Accept my salutation. Our text puts us down into the plough's furrow, where many of us have been before. My boyhood passed on a farm, and my father a farmer, your style of life is familiar to me. One of my earliest recollections is that of my father coming in from the hot harvestfield exhausted, the perspiration streaming from his forehead and chin, and fainting on the doorsill, and my mother resuscitating him, until seeing the alarm of the household, he said, "Don't be frightened. I got a little tired, and the sun was hot, but I am all right now." And I remember mother seated at the table, often saying, "Well, I am too tired to eat!" The fact is, that I do not think the old folks got thoroughly rested until they lay down in the grave-yard back of Somerville, to take the last sleep.

Office-seekers go through the land and they stand on political platforms, and they tell the farmers the story about the independent life of a farmer, giving flattery where they ought to give sympathy. Independent of what? No class of people in this country have it harder than farmers. Independent of what? Of the curculio that stings the peach trees? of the rust in the wheat? of the long rain with the rye down? of the Independent of the grasshopper? of the locust? of the army-worm? of the potato-bug? Independent of the drought that burns up the harvest? Independent of the cow with the hollow horn? or the sheep with the foot-rot? or the pet horse with a nail in his hoof? Independent of the cold that freezes out the winter grain? Independent of the snowbank out of which he must shovel himself? Independent of the cold weather when he stands threshing his numbed fingers around his body to keep them from being frosted? Independent of the frozen ears and the frozen feet? Independent of what? Fancy-farmers who have made their fortunes in the city and go out in the country to build houses with all the modern improvements, and make farming a luxury, may not need any solace; but the yeomanry who get and who that way have to clothe and educate their children, and pay their taxes and meet the interest on mortgaged farms—such men find a terrific struggle. And my hope is that this great National Farmers' Encampment may do something toward lifting the burdens of the agriculturists. Yes, we were nearly all of us born in the country. We dropped corn in the hill, and went on Saturday to the mill, tying the grist in the centre of the sack so that the contents on either side the horse balanced each other; and drove the cattle afield, our bare feet wet with the dew, and rode the horses with the halter to the brook until we fell off, and hunted the mow for nests until the feathered occupants went cackling away. So we all understand rustic allusions. The Bible is full of them. In Christ's sermon on the Mount, you see the full-blown lilies and the glossy back of the crow's wing as it flies over Mount Olivet. David and John, Paul and Isaiah find in country life a source of frequent illustration, while Christ takes the responsibility of calling God a farmer, declaring: "My Father is the Husbandman."

Their Living Out of the Soil,

Noah was the first farmer. We say nothing about Cain, the tiller of the soil. Adam was a gardener on a large scale, but to Noah was given all the acres of the earth. Elisha was an agriculturist, not culturing a ten-acre lot, for in my text you find him plowing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth. In Bible times the land was so plenty and the inhabitants so few, that Noah was right when he gave to every inhabitant a certain portion of land; that land, if cultured, ever after to be his own possession.

Ancient Farming.

They were not small crops raised in those times, for though the arts were rude, the plough turned up very rich soil, and barley, and cotton, and flax, and all kinds of grain came up at the call of the harvesters. Pliny tells of one stalk of grain that had on it between three and four hundred ears. The rivers and the brooks, through artificial channels, were brought down to the roots of the corn, and to this habit of turning a river wherever it was wanted, Solomon refers when he says; "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, and He turneth it as the rivers of water are turned, whithersoever He will."

The wild beasts were caught, and then a hook was put into their nose, and then they were led over the field, and to that God refers when He says to wicked Sennacherib: "I will put a hook in thy nose and I will bring thee back by the way which thou camest." And God has a hook in every man's nose, whether it be Nebuchadnezzar or Ahab or Herod. He may think himself very independent, but some time in his life or in the hour of his death, he will find that the Lord Almighty has a hook in his nose.

This was the rule in regard to the culture of the ground: "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together," illustrating the folly of ever putting intelligent and useful and pliable men in association with the stubborn and the unmanageable. The vast majority of troubles in the churches and in reformatory institutions comes from the disregard of this command of the Lord; "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together."

There were large amounts of property invested in cattle. The Moabites paid 100,000 sheep as an annual tax. Job had 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen. The time of vintage was ushered in with mirth and music. The clusters of the vine were put into the winepress, and then five men would get into the press and trample out the juice from the grape until their garments were saturated with the wine and had become the emblems of slaughter. Christ Himself, wounded until covered with the blood of crucifixion, made use of this allusion when the question was asked: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel and thy garments like one who treadeth the wine-vat?" He responded: "I have trodden the wine-press alone."

The Sinews of the Nation.

In all ages there has been great honor paid to agriculture. Seven-eighths of the people in every country are disciples of the plough. A government is strong in proportion as it is supported by an athletic and industrious yeomanry. So long ago as before the fall of Carthage, Strabo wrote twenty-eight books on agriculture; Hesiod wrote a poem on the same subject—"The Weeks and Days." Cato was prouder of his work on husbandry than of all his military conquests. But I must not be tempted into a discussion of agricultural conquests. Standing amid the harvests and orchards and vineyards of the Bible, and standing amid the harvests and orchards and vineyards of our own country—I want to run out the analogy between the production of crops and the growth of grace in the soul—all these sacred writers making use of that analogy.

In the first place I remark, in grace as in the fields there must be a plough. That which theo-

